"Mechanics and tradesmen are much better off than the labourers; but they too sometimes see want. The county of Mayo would give beggars to the whole nation."—(Barrett.)——"I have been often in the county of Mayo, and I know that many of its inhabitants go out to beg, and leave their land tilled after them, and sometimes their cows."—(Cassidy.)——"The poor of this county go to other counties, so that there is a regular exchange."—(D'Arcy.)——"There is a small farm (10 acres) in this neighbourhood, set at 4 l. 10 s. an acre; there is a cottier on it who pays 6 l. for a quarter of an acre, with a small house on it."—(Kenny.)——"Must I not, to-morrow, if turned out of my holding, go to beg, though I can live very middling as long as I am left in it?"—(Mahon.)——"The general food of the peasant is dry potatoes; he sometimes may have a herring or a drop of milk; it is a melancholy truth that they can rear the pig, but they cannot eat the bacon."—(Cassidy.)——"Nothing would cause a man or his family to go out of his cabin but hunger. The time was, when, if a man wanted the making of a cart, he need but go to his landlord and ask it; and now, if a man is known to cut the thorn he will be fined for it; firing is very scarce here; we must go three miles for turf."—(Griffin.)

THE number who are supported by charity in summer must altogether depend upon the amount of the previous potato crop; during the last summer 150 families were entirely supported by the gratuities of their equals, or by the assistance afforded them by the gentry, and none came to me but those who were in the height of distress.—(J. M'Donogh.)——There is not a man in the village of Outerard who does not know every other man's means; can tell three months before when each of his neighbours will be out of provisions.—(Dr. Kirwan.)——And I am certain that there must be a scarcity of food next season, from the failure of the potato crop that is now gathering in.—(T. Cottingham.)——The usual mode of giving is by loans of food; the people lend freely to each other, and give besides.—(Clarke.)——An individual will not ask relief from his landlord, except provisions upon credit. I do not know of assistance being given by the gentry in any other way—(Captain O'Flaherty.)

When the want of provisions and the want of work fall together upon the people at any particular period, they choose a village speaker, who can tell their story better than they themselves, and a whole village comes together. The landlord very frequently gives what they ask; an accurate account is kept of the food they get, this account is never allowed to be mixed mixed up with any account for rent, but always forms a distinct and prior claim; the people find it their interest to make good their payments, and on money so lent I do not think the landlords ever lose anything.—(Captain O'Flaherty.)——A man, named Rutledge, came to me last summer, and told me that he had neither work nor food. I had given him seed money in the beginning of the season, to sow some 40*s.* worth of land that he had himself reclaimed. I know him to be an industrious man of regular habits and good character. When he spoke to me about his distress, it was nothing, I may say, that I had to spare; I was living at the time on food bought on credit, and my agreement was, that I should pay in money for the potatoes I got, the highest price the market might rise to during the time I had them on trust; I lent Rutledge six or seven stone of potatoes to be paid back in kind, and gave him the day's food to relieve his actual want.—(J. M'Donogh.)——The people endeavour to be punctual in their payments of loans, for they probably will have to borrow the following year, but when they obtain such assistance from me, the claim of rent precedes mine, and out of upwards of 20 instances, I have not, nor cannot hope to be repaid by half-a-dozen.—(Dr. Kirwan.)——"For my part, I think there are many who wish for a war, that the people might either earn or fight; we think we will get better, but every year we are getting worse. The people that have land are crying. I had a holding, of 30*s.* worth, which did not contain more than two arable acres (I had oats and potatoes from them), besides wild pasture. This was good for nothing to me; there was no sort of cattle fed upon it, while I held it, except grouse; so I gave it up. I was formerly a brazier; for four years I lived by my trade, in Galway; working hard early and late; many a night I wore a penny candle working, for I had plenty to do; I began the world with about 10*l.* in tools and stuff. At the end of the first year I was well off; at the end of the second it was half gone; and then from that out, the poverty came on me like the flood of a mountain, big at the first and small at the last. From the time the first stone is taken out of the wall it begins to tumble and break down. I was getting worse the third year, still struggling on; but I was never bit off till the end of the fourth year. My family and myself were shook out, and we had enough to do to get out of Galway. A day's work the first year was worth 5*s.*; I was in a balance the second, between slack work and the profits of the first; but after that employment fell away, and the wages fell from 5*s.* to 1*s.* 6*d.*; I was forced then often to leave some of my work in pledge for a dinner, or the price of it, with a neighbour, and then some of my tools in pledge for the price of the stuff; then my own coat and my wife's cloak were pawned, for no one will give credit to a poor man, and people begin to close in upon him when he goes out of work. I managed to keep a dinner to my family to the last. I came to this neighbourhood to look for work, and by different means have been able to find a support for my family. But I am often greatly stinted, many a time I have been forced to fast on one meal, or it may be that I would not taste that one when we had it, but gave it to the little children; and I sometimes have been three days, one after another, when we had not enough for one day. Of late, I generally succeed in getting employment; to-day I was drawing potatoes."—(Fox.)——"It is useless to advise people, when others do not employ them, to employ themselves, and thereby improve their lands. The common reply to my suggestions to them on this head is, 'if we showed that we were getting better, so much would be immediately added to the rent.' They will not even help to mend the bye-roads that lead to their own dwellings; they say if they did, the agent would drive his gig up to their door and raise the rent."—(Dr. Kirwan.)

"FROM September till March there is little or no employment for labourers or outside tradesmen; during these months all the labourers are idle, with the exception of servant boys. Inside tradesmen get much less work in winter than in summer."—(Madden.)——"Inside tradesmen have not on an average employment for six months in the year."—(Egan.)——"This is the worst part of the year for our trade. The small farmers are the principal employers, and their poverty, from the depression of the times and the high rent, leaves them unable to employ tradesmen until the harvest, when they generally have a trifle of money in their hands. The labourers too would give employment, but they cannot afford it, because they are unemployed themselves."—(Killeen.)——"By taking an average of the parish, I would say there are from 600 to 800 able-bodied men who do not get three months work, at 6*d.* a day, in the year."—(Egan.)——"The witness then entered into a calculation of the number of men who had constant employment, and averaged the number to whom all the odd days' employment given, would give constant work, and agreed that all the work which was done by hired labourers could not give constant employment to, at the highest calculation, more than 100 men. When first the number 100 was mentioned as the result of the enumeration, some of the witnesses present, who did not join in making the calculation, scouted the idea of there being so little employment, but on the names of the employers, the number constantly employed by each, and the number to whom each of them gave occasional employment, being mentioned, they agreed, and said, that if 100 was not over the mark, it was not under it.

"I would employ a great many more than I do, but the high rent, and the small price given for the produce, causes me to use the plough instead of the spade, as being much cheaper; I always sow and take out my potatoes with a plough; eight men would take out an acre of potatoes with the plough, when it would require about 45 to 48 men with the spade."—(Laverty.)——"There is no such thing in this parish as wages given by the small farmers; they swap their labour, and give day for day one to another; they cannot afford to give money, and there is so little employment to be had that they set no value on their labour. The man who has a horse will give him to plough or harrow to the man who has not, and get work in return."—(Egan.)——There is only one farmer in the parish, who holds 80 acres; there are three who hold 40, four who hold 30, 10 holding 20, 30 holding 10, 100 holding 5 to 10, 150 holding 5, about 200, 2 to 5, about 200 from 2 acres down, and about 300 families depending on con-acre (all the witnesses present joined in this calculation). The 20-acre men, do not, on an average, give more than from 10 to 20 days' work in the year each; men holding from 5 to 10 acres never employ the con-acre men; all the labourers are con-acre men; they depend on con-acre for their support; they generally pay the rent by rearing a pig, which is fed with the skins of the potatoes."—(Egan.)——"You could get 500 men to-morrow willing to work for any wages you would offer; they would go to work without asking what you would give them, and be satisfied with half-pay; this would not be the case, if there was a sufficiency of employment for two-thirds of the labourers; the labourers are not employed one-fourth of their time. I counted 100 men going from this neighbourhood in one group to look for employment, and I saw some of the very same men standing in the market-place at Nenagh, offering to go with the farmers at any wages, when they were picking the best from among them."—(Monaghan.)——"I have known men to work for 4*d.* a day."—(Kilkaldy.)——When out of work the quantity of food is certainly much diminished, the decrease is greater and more general in the summer months; but the quality is not changed, it could not be worse; for 50 miles round this place, every grain of wheat and oats, and every pig is sent to foreign markets; meal or flour they do not know the taste of; some of them kill their pigs, hoping to get a better price by doing so, and cannot eat even the entrails. The very egg must go out for the rent.—(Monaghan.)——During the winter months they live on the produce of the con-acre, in summer when unemployed they live on cabbage and green herbs, with a few potatoes; they live for three days on the quantity of potatoes which they would, if they could afford it, use in one.—(Madden.)——This is the case every summer; there were 200 families in this parish so last summer.—(Egan.)——Those who have a plot of early potatoes dig them before they are half grown; they often have them dug out when they ought to be beginning; eating these unripe potatoes causes sickness; many men are put to their graves by this bad food; they are pounded with salt and vegetables, to form a substantial body, otherwise they could not be eaten, they are so wet and tasteless; they are as soft as mushrooms.—(Campbell.)——They dig in one month what would support them for two if allowed to mature.—(Egan.)——If there was any means of getting the loan of money at this season, a very small sum would keep a family from ruining themselves by digging the unripe potatoes. A man might get credit, but it comes easier to him to waste two months' food, when he has it, in supporting his family for one, than to promise two prices for one month's food, when he cannot tell will he ever have the means of paying it.—(Campbell.)

They and their families are often reduced to beggary; a man first is broken in his holding by promising too high a rent; when gale day comes, he is not able to pay it, and all his stock, produce, &c. are canted; he then is ejected, and if he has anything left, he takes a skirt of a bog, at a low rent, which is fit to give middling crops. The rent being raised, he is unable to pay it, and all he had is spent in reclaiming the bog; he is now unable to take another piece, so he must turn labourer, and when employment is scarce, he must turn beggar. There were 50 ejectments served in this neighbourhood this last month; all on persons holding from 10 acres to two; some of them have 10 children, and what I said before must be the fate of the most of them; those who have no capital will have a shorter course, for they must turn labourers at once.—(Egan.)——When first driven to beggary, they feel ashamed to beg in their own parish, where every person knows them, and generally remove 10 or 15 miles from home. The men do not generally beg, and as soon as employment can be procured, the wife and family come back; nothing but continued want of employment would cause a labourer's family to continue begging; they are often many days on half allowance before their spirit is broken down; but, accustomed to it as they are, when it continues too long they must yield.—(Moran.)——I never knew a case of poverty causing prostitution in the first instance; they are generally first seduced by a promise of marriage; this promise being broken, they become reckless, and then money has the effect.—(Moran.)

They often steal turf, potatoes and cabbage, when in great want; I have caught persons stealing my own. I did not prosecute them; common humanity prevented me, for I knew that it was want caused them to do it.—(Egan.)——I think there is more evil caused by not giving direct support to the destitute, than there would be by giving it. I do not think it would produce idleness, for in places where there are poor schools, those who are able to pay will not send their children to them.—(Moran.)

If a man can procure good security, he will get provisions on credit; they give promissory notes for the payment; they frequently promise twice the market price.—(Egan.)——A poor creature, in want of food, would promise anything rather than starve; they always pay it, if they can scrape it together in any way; if they did not pay they would get a bad name, and no person would be inclined to give them credit the next season; it is generally paid before the landlord's rent.—(Moran.)——Those who give provisions on credit, always charge double the market price. Many make it a trade to buy meal when cheap, and give it out "on time" (as they call it) when it is scarce.—(Kilkaldy.)——I have known many to refuse to sell for ready-money, knowing that they would have a better market by taking advantage of the people's poverty and selling on credit.—(Coglan.)——Some of Mr. M'Dermott's tenants gave meal out "on time" while he was from home, and when the persons who got it were going to pay, Mr. M'Dermott would not let them give more than a trifle above the market price, though they promised double that.—(Madden.)——Mr. O'Flaherty, of Cullen, and Mr. M'Dermott, of Ramore, gave out meal last year at market price.—(Moran.)——They get deeper and deeper in debt every year, till at last they owe so much that no person will give them credit, when the scarce months come, and they must beg.—(Madden.)——The tradesmen are always in debt; they first get, and then earn and pay; they have the calf eat in the cow's belly.—(Campbell.)

Mr. M'Dermott often gives employment for the purpose of relieving distress, when he does not require the work to be done; he is the only gentleman in the neighbourhood who does so; many of them, so far from employing men when they do not require them, would not give a man a month's time for his rent if they saw him in distress, they would turn him out on the world. It is not six months ago since I saw a neighbour of my own sitting with his family round his hearth; the potatoes were upon the fire; but before they were fit for his children to eat, I saw his fire quenched and the half-boiled potatoes put out upon the road. I know that he was willing to pay the rent, but really he was not able; he was a decent and hard-working man; he was an honest man, but he was a poor man.—(Egan.)

No labourer can, from his wages, provide against the want of employment; his wages are barely sufficient to support him and his family for the day; they are often two days that they cannot afford to buy a halfpenny worth of tobacco.—(Madden.)——What can a man who has a wife and children, or a father or mother, to support, save from 6*d.* a day?—(Moran.)——Sixpence a day is the wages given for six months of the year, and 8*d.* the other six.—(Kilkaldy.)——Continual want, and having no prospect of improvement, produces recklessness and discontent.—(Moran.)——It would be an ease to one-half of them to be transported; if they were transported they would have good clothing and enough to eat.—(Campbell.)——Even when work is plenty the labourers do not always have kitchen, they are sometimes fed by the employer, then they get kitchen, but when working for the landlord a herring is a luxury; the farmers feed their labourers, gentlemen do not.—(Egan.)——If there was plenty of employment there would be no "Terrys," but the people here have nothing in plenty but hunger and ease.

"IN one house there are three men sitting idle this minute, John Folan, John Burke and his son; not a hand's turn they worked these five days, and the work they got then was given either through interest or charity. Burke has seven in family, and I knew them last June to live on one stone of potatoes for 24 hours.—(Kelly.)——That often happens to them; and there are hundreds in the same way."—(Lidden.)——"They live next door to me, and I have known them to have only three pints of meal to support nature during an entire day; and that not once nor twice, but often."—(White.)——"During the months of December, January and February, and the first part of March, every labourer is out of employment; during these months a man might get one day's work in the week, but never more than two; and very few can get that same."—(Mullen.)——There are about 50 of this class in the town of Clifden; provisions are plenty at this season, and if they have a little pig to sell, the price of it would go very far.—(Kelly.)——At this time they are generally in a state of want, and strive to live when they have not half enough to eat; for one meal they eat in comfort they eat two in want; when one stone of potatoes would do them, they must be satisfied with three-fourths of a stone. Men have been at work with me, who called for half their day's hire to purchase food to enable them to work on. I saw one man, who was cutting turf for myself, obliged to give up working, being ashamed to tell that he was hungry, till he was struck through weakness. "I know they exist, but they draw their breath and that is all."—(Corbat.)

In September and October they all will get constant employment, and from the latter end of March till the beginning of July, there is constant work during these months. During the spring and harvest, and turf cutting seasons, very few are out of employment.—(Corbat.)

They often are forced, through want of employment, to beg privately, and sometimes publicly; they are so shy, that they have often come to my own door, and though really in want, and wishing to get something, they stood looking in without asking, being ashamed to call for relief; but when offered it, they took it with the greatest thankfulness, and acknowledged that they came with the intent of asking, but were ashamed.—(O'Brien.)——This is all through want of work; three days' work, at 8*d.* a day, would keep a family of seven from such want as this: there is not a labourer in the parish (except an odd one, who has constant work with a farmer,) that would not be glad to get three days' work, at 6*d.* a day, from this till the middle of March.—(Burke.)——If all the work that is to be done in the parish from this till March were fairly divided, each labourer would not get a day in the week.—(Kelly.)

I never knew an instance of a person committing a crime, for the purpose of being sent to gaol and supported; want never causes them to steal.—(Corbat.)——When the parent is prowling about for bread, the daughters are much exposed; they have nothing to employ them, but going about from house to house, hearing nothing good.—(O'Brien.)

I knew men, from want of employment, in the early season, when there was no general want of provisions, to be obliged to dig their potatoes before they were half ripe.—(O'Brien.)

Those that are known get credit by advancing 1*d.* in the stone of potatoes, and 4*s.* in the hundred of meal; sometimes they are obliged to promise twice the market-price; but this is very seldom.—(White.)

The wages of a labourer are not more than enough for actual support. No matter how industrious and well educated, a man can seldom, if ever, lay by anything to provide against the idle time. I have a man, named Keely, in my own employment for the last nine months; I give him 8*d.* a day, and his wife endeavours to earn something by knitting stockings, and yet I know that the first week's want of work will break him down again.—(Corbat.)——The frequent recurrence of want, breaks down a man's spirit; the more hope of improvement the more a man will exert himself; but still the man without a jacket will work like a slave.—(Corbat.)——The man who lives on credit from year to year, is kept in debt for life; and if he is an honest man, it keeps him always uneasy, and heartless, and often from his sleep.—(White.)——Neither the gentry nor farmers ever employ workmen, when they do not really want them, for the purpose of relieving their distress.—(White.)

The poor generally marry earlier in life than the other classes.—(Corbat.)——I believe some beg who are able to work, but I never knew any one to be reduced to beggary by idleness.—(Mullin.)

I was broken 10 years ago, and my wife begged for three-quarters of a year, and supported me; I sometimes got a little journeywork; I then hired a loom for 25*s.* a year; I have now one of my own, which I bought, and since that, my wife or family never begged.—(White.)——Such cases often happen, I know them.—(Mullin.)——I am now in debt 2*l.* 9*s.*, and if my landlord was hard, and pressed on me immediately, I should almost beg.—(Corbat.)——I am sure, if we paid them in ready money, that they would work more for us; I would get enough of them at 8*d.* a day; if I had ready money, I would prefer paying them so. I have often known them, through want of money, to be obliged to sell their potatoes, knowing well that they should buy them back at twice the price they got for them.—(Mr. Martin.)——I never knew any die of starvation; but during a dear summer, in the year 1822, upwards of 50 persons died of disorders brought on by hunger. In an ordinary summer there are many glad to get cabbage and salt, without even a potato.—(White.)——In some years it would be a feast to them; in the bad summer I would not know 100 men in the parish, if I met them accidentally, on account of the colour they had.—(Kelly.)——In the year 1822 I do not think there was one stone of potatoes for sale in the barony, and there was not another man's sheep or goat killed by those who were starving.—(Mullin.)

There was more employment for men 10 years ago than there is now; wool is so much dearer now that there is much less spun for the people's own use, and consequently less weaving to be done; wool is twice the price it was, and there are fewer sheep; it is more advantageous to those who have wool, to sell it, and purchase coarse cloth, than to get it manufactured. It is not those that would manufacture for themselves that have the sheep.—(Corbat.)——When the poor are in distress they borrow more from each other than from their landlords.—(Mr. Martin.)

I think a poor-house would be a very good thing.—(Kelly.)——The house would require to be very large, many would force themselves into it, who were in no real want.—(Corbat.)——They would sooner die by the road-side.—(Tully.)——They would deserve to die so.—(Kelly.)——In the year 1822 there were 5,000 people in this district glad to get a naggin of broth, and if you ask them now to go into the poor-house, they would refuse, because they are not hungry.—(Kelly.)——I think that any person in want of food and clothing would be glad to get leave to go in.—(White.)——A young man ought not be let in, two days' work in the week would support him; he would work there for his support, and might he not work as well outside for the public.—(Corbat.)——I think each landlord ought to support his own poor.—(Mr. D'Arcy.)——They would not go in unless they were starving; when in that state they would grasp at anything.—(Mr. Martin.)——They would not work as much in the poor-house as they would for me.—(Corbat.)——I would suffer a great deal of hunger and hardship before I would separate from my wife.—(White.)——Any man able to get three days' work in the week, at 8*d.* a day, would not go in.—(Corbat.)

ABLE-BODIED OUT OF WORK.

Connaught, County Galway.

Examinations taken by Francis Diggens, Esq. W. T. M'Cullagh, Esq.

Parish Tuam. Town Tuam. B r. Clare.

Evidence of his Grace the Archbishop of Tuam, as written by himself.

THERE are some periods of the year at which the labourers in many cases are out of employment. If a labourer has land, he is not reduced to fewer meals at this period; but the meals of those who have not, and are out of employment, when buying at the close of the summer, must be more scanty. This is the season for "spalpeens." Potatoes, in or out of employment, are their constant food. There is no fund for their relief, when thus unemployed.

In summer, when the man goes from home in search of employment, the wife and children generally beg for a time each year; the children of "spalpeens" are habituated to beggary. Whether women and girls become prostitutes, when employment fails, or not, depends entirely on the temptation held out to them; if a person above their own condition will give money, or money's worth, for present relief, flesh and blood, or rather the cravings of nature, must prevail. But I do not observe that when girls are debauched by their own equals, it is accomplished by the hope of gain; therefore, if there is no temptation by the rich, prostitution will not occur in consequence of poverty. There are some instances of women with families being deserted by their husbands, but not many among the labouring classes.

I have never known any persons to commit crimes for the purpose of being sent to gaol, except in the case of poor diseased prostitutes: persons who are sent to gaol are not made worse by the prison discipline of the present day. With all our poverty there are no instances of people dying, in ordinary seasons, of actual starvation.

I do not know many instances of people stealing to relieve themselves from present want, I question whether I recollect one.

They generally get provisions on credit, and upon very dear terms, materially above the market price; owing to the credit, both in town and country, being given by hucksters, or "scullogues," i. e. farmers who have saved. I have not observed that labourers are in a reckless state, the harvest months give them tolerable employment, and wages (comparatively speaking) which enable them to pay their debts; payment is often made in work.

Resident gentlemen sometimes employ more labourers than they actually require, for the purpose of relieving the distress: farmers or absentee proprietors do not. In speaking of the labourer's ability of making provision for want of employment, the word sufficient is inapplicable.

If the labourer has a piece of land he raises potatoes himself; upon the small potatoes and potato skins he rears a pig. Then con-acre is oftentimes made available, which (if it does nothing else) gives employment; and although the individual may not have work for hire, yet (if industrious) he and his household will not starve. I do not say that this state should not be ameliorated greatly; I say it should be so by work and allocation on wastes; this is practicable, for, by relieving the over-populated places, you raise the price of labour, and lower the price of land, especially con-acre. I observe that their condition generally makes them ready and willing instruments in the hands of mischievous, turbulent and wicked men. The poor Irish housekeepers are prone to early marriages; but where there is neither house nor home, nor any provision, but two hands and two feet, they do not usually marry. They do not know any comforts, but it is not difficult in ordinary years to raise sufficient food for bare maintenance; marriage is an indulgence, and the temptation, no wonder that they should yield to it. They cannot be called reckless, if by recklessness is meant utter indifference to all consequences. If they become members of unlawful combinations, it is with the hope of bettering themselves; and so on through the catalogue of crime.

I would now conclude by saying that the Irish, if left unagitated, are a patient and enduring race; good government, good landlords, and constant work and wages, would take them from under the cantharides of the quack politicians, who make the most of them, and would render them useful subjects.

Parish Tuam. Town of Tuam. Bar. Clare.

Evidence of Dr. M'Hale, R. C. Archbishop of Tuam, as written by himself.

IN reply to the question, whether, when work fails the family, the females are ever driven to prostitution?—Seldom or ever, except where hard-hearted, wealthy profligates, availing themselves of their poverty, contrive, after much importunity, to rob them of their virtue and bring them to misfortune.

Numbers would rather starve than expose themselves to the shame of a prison, a feeling, however, which increasing distress is wearing away. Some few instances are known of persons having been guilty of robberies with a view to relieving themselves from want.

The poor are frequently in the habit of obtaining provisions on credit; I should rather say at the rate of the most unchristian usury; not only provisions, but the seed necessary for the soil. It is a common practice with many landlords in this province, and with the agents of others, to seize the crops of their tenantry, or to force them to sell them in the winter season, in order to buy those crops themselves, and then when the spring comes round to sell them at double price, the very grain which the tenantry were obliged to send to their stores.

This practice continues from year to year, so that besides the rack-rent of the land, the landlord or his agent contrives to extort an usurious profit of cent. per cent. upon the crops which are reared by the labour of the wretched tenant.

Mr. WILLIAM BIRMINGHAM, woollen-draper.—Rev. Dr. BURKE, roman-catholic rector of this parish and dean of Dunmore.—GEORGE CLENDENNING, esq., magistrate.—Mr. COLLINS, a gentleman connected with the press.—RICHARD GIBBONS, small farmer of 12 acres.—Mr. LARGE, clerk of petty sessions and churchwarden.—MATTHEW M'DONNELL, esq. magistrate.—ROBERT W. M'ILVEA, esq., magistrate.—WILLIAM M'MILER, small farmer of 12 acres.—EDWARD M'NALLY, weaver.—JOHN REEGAN, labourer.—THOMAS REILLY, labourer.—Mr. GEORGE WOODS, general merchant.—Mr. JOHN WYNNE, general merchant.

THE ordinary wages here is 8 d. a day, the labourer feeding himself. Mr. M'Ilrea says, "The bulk of the labourers are unemployed for two-thirds of the year; they generally plant 'con-acre' potatoes, which last them during the winter; but many, after they have planted the potatoes, not finding employment, are unable to redeem them, and are obliged to leave them for the rent. When the labourer is unemployed, and his stock of provisions exhausted, his wife and family beg;* they submit to great privations before they beg; it is quite common with them to be reduced to a meal a day." Mr. Scott says, "I had a contract for roads, on which I employed 46 men at 8 d. a day; 27 of the 46 had come at least 12 miles to the work, many of them a greater distance, and used to return once a week to see their families. I lodged in the same house with some of them, and was constantly present at the meals of all, except one man; I never saw any of them have any sort of kitchen with their potatoes. Reily says, "I am counted a good labourer, and while there is employment to be had, for any fair proportion of the labourers, I am seldom idle on the whole year; I am idle for about three months on an average. In the beginning of this summer I was idle for about three weeks, one day after another; I had no provision; I sold every article in my house rather than let my wife out; you may be sure we eat the price of them but sparingly; at last I sold the pot I had to boil my potatoes, and I walked out of the door myself, and my wife and my six children; we went off where we were not known, and begged. I never told what we were doing away before, though my neighbours might make a very near guess to it; but it ought to be no shame to any one to say he begged his bit when he wanted it; it is honester for me to have that to tell than that I robbed that gentleman; and if I had not done the one, I must have done the other. A great many labourers did as I did; I met my own neighbours on my way. I am but a week at home (October); my wife and family have not come yet; there was no food before them, and I came to try if I could have something earned for them before they would come." Mr. M'Ilrea says, "Reily's story is not strange; it may surprise you; to us it is common place." It has not been known that any of the labouring classes have committed petty offences, in order to secure themselves the food and shelter of a prison. Regan (labourer) says, "They would prefer begging, as they always have this alternative; no man will starve, or go to a prison for food, while begging is open to him. If he beg, though one man refuse, another will give to him." Reily says, "The mere labourer can seldom get provisions on credit; hunger would too often make him forget to pay for them. A person holding some land, or a labourer, who can find a person of substance having reliance on his honesty, and willing to join him in a promissory note, can get provisions on credit, but at an exorbitant advance of price. I have known a man buying meal in the market in July for 10 s. 3 d. a hundred, sell it on credit for 16 s., to be paid in the middle of September. There is no attempt made among farmers, or the gentry, to establish any system of general employment; in answer to a question, whether any of the farmers or gentry, individually, employ more labourers than they require, for the purpose of relieving their distress? Mr. M'Ilrea says, "I know no instance at present, but believe that when Lord Sligo resided here, he employed many with that intention." Reily says, "I know no man to do it, but one Ned Burns, a lime-burner, that labours with his workmen himself; he kept 12 men employed last summer, giving them work in turns, to divide the benefit among them. He gave them 8 d. a day, though if he asked them they would gladly have worked for their mere food; and he gave them 50 s. among them besides, which he never deducted from their wages." Mr. M'Ilrea says: "The wages of a labourer cannot support himself and a large family well, even for the day he is employed; of course it is utterly impossible for him to make any provision for want of work, or any other contingency." In answer to a question, whether labourers do not expend in drink what would prove a considerable relief to them when out of employment? Mr. M'Ilrea answers, "It is quite a mistake to suppose that labourers drink; mechanics do drink, but labourers cannot, they have not the means." This is confirmed by the other witnesses.

The witnesses are of opinion, that marriages take place earlier among the very poor classes, than among those removed above them, in point of comfort." M'Nally, accounting for it, says, "If a man is very poor, he expects nothing but poverty with a wife, and his choice is soon made; but if he has any kind of opulence, or even expects to have it, he takes his time, and looks about him for a wife that will add to it.

* By a reference to head of "Vagrancy" of this parish, it will be seen that a large proportion of the beggars consists of the wives and children of unemployed labourers, or persons who cannot find sufficient employment for their labour to entitle them to that name; on this account, much of the information detailed under that head, would come with equal propriety under the present.

Mr. VERSCHOYLE, protestant rector.—DOMINICK WALDRON, labourer.

Mr. ATKINSON says, "I give 10*d.* a day to the labourers I employ in my stores; labourers in stores are paid higher wages than ordinary labourers, their work being heavier and their hours much longer." Carnan says, "The common wages in the town is 6*d.* or 8*d.* a day." Mr. Costello says, "In the country, near the town, I have known labourers work for 4*d.* a day; I have seen labourers cutting the harvest at 4½*d.* a day; I have been paying 10*d.* a day to labourers when others were begging me to employ them at 6*d.*, and I have paid 6*d.* when others offered for 4*d.*" Mr. Verschoyle says, "I live in the country, near the town, I pay my labourers 8*d.*, but I fear (such is the competition) that if I wished, I might have their labour at a much lower rate." Carnan says, "The man that has the best wages and employment cannot count them his own, there are so many relatives and neighbours that he must help out of his earnings, and he loses by strangers too. A man comes to lodge in the house with him, agreeing to pay a certain part of the rent, and will be concerned in buying the load of turf and other things with him. The man has no employment, but the other will trust him until he gets it. Then when this week and last week, and may be the week before, are unpaid for, he is glad to let him away with the debt, rent and all, and get another that will help him to meet the landlord; many a way the poor man is distressed by the want of employment for his neighbours."

Mr. Armstrong, who is at present engaged in building a bridge in this town, across the Moy, at which he employs a great number of labourers, says, "I have constant solicitations from labourers, anxious to be employed; I must refuse them, unless I choose to turn off others to make way for them, and I am confident the applications would be much more numerous, but persons understood there is no use in making them. I give 8*d.* and 10*d.* a day to the labourers I employ, but if I allowed them to bid against one another, I have no doubt I could procure labourers for 6*d.*" Mr. Loftus says, "There were 100 labourers standing on the street this morning seeking employment, and you would not miss out of them all that obtained it, scarcely a dozen."

All the witnesses agree that in the towns of Ballina and Ardnaree (which are joined by a bridge across the Moy) there are between 700 and 800 labourers; that about half of these, being more or less connected with regular employers, are employed on an average for nine or ten months in the year, that the other half are not employed on an average above three months of the year.*

Carnan says, "The seasons of best employment are summer and winter. The distress is not so great in winter as in summer, because many of the labourers, having planted con-acre potatoes, and paid the rent with their harvest wages, have a stock of provisions that last them for the winter, and because potatoes are much cheaper then than in summer." For both these reasons cases of extreme distress are less common in winter, and fewer of the labourers' families are driven to beg than in summer; great numbers, however, beg even in winter. O'Hara says, "A great many of my neighbours are now (November) unemployed, some have a stock of con-acre potatoes, and live on them, those who have not, live on what their wives and families procure by begging, through the town and the country about it; the men do not beg publicly themselves, particularly at home, and even when they leave home they seldom beg themselves, but let the families apply, while they keep near them, loitering along the road."

Carnan says, "When the labourers are idle in winter, many of them make a practice of re-digging the potato grounds, for any potatoes that may chance to have escaped notice in the first digging. 'Tis a poor resource, but it shows what they are obliged to do for food, when they will go two and three miles into the country, and, after spending their whole day, bring home perhaps one stone of potatoes, that may perhaps be worth 1½*d.* or 2*d.*: many farmers prevent them from this, as it very injurious to the land; and there is another harm arising out of it, dishonesty; for the distressed man, when he is digging potatoes for an employer, will leave potatoes in the ground, that he may dig them out for himself again." In summer the distress is greatest, want of employment and dearness of provisions combining

* This fact of so large a proportion of the labourers being destitute of employment, was most unanimously agreed in by all the witnesses, and other persons present; some stating it as of their own observation and knowledge, the rest assenting to it on their authority, as being persons who had the best means of being informed on the subject.

bining to produce it, in that season; even the employed labourers, who have long families, are then stinted in their meals, which at all seasons are of the poorest and coarsest kind of food. Carnan says, "Some seasons they have herrings (generally salted) with their potatoes; sometimes cabbage boiled on plain water, and chopped with salt; they cannot afford butter, nor any other dressing but salt; a labourer seldom can get milk." Waldron says, "They cannot get even the best sort of the potatoes; the man that has the best employment must live mostly on wet lumpers; though God forbid we should be reflecting on our food, we would be well content if we had enough of them." In summer some of the unemployed labourers, either remaining at home or going to some distant part of the country, ready to take advantage of any employment that may offer, are supported by the begging of their families; many go to England in search of work, by which means, if successful, they earn a small sum, which, on their return, they expend in purchasing a supply of potatoes for the winter, or paying the rent of their con-acre potatoes, if they have planted any.

Carnan says, "Their families are mostly left to beg at home, they very commonly beg their way themselves. I have known several persons leave home with as little as 3*s.* or 4*s.*; they accounted for it in this manner, that in consequence of the opposition between the steam-boats, they would get across for 1*s.* 6*d.* or 2*s.*, and that when they get 30 miles from home they would get their food and their bed by begging. When they leave home and their people they are ashamed of nothing, because of their misery. I am told Irishmen, when they leave home, are a shame to their country for barefacedness. Some of these labourers leave a part of their children with relatives, and may be able to leave a few potatoes with the mother and the other children; as long as these last, they strive to keep in the house, though in misery and hunger, rather than beg, and when they are afterwards obliged to turn out, they live better than when they kept the house; any one wanting two meals running, must turn out rather than want a third. But people are beginning not to think as much of begging now as they used; when a man sees his neighbour go out and be relieved, he says, 'The next time I want, I'll go out myself.' Some labourers, having partial employment, remain at home during this season, and, endeavouring to live without begging, suffer the greatest privations." Browne says, "When a labourer has but little employment, he and his family must often live on but one meal a day and work on it; I have myself worked from six o'clock to six o'clock, without a meal at all, until I got my day's wages to buy me one, in the evening." Carnan says, "'Tis a common thing among labourers to work on one meal in the day; I have known men work eight or ten days running, and during that time live on one meal a day, not tasting food from the hours they eat that meal on one day, until their wives would bring the potatoes to the field at the same hour the next day; I believe that, except that meal, not a bit of food entered their lips within the 24 hours; I have known them, when the other labourers were eating their breakfasts, to be so decent as to walk away to the other end of the field, and I know that when they went home in the evening they had not the means of procuring a second meal, or part of a meal; perhaps the potatoes of the one meal were unpaid for, until they got their wages for that day's work. But it is a folly for us to talk, we are not able to describe to you the wretchedness we see. I knew a man to be working in the field, and when meal-time came, to have no meal to eat, but to go into a cabbage garden that was near and eat the cabbage stalks, and when the time of returning to his work came, to mount work again without any other food. The way I came to know this case was this: I was near the garden, when I heard the owner of it in loud words scolding this man for breaking his cabbages; I saw the man was ashamed, for he hung his head and walked quietly away, without answering or giving any explanation. I thought there was something more than common in it, so I went up to the man and asked him, 'What made him break so many of the cabbages?' He said, 'He was in hunger, and could not help it.' I asked him, 'Had he no other means of relieving it but that?' 'No,' said he, 'I have no other kind of food, since the day before yesterday, when my wife went to seek relief from some of her friends; she has not returned yet.' I asked him to come home with me, and I would relieve him; he could not come then, as he was returning to his work; but I took care to watch him at dinner-hour and bring him home, lest he should not come of himself. I think it a greater charity to relieve such a man, than to relieve the beggar; if I refuse a beggar, some one else will give to him."

Browne says, "Many labourers out of employment are obliged in the scarce season to live on cabbage, boiled on plain water, not having even a potato to eat with it. If they can get a pint of meal (and they often cannot) they make gruel of it, and pour it over the cabbage; the cabbage dressed in this way is easier to eat, and not so apt to sicken them. It never has been my own case to live in this manner, but I have seen it with people living in the same house with me; and when they could not get the cabbage, they have used the 'prassagh' that grows wild in the corn fields."

The town labourers can seldom procure provisions on credit, not being able to afford adequate security for the payment of the debt incurred; when they do obtain them, the advance of price is very great. Duffy got meal in the spring of last year, when it was selling for 12*s.* per cwt., ready-money, agreeing to pay 1*l.* the following harvest. Browne has undertaken to pay 1*l.* 5*s.*, on obtaining credit, when meal was selling at 18*s.* Great numbers of labourers who seek credit on such terms, failing to obtain it, are obliged to beg; and says Duffy, "often to plunder; and such business as that has often brought an honest man to transportation. Many a mischief is done in poverty and distress, that would not be done but for them. When I am hungry, and want a meal, I will go out at night, and do what I would never do if hunger did not drive me. When a man is hungry, the shame shame goes off him; many a mischief is done to the gentlemen of the country that they must overlook when they know the poverty of the people; and the poor man's potatoes and cabbage suffer too; and if I saw my own suffering, I would take my eyes off the man when I knew his distress." Cooper says, "When a man has nothing to eat, and nothing to do but to sit by the fire (if he has one) and think of his misery, many strange thoughts will be running through his head, and it is hard for him to keep them out." Mr. Costello, Mr. Verschoyle, Mr. Caldwell, &c. say, "It is a common practice here to root potatoes from the ridge; or the pit and out-offices, where potatoes were stored, have frequently been broken open by night and plundered."

O'Hara says, "The labourers are not able to clothe their families; very seldom they ever buy any clothes for their children; you scarcely ever see a labourer's child wearing clothes that were made for himself; they mostly wrap a piece of an old sheet, or an old blanket about them, or they depend upon getting some article of cast clothing from the gentlemen or shopkeepers of the town that employ the fathers. They are most of them more than half naked."

Pat. M'Namara, labourer, says, "I have a wife and four young children. I am employed generally for one half the year, my wages varying from 5*d.* to 8*d.* a day. There is one gentleman who always employs me when he has any work to be done. He has never given me more than six months' employment any year; he now gives me much less, as he is giving up the farming. I plant con-acre potatoes; this year's crop is now exhausted. My con-acre crop has never lasted me more than three months. My wages, even with the help of the con-acre, are not sufficient to support me since I lost my land in the country, and came as a labourer to town, 10 years ago. No one year has my earning kept me up, but my wife has begged to support me and the children. I went one season, four years ago, to England, and left my wife and children to support themselves, begging at home. I brought two guineas and a half home with me; I spent it in buying potatoes and some clothes for my family. I also brought home some clothes I got in England for nothing. The only clothes I have got since are an old coat and an old trousers, given me by the gentleman that employed me. Neither my wife nor my children have got any clothes since, but as the same gentleman's wife and daughters have given them old clothes. Their clothes are now all rags; when they go out to beg, they wrap a sheet about them, or a piece of an old carpet that my wife got somewhere when she was begging; she does not use the blanket so; it is scarce enough to have it dry for the family, when they come in at night from begging; little as it is, we were obliged to cut it in two, to divide it among the family. For the last 10 weeks I had but four days' employment; I was engaged a short part of that time in digging my own con-acre potatoes, and when I stood on the street to look for work, persons wanting labourers either hired those they were used to hire, or thinking that I still had employment with the gentleman I have mentioned, hired those that they thought wanted employment more than me." Mr. Irvin here remarks, "There are so many labourers to choose from, that employment is got here by interest and acquaintance, and when a workman is losing one employer, he finds it very difficult to get into the employment of another. During the early part of the summer I had employment for two or three or four days in the week. This was not sufficient to give us enough of potatoes even for the time, but we were obliged to live on it, my wife now and then helping it by begging. For six weeks of midsummer I had not more than six days' work during all that time. I was walking in and out of my house idle, except that I sometimes fiddled at my con-acre potatoes, weeding and moulding them. If I could have got other employment, that would have made me set about this in earnest; I could have finished in a week. I got up most mornings not knowing where the food of the day was to come from, but hoping that my wife would bring in something from begging. She did not beg every day; I had friends and neighbours that occasionally helped me with potatoes, and every time I got relief of that sort, or was employed, I kept her within while it lasted. I was ashamed that she should be seen begging always, particularly when my neighbours knew I had been relieved, or got a day's work. When we had no other means of living, she was able to keep the family up by her begging solely; but we live by stinting every meal, and making the potatoes we ought to eat at one serve for two; 2½ stone each day would be scarce enough for my family; my wife would gather one stone, or 1½ stone by begging, in summer; very seldom she has begged in winter, but when she has, she has gathered two or three stone.

"I hold my cabin rent-free; my employer has given it to me for watching his garden.

"I could not count for you all in my neighbourhood that are living like me; it would require a good clerk to reckon them."

James Loftus, labourer, says: "I have a wife and three children; I did hold five acres of land, but was unable to pay the rent, and lost them four years ago; I then turned labourer, and used to get employment for about three months of the year, mostly in spring and harvest, at from 5*d.* to 8*d.* a day; my wife and children used to beg for themselves, and me in summer and often in winter; I lived in the country part of this parish until last spring, when I came to see what I could do in the town; I did not better myself by the change; I had to sell all my furniture, consisting of a dresser and a pot, for 7*s.*, to support me; I sold them because we had nothing to eat. I was hoping for employment every day, and had no intention of begging until I spent the last of the price of them; I then determined to go beg with my family; I had but three-halfpence, leaving this place; it was the first time I begged myself; I did not beg any until I got 10 miles from home. We took with us all the bed-clothes we had, a single fold of a blanket and a sheet; I sometimes carried them on my back, but oftener they were the only shelter my wife and children had from the weather. While we were begging I thought of going to England to seek for work; I had no means of getting across but begging, and it set me hard. I was 10 weeks begging, and I despaired of ever collecting the 2*s.* that I paid for my own and my family's passage, but for one gentleman that gave me 6*d.* of it. I passed over to Scotland from Donaghadee in a bullock-boat; these boats take passengers for little or nothing, but no one would go in them but a desperate man or a beggar-man. We begged in Scotland and England; we were there a quarter of a year, and I got but three weeks' work; we were passed over to Ireland for nothing, and when we came to this side I had but 5*s.* in my pocket; that lasted us a very short time; we begged our way back again to this town. At first we got a lodging for charity, but when I got a few days' work I agreed to pay 2½*d.* per week. I got but four days' work altogether since I came home, seven weeks ago."—(Carnan explains his getting so little employment, by saying "he is a stranger, and while I or any man that is known stood beside him, he would not be employed.")

Mr. Loftus says, "The town labourers will not admit the country labourers if possible. In digging the potatoes many of us employers would prefer employing the strangers, as they would dig them more honestly, not covering the potatoes as the town labourers do with the mould, who expect to re-dig the ground at their leisure; this being one of their expedients for procuring food when unemployed in the winter." And Loftus himself goes on to say, "When I appeared among the labourers on the street, they used to pelt me with cabbage stumps to drive me away, and to keep to themselves the little employment that is to be had. My wife begs through the streets to support us. There are so many beggars in the town that she cannot pick up enough for the family. I have not begged myself since I came back, except that, when I have no food, I may go through the neighbours' houses. We must leave the town, but do not know where we will turn to.

"We have carried the half blanket and sheet all through, and the whole family has no other night-covering than them, and an outside frieze coat; I know many families have less. (Mr. Loftus says: "The quilts in common use among the labourers, and which in some cases are their sole covering by night, are thin cotton articles, so poor as to be sold new for 15*d.*) I have not got a new article of clothes since I got a coat two years ago; a farmer in England threw me this old pair of trousers; I have no stockings, but I have shoes; my father is a cobbler, and fixed up this pair that some one was throwing away." (Though wretchedly clad, Loftus was clad more comfortably than most of his class in the room.) Rev. Mr. Costello says, "A great part of the labouring population of the town consists of persons, like Loftus, who wander with their families from one town to another in search of employment; if you visit some of the lanes of this town now, where you may find 300 families of labourers, and visit them again after six months, though you will find the same number of families, you will scarcely find 100 of the same; they live crowded in wretched hovels; you may see four families living in a cabin, consisting of a single room 10 feet by 12 or 14, not affording more room than is actually occupied by their beds at night. Carnan says, "If you were going among them for 20 years you would not know their faces, they come and go so fast. Those that are broken in the country flock into the town to look for work, and when they do not find it here they pass on to some other town, anywhere they have a hope of wages, and when they do not get wages they beg. The town labourers give them very little encouragement, and would strive to keep them away if they could; but when they find no work in the country they will stand their chance of any trifle in the town; a spring-well, if it were all ink, would not write for you all the miseries they suffer."

Pat Cooper, labourer, says, "I have a wife and six children; about 12 years ago I held two acres of land, but was broken, and was obliged to give it up from that time to this. I have been straying about as a labourer from one place to another, and the family is growing on me, and I am getting worse and worse every day. When first I lost the land, I went to live in a village where I had some friends, hoping to get some means of living among them. They gave me a cabin, and I worked among them for potatoes, getting more of them than my labour was worth to them, that did not require it, but that they wished to assist me in my want. But they soon grew tired of keeping me, and I quitted the village with my family. God knows all the places I went to afterwards, taking my wife and family along with me, sometimes begging and sometimes working; if I got the work I never would beg. Four years ago we came to live in this town, and, if we have any home, it has been our home since. I took a cabin at 4*d.* a week. I could not take it by the year. I would not encounter the year's rent. I would rather pay by the week, as I can afford it, and leave the cabin when I can pay no longer. I have not been able to stand the whole year in it since I came here. There is not a town between this and Donaghadee I have not travelled with my family, in the summer time begging or working when I could find work. Our children are young; some of them could walk with us; of those that could not stand the walking, my wife carried some and I carried others. While we were begging I used to keep at a distance from my wife, ashamed to be seen, and meet her in the evening. This summer I went to England. I had no notion of going there when I left home. I left home with 2*s.* 6*d.* in my pocket, and that went a short way on us. The thought of going there took me on the way. I met persons that were taking bullocks to Scotland. They chanced to want a driver, and they took me over with them free. My wife and children came with me, but they did not pretend to belong to me. They pretended to be a widow and orphans, and got their passage in charity. I was in the same boat with them, but they did not let on to know me. I had no money to pay for their passage, and I thought it too much for my services to ask the owners of the bullocks to take them over for my sake. In Scotland again, we separated every day, I to look for work, and they to beg, and we met every evening. We were better off begging in Ireland than in Scotland; we got better food and more of it in Scotland, but we could get no lodging. I and my wife and children slept three nights nights in the open air, and had nothing to cover us all but one blanket. One night surely I thought it would be the death of us. Towards evening we applied at a farmer's to let us sleep in his cart-house, but he refused us, and his wife came out and drove us away, and we were obliged to find what comfort we could under a stone wall. There was a turf stack near where we lay; we could not say who it belonged to, but we kindled a fire of it, and lay down, as we thought, under the sheltery side of the wall, but before morning the wind changed, and it began to rain, and before the day broke our blanket was as wet as if it was dragged through a river; we would have perished that night if I had not the luck to have lighted the fire. The embers were alive in the morning; I went to the stack again, and I changed the fire to the other side of the wall, and, as God would have it, the day cleared, and we were able to dry our clothes, or some one of the weak children must surely have died of that night's lying; my wife, too, was large in the family way, and within two months of her time. I thought it very hard indeed that we would not be let sleep in a cart-house, but they say in the country that some Irishmen did not behave very honestly there; at any rate, that night disheartened the family, but we all travelled on a little farther, till we heard accounts that the farther we went the worse we should be; my wife and children turned back soon after, but I went on, thinking it would be better for me to die on the way than go back worse than I came, and hoping to earn something to help us for the winter at home. They made me a promise that they would support themselves backward and forward begging through the country, and that they would meet me faithfully at Portpatrick, in a month from that day. While we were all together the family supported me by what they begged, without my applying myself; when I parted from them, I was obliged to ask for my own bit, and sure enough I would have fared but badly, as I was a new hand at it, but that I met an old hand at begging (it was his 25th season) that knew how to tell his story, and was able to support himself and myself; I went on towards York, but I was too late for the harvest, as I had been encumbered in travelling by the family. From the day I landed till I left Scotland again, there were altogether about five weeks, and I got but seven days' work, at 3*s.* a day; I met the family at Portpatrick, and passed over in a steamer; I paid 4*s.* for our passage, and had but 6*s.* when I landed again in Ireland. We faced straight home to overtake the potato harvest, and I had 4*s.* of the 6*s.* when I was back here in Ballina. I had no provisions before me when I came home, but I got a few days' chance work at digging the potatoes; that has supported us without begging since. I never had any regular employment since I came to this town, though I often looked for it; there are so many looking for it, that employment goes here by votes and interest, and faction; I mean by faction, having friends that will speak for one; my family never begged a bit here; they would live, and often did live, on a meal a day, rather than beg in the town. I have now in my house about three days' consumption of potatoes; the Lord may send me some relief, in the shape of work, before they are out; if not, I and my wife and children must go and roam through the country again."

Waldron says, "The poor are willing to work, but there is no one to employ them; men are of no value at all here, and there is no regard for them; many of them have so much hunger in their faces, that no one would give them their food for all the work they could do. They are under a compliment for life to every man, and under the lash of the world."

William Hanley says, "I am a labourer, and have a wife and six children, the eldest a girl 14 years old; I worked yesterday for 5*d.* and my breakfast; little as that is, I wish I could earn it every day. I have no work to-day, and how am I to live, but on others. My wife* is out now begging, striving to gather a prog for myself and the children, and when she brings in that lock of potatoes to-night, I cannot buy as much as a halfpenny herring to eat with them. I have not a stitch of clothes, but what I wear now, shivering and famishing as you see me, yet when I can get that 5*d.* a day I am glad to stand out in the cold wind and rain, every blast and dash of it driving to the heart of me. We live in a deserted house (one of the houses which Carnan speaks of); the thatch is all melted off it; nothing remains but the scraws; you can see the light through every part of the roof; it is not much more shelter to us than if we lay down by a high wall; we have to shift our bed from one side to the other, as the wind changes; and if it was not in that state, I would not be left there, for sure I can pay no rent; our bed is but a 'shake down' of straw, as we have but one blanket, not four pounds weight, among us all, and even that my wife has round her when she is begging, and I must often ask of a man as poor as myself to lend or give me a few turf to dry it when she brings it in wet (several labourers present say they have often sent him a few turf). I am often without a fire in my house in winter, and if I went to the pawnbroker's and offered to pledge the coat on my back, I would not get 1*d.* on it; we had not one spark of fire in our cabin last night (this was November), and I was up at day-dawn this morning, to purchase a load of turf out of the 5*d.* that I received as my day's hire, late yesterday evening; and there we were about the fire-place to-day, I striving to spare the sods, and the children driving and pulling one another to see who would get nearest the coals. When we have no fire of our own, the children must try to get a warming at a neighbour's fire. I came to this town from Westport 14 years ago; I came because I could not live without begging, and I was ashamed to beg at home."

John Duffy says, "I am a labourer, and for some years past have had pretty regular employment with a Mr. Jones, but he is now giving up his business, and cannot give me or or his other labourers as much work as he used; so I never was so badly off as I am at this moment. I have neither a stock of potatoes for the winter, nor any prospect of being employed. My wife or family never begged yet. I may fast a night or two, rather than shame myself by begging, or interfere with that man's property or that; but, whatever way I am to get it, while any man has it, we must not starve, and God knows I have often prayed to him of late to throw work in my way, that I might not do anything I ought not to do." ("Do you expect that you will be obliged to beg this winter?") "You know I cannot starve, but I do not like to talk of begging. I am a lusty able workman, and would work for 2 d. a day rather than beg, or be idle."

Carnan remarks, "He has had fair employment hitherto, that saved his pride and kept him from begging; his spirit is not broken by his poverty yet; but when the employment is gone, he must sink as low as the rest."

Mr. Costello says, "No general terms can so accurately describe the condition of the unemployed labourers, as the statements made by these men, of their own condition; you may take these cases as an epitome of the history of one-half of the labourers of this town." Mr. Armstrong, Dr. M'Hugh, Mr. Caldwell, c. c., Mr. Moyles (who as an owner of cabins rented by labourers, is intimately acquainted with the conditions of a great number of that class,) express themselves, with the concurrence of all present, to the same effect, that these men fairly represent the condition of one-half of the labourers of the town.

The witnesses agree that, among the labourers, poverty forms no prevention to marriage, which is contracted with the most reckless indifference to the means of providing for a family. The labourers say, that the poorer the man is, the earlier he marries. Waldron, who states that he has observed this to be the case among his fellow-labourers, being asked how he would account for it, says,

"'The young man says, 'I am here under the lash of my father, and there are seven or eight children on the floor with me, and I am starving along with them, and striving to earn for them, and it is little use to strive, we are in misery together; so I will take up with some girl, and I will have a house of my own, and we will live for ourselves. The longer I am waiting, the worse I am getting.' Another man has a grown up daughter, and a long family besides, so he will think with himself, I must shift for the weak ones, I will try and get some one else to do for her, and the sooner the better. I can get no good by waiting; so she is as anxious herself as her father is, and he will do anything rather than let her turn out, perhaps on the streets; so he will promise 1*l.* with her when he cannot give a penny; and once she is off his hands, let her husband shift to support her then. The young man knows very well he has little chance of ever seeing what is promised him, but all he wants is an excuse to get married, and when both sides are so well agreed there is little trouble in settling it, so they marry without any fear of being worse off than before; for when he has no work, if he is ashamed to beg himself, the wife and the children will beg and support him; or, if he chooses to take a fling out of the country to some other part of Ireland, or to the English harvest, they will support themselves by begging till he comes back."

Mr. Armstrong (the other witnesses concurring in opinion) says, "I have observed that the condition of the labourers has been deteriorating for several years, the competition for employment having increased much more in proportion than the demand for labour; the causes of this increase are to be sought for in the circumstances of the country labourers, who crowd into the town, and by their competition reduce the town labourer to their own level. The decline of the linen trade has done much towards this deterioration, great numbers of weavers having abandoned their trade and become labourers." Carnan says, "A very plain sign that the labourers are growing worse, is, the number of cabins that used to be occupied by weavers and labourers that are now lying waste in the town; the old occupiers have left the town, ashamed to expose their poverty at home, and though a much greater number have come in from other places, they cannot afford to take a whole cabin, but take a corner of a cabin from some person that is glad to have them to help them in paying the rent."

The examinations were held in a public room, which was crowded during the greater part of the time they lasted.

MR. HUGHES has consulted with persons of all classes likely to be informed on the subject, and states as the result, that there are about 70 labourers in the parish, comprised in about 50 families, who have no holding of land whatever, and whose labour is the only means of earning a subsistence for themselves and families; but the cultivated land of the parish is occupied in divisions varying from half an acre to 10 acres, above which there are few holdings, ings, three or four acres being very common. The great body of these holders work for hire when they can find employment, and the smaller holders of 1½ acres, are scarcely in any circumstances of their condition to be distinguished from the mere labourer;* but Mr. Hughes, with the concurrence of the other witnesses, says, "Considering that spring and harvest are the only seasons in which there is any demand for labour, and that numbers are even then seeking employment who cannot find it; an average labourer, having no preference of work, cannot calculate on more than 25 days in spring, and 20 in harvest, at 8*d.* per day. His work at any other season is scarcely worth account; he often works then for his mere food." Cox says, "In winter or summer I could easily get 20 at a day's notice, to work for their food." When their stock of potatoes fails them, the general rule is, that the wives and families beg in a remote part of the country; strangers, similarly circumstanced, coming into this parish; so that at certain seasons of the year there is nearly an exchange of paupers between parishes. The men generally remain at home, and never beg, at least publicly. They mostly have neighbours or friends, who assist them occasionally with potatoes, sometimes by giving them to take home with them, oftener by inviting to partake of their own meal. When potatoes are plenty in the country I do not think they suffer much from hunger. They walk in freely at meal time, or are invited to come. The villagers are so well acquainted with each others circumstances, that they know who in the village are in distress, and often anticipate the delicacy that would prevent them from asking assistance; when potatoes are scarce, which is of frequent occurrence, many, who in ordinary seasons extend relief to others, need help themselves; and those who have a surplus of provisions, are tempted, by the high price and the numerous little wants of their families, to sell them; in such seasons, persons who have no provisions of their own (unless they go to beg in other parts of the country) must undergo dreadful privations. It is a mystery to me how they contrive

* In order to afford some idea of the proportion these very small holders bear to the other classes, the witnesses have selected three villages, which they agree present a fair specimen of the state of sub-division in the parish. Lecarrow is an instance of the largest division; the other two are instances of the opposite extreme. Mr. Hughes has read to us, from his census of the parish, the following list of the rents paid by each holder. Mr. Gillespie, under-agent on the estate on which they are situated, and other competent witnesses, confirm its correctness, and agree with Mr. Hughes in stating the average rate of rent in each. This affords a ready mode of computing the size of the several divisions, and, compared with other parts of the evidence, the proportion to the whole population of persons occasionally reduced to a state of destitution for want of employment.

Lecarrow.—The average rent in this village is 1 l. 2 s. per acre. The rents paid by the several holders 12 months ago (when Mr. Hughes' census was made) were,

Molranny.—The second village mentioned, is Molranny. It is situated near the coast, and the inhabitants fish a little, but as they have not capital to procure proper nets or boats, what they gain by fishing is not worth taking into account as a part of their support; formerly they often paid their rents by a night's fishing, but they are now reduced to be wholly dependant on their land. The rent is averaged at 30 s. for the good arable acre; some ground of inferior quality. The rents of the several holdings are as follow:

contrive to exist at all. Heveran belongs to this class, and an inquiry into his particular case may enable you to form the best general idea of the manner in which they live."

Heveran says, "I am a labourer; I have a wife and six children, too young to work. I hold a cabin and half an acre of ground, the rent of which* I expect to pay by rearing a pig and by my labour. This supplies me with potatoes for a part of the year. My wife and children always beg in summer, and I must often let them beg in winter. Some years ago I was in the habit of going to England for the harvest; I had no land then. I used to sell my pig to make up the means, and let the wife and children shift about the world for themselves, until I came home to them. It would require about 1 l. to take a man from this country to England, if he begged none on the way; but few of the persons that go from this place can gather so much; they beg on the road, but would not have it known that they do so. When I was in the habit of going there, I used generally have 4 l. or 5 l. home with me, having spent 18 or 20 weeks there. As I had no land, I had to buy from that a little store of potatoes to keep the family from begging during the winter; and when I would strive to give my wife and three or four of the children every one their share of it, a shirt or a cotton gown, and get a pair of shoes for myself, I would find it was nothing for all my wants; it would melt away from me, and I would scarcely see the good it did. Latterly I have not gone to England; I could not scrape enough together to take me there. My pig, when I have one, and whatever wages I can earn, go to make up the rent of my cabin and half an acre. While my family are away begging in summer, I stay at home myself. I get an odd day's work that keeps life in me, and fast many a day. Last summer I believe I would have starved if a shopkeeper, that occasionally employed me, had not given me from time to time 1 l. in advance for the wages I was to earn in harvest; and in this manner I eat during the summer what I depended on to pay for my little holding, and now my potatoes may be seized for the rent. I have not even a pig to help me; I could have reared one if I had it; but I had not the means of buying one all summer. I could have got a small pig for 2 s. 6 d., but how was I to get 2 s. 6 d.? The pound I tell you of that kept me from starving, I got shilling by shilling as I eat it; I never begged† myself, though I confess hunger has driven me to ask a meal from a friend. If I hit upon the right time, and went in when the potatoes were boiled, if the man of the house were a decent‡ man, he would ask me to sit down, and take part of them. But I might go to five houses and not find them boiled, and the poor man that would be buying potatoes, and not have enough for his own family, would not pretend to see me. A man would rather die than be going from house to house in that way." In reference to Mr. Hughes, witness remarks, "Mr. Hughes and the other gentlemen did not know the shame and the difficulty the poor man finds when he has to ask another for his meal, like the poor man himself that is obliged to look for it. As to clothes, I go half naked; my knees were out through my breeches until I got this patch of corduroy from my employer for charity; when another part is gone, I will strive to make out another patch; a shred of an old coat as likely as any to stitch on that again and so on, anything to keep it hanging together."

All the witnesses agreed that Heveran is an honest, sober man, and an able workman (his appearance evinces the latter), and that his condition is, perhaps, better than that of many labourers, as his plot of ground affords him a resource which many of them are without. Mr. Hughes does not reckon him among the 70, who have no holding. In them, he speaks of having no land at all. Nancy Moran says, "My husband holds an acre and a rood of land, for which he pays 1 l. 10 s. rent. This and his labour are his only means of living, and we must now give up the land, as we have fallen two years into arrear. My husband, I am sure, does not get three months' work at 6 d. a day, through the whole year; he has often worked in the idle season for his food. We have four children; he can neither clothe nor feed us, but in famishing and starvation; you need not ask about my clothes, you see them (she wore a cloak that was nothing more than a parcel of shattered woollen rags, stitched to one another, and scarcely sound enough to hold together; she said she was ashamed to open it, she would not expose herself in public); I have not purchased an article of clothes since I was married, fourteen years ago, not so much as a cap; I got a few cast-off things for charity; the only new thing was a shift a lady gave me 12 months ago; my husband has as little clothes as myself, and mostly got in the same manner; my children were all, I may say, naked, until my husband's employer, out of charity, clad two of them last week; the rest I call naked still, for their only covering is some coarse canvass we got out of old rice bags, not made into clothes, but twisted round them; it would not bear a stitch, it was rotted away before we got it; not the breadth of your hand without a hole in it. There is a free-school near enough to us, and I would be anxious to send my children to it; it would teach them something that would be of use to them, though I cannot say how; but if they could read and write, they might one day or other better their condition, but I could not send them to a public school in nakedness; we cannot thatch our cabin, and it lets the water through in wet weather; hardly a beast could live in it; it is a wonder how we were alive in it, during the last rains; we have neither bedstead nor bedding, sheet nor blanket; we lie on the ground, on straw; our only covering ing is the same sort of canvass that the children have round them by day, and very little of it; all crouching under it, on one bed. Two or three years ago, my husband was a long time lying ill of the jaundice, from cold and poverty, he took it; and I had but a wisp of straw to throw under him, and a wisp to shake over him. Though we have land, we have not now (the beginning of winter) above a month's consumption of potatoes; we could not get enough to eat last spring, much less get seed enough; during last winter, potatoes were pretty plenty, but we had not enough; my friends used to give us a few stone now and again, but often and often I and my children felt hunger; persons that have not means must want, though potatoes be ever so plenty. In summer it was harder again to get them; God only knows how we rubbed through last summer, often we went to bed, when we thought we would never leave it, from weakness and hunger, and with the cold and famishing that was going through us; I have often sat up afraid to stretch myself, I would think if I got stiffened, I would not have the strength to rise again. We often fasted for 24 hours, or lived on one quart of meal, or green cabbage boiled, without either meal or potatoes, and often one stone of potatoes has been the food of the entire family for two whole days. I never begged; I would rather fast than shame my people that were well off and decent when times were better, though they are poor to-day and badly able to help me."

* On this, Captain Stewart remarks, "In taking land and promising a rent, they never think of how they are to pay it; their only thought is to get the land, and thus secure themselves from starvation for a time."

† That is, he never carried a bag, collecting alms from door to door.

‡ The word "decent" among the peasantry includes the ideas both of liberality and of comfort.

Captain O'Donnell says, "I am confident she has not stated a word to you that is not fact; and I am of opinion that, in general, persons holding as small a quantity of land as her husband, cannot be in a much better condition; even persons holding more land are in such poverty, that they must often eat the potatoes they intended for seed; and those that struggle to plant them, spend their time at their own work in the only seasons they could earn wages."

The general food of a very large proportion * of the population, it is agreed by all the witnesses, is potatoes and salt. The sort of potato used is the "lumper," as it grows more abundantly, and requires less manure than other descriptions. Doyle says, "If it were not for the plentiful produce of this potato, the scarcity of the summer that has just passed would have been starvation; the poverty of the people is bringing it into general use; it is of a soft watery quality, and is both unwholesome and unpalatable food; pigs do not thrive on it, though it gives milk to the cows, as it approaches the nature of a turnip." Mr. Stoney, Mr. Hughes, Captain Stewart, &c. agree, "That in ordinary seasons there is one-fifth of the population who have not a sufficiency of even this food; and years of scarcity are so frequent, that they must enter largely into any calculation of the general condition of the people of this parish. The famine that prevailed here in 1831, is already notorious over the empire; this summer of 1834 has been one of great scarcity." Mr. Hughes says, "In the year 1831 a cargo of potatoes arrived in this port; on opening the hatches, the stench proceeding from them was so great, and evinced such a state of decay, that they were thrown overboard as unfit for use. The people crowded to the beach, and plunged up to their middle in the water to gather them, and the rottenness might be seen oozing through the bags in which they carried them away; numbers were taken sick from using them, and I have been told that many even of the fowl that eat them died. This was mere hunger; it occurred in the year 1831, and I cannot give you a better idea of the want that prevailed here this year (when it was not heard of beyond the parish,) than by telling you, that I am confident that numbers would have been glad to have had the same opportunity of procuring such food again. This year, 1834, therefore may be stated as another year of scarcity; and the witnesses are all anxious to impress upon us, that there is every reason to anticipate that next year will be even one of greater distress than the present. In summer, cabbage (often in its green state) boiled in plain water and chopped with salt, is commonly used to eke out the failing stock of potatoes, and, in very many instances, is the sole substitute for them." John Cornfield (a small farmer) says, "I knew, last summer (1834), in my village, a family of nine to be trusting to eight † stone of potatoes in the week; and it is not of one family, or one village, I would speak; but I am confident I knew 60 families in the same state." Gibbons says, "They plant the cabbage early in the year, that they may have it to drag out life in the summer; and what with eating it green, and having little of the potatoes to eat with it, they bring many disorders on themselves." Gibbons goes on to say, "I lived myself a good part of last summer on 'poreens' (small potatoes, from which the large ones have been picked), and green cabbage: 12 stone of potatoes in the week would be a very moderate allowance for my family; I was many weeks that I had not more than three or four for them. They should endeavour to divide them among them, and the big children should hold back to hold up the young ones. I have earned of wages all this season (harvest) but the price of a breeches, and you see I want it badly; but I fear I cannot get it, for I have nothing for the rent (he holds half an acre from another tenant), so I have a mind to give it to my landlord, and sow myself a few hundred of potatoes. The potatoes I had reserved for seed last spring, I was obliged to eat, and I begged afterwards for the seed I planted. My daughter is now and then hired for a quarter of a year with some of the more comfortable farmers, and this helps me to pay the rent ‡." Mr. Hamilton says,

* See Mr. Hughes' evidence above.

† If not stinted, they would consume upwards of three stone in the day.

‡ Doyle says, girls are commonly hired by the more comfortable farmers, for a single quarter, on some occasion of hurry, and sent back to their families when potatoes become dear and their support expensive.

says, "I have gone into the house of a farmer, holding three * acres, on a Sunday morning and found the family seated round a meal of green cabbage, having no other food; the same family, eight in number, had not two yards square of a blanket to cover them. Thomas Gallaher, labourer, says, "I live a mile from the town, and I have come in three or four mornings every week for the last three weeks, when one would think there ought to be some work for me (being the season of digging potatoes), and in that time I got but three days' work at 6*d.* I am supporting my mother, who is bedridden; I strive, now and again, to procure her some milk with her potatoes, but she must mostly eat them dry. The rest of my family have not used 6*d.* worth of milk with their potatoes for the last six months. My wife used to help me by weaving; she has no work now, and has not the means of purchasing yarn to make work for herself. I can last in the house no longer; I and my wife and two children must go out on the charity of the world, and, Heaven knows, if I could get but 4*d.* a day, I would never beg.† I am in debt for my rent too, and must give up my loom to pay for that; I know the law gives my landlord no right to seize it, but I owe it to him and he must have it, as he is but a labourer as poor as myself, that has built three cabins on his acre of ground, and sets them; he has eight children, that have not 2*s.* 6*d.* worth of clothes among them, and he has not as much potatoes as will carry him through half the year. He will soon have my own story to tell."

Those who can afford any reasonable security for the payment endeavour to relieve their temporary distress by borrowing provisions, generally at a very exorbitant rate of interest. Mr. Hamilton has known an instance (but cannot believe it to be a common one) where a person undertook to pay, in a few months, 9*d.* per stone for potatoes, that were at the time selling for 4½*d.*; if it be attempted to recover the amount by law, the barrister strikes off what he deems an overcharge; but the borrowers very seldom take advantage of this. Mr. Hughes says, "What they once promise they feel bound to perform." Mr. Hamilton says, "They must also feel, that in taking advantage of the law they would be cutting off a future resource against starvation. I have observed the greatest anxiety to repay in full whatever they undertake." It is the general impression, among the witnesses, that great numbers would gladly embrace an offer of being conveyed to America free of expense. But Mr. Stoney says, "It would be much better to enable them to emigrate a distance of a few hundred yards to the reclaimable mountain land of which this parish principally consists." (See above, Mr. Hughes' evidence.)

Mr. Hughes has observed no remarkable distinction betwen different classes in his parish, as regards the age at which they marry, except, that perhaps the very poorest must wait longer than others before they can make up the marriage fees. Persons more advanced in life, often assign it as their motive for marrying in their impoverished circumstances, that they may have children to take care of them in their old age. The Rev. Mr. Wilson, Rev. Mr. Hughes, Captain Stewart, Mr. Gillespie, and several other of the witnesses, desire to mention the prevalence of illicit distillation, as one of the less immediate effects of the people, and the absence of all modes of profitable industry. They say, that while they are in that condition, that they find it difficult to pay their rents, though they commonly live throughout the year on potatoes and salt. It must be naturally expected, that they will run any risk to make something of their crop beyond the present depressed prices of corn. This

* Mr. Hamilton says, "No persons are harder workers, in spring and harvest, than these small holders, but I must accuse them of indolence at other seasons, when they might perform many agricultural operations that would materially benefit their crops; at all seasons of the year they are very anxious to get work on hire, much more anxious to work for wages for others than to work in improving their own little holdings." Mr. Hughes says, "This is sufficiently explained by the fact of these persons not understanding a superior method to that which they now pursue; they are not sensible of the advantages that would result from an improved system and increased labour;" and one of these small holders present, says, "If we improve our holding this year, we cannot be always sure that we will have it next year." Mr. Hughes desires to illustrate the poverty of the general run of the small holders or farmers by the fact, that it is their practice to sell their oats in harvest to meet the rent, without reserving seed, which they are obliged to purchase on credit in spring at a very great advance from the price at which they sold in harvest. The landlord is generally the person who supplies them with seed in this manner, and the price is paid, with the rent, in harvest. He says, "They are scarcely ever out of debt; thus they go on from year to year rising a little from their difficulties in the good year, but sinking twice as deep in the bad year." Mr. Gillespie explains that this practice does not indicate so much distress as might on first sight appear, considering that by selling in harvest a considerable loss of weight and risk of damage is avoided, but knows that these tenants generally have not the money, which they received in harvest, to apply to the purchase of seed in spring, and are obliged to apply to the landlord to obtain it on credit.

† An incident arising out of this statement of Gallaher's, may seem to convey some idea of the state of the market for labour in this parish, when he stated his condition, and that he would probably be compelled to resort to beggary. Captain O'Donnell, who was present, desired him to apply to his steward, who should be directed to give him work at the ordinary wages. The offer was accepted with all the gratitude with which alms are commonly received, and though there were but 12 persons in the room, principally women and old men (the proceedings being nearly closed), five applications were immediately made for a similar favour; three men for themselves, and two mothers for their sons, each putting forward some ground on which they should be distinguished from ordinary applicants, or endeavouring to show that they had at least equal claims with the person who had been already so distinguished.

This chance is afforded by illicit distillation; the risk of seizure certainly renders it a gambling and desperate speculation, generally terminating in the ruin of the person engaged in it. But in their present poverty the slightest chance of an additional profit, however small, is grasped at with the utmost avidity. Although the effect of such distillation is to lead to habits of intemperance, they do not believe it is engaged in in order to indulge in these habits, but in the hope of making a precarious profit, and that if the people had any mode of profitable employment the practice would cease. Rev. Mr. Stoney and Mr. Hamilton do not agree with the other witnesses, they believe the pursuit to be congenial to the habits of the people, and that the smallest profits would induce them to continue it. Mr. Hamilton says, "That it was as common when grain was double its present price, as it is now, which one of the farmers present explains, by saying, that in consequence of the high price of spirits, the profits n distillation were proportionably greater, that the people never had employment, and never were in a condition to remove them above the temptation." Mr. Stoney and Mr. Hamilton attribute to the practice, as leading to habits of intemperance, all the riot and bloodshed and other crimes committed in the parish. Mr. Hughes, Mr. Wilson, Captain Stewart, &c. go the full length with the other gentlemen in condemning and deploring the practice. Mr. Hughes adds, that it initiates into habits of intemperance, for by it the young are led to drink, who would never have commenced if they had not the whiskey in the house with them.

They attribute to it the very worst consequences, but adhere to their original opinion, and desire to state it as one of the evils induced and continued by the poverty of the people.

The Rev. Mr. Hughes has given us the following statement, as elucidating the condition of the inhabitants of this parish; and although not strictly in the line of your inquiry, ought not to be withheld.

The mode he adopted in collecting his information, as far as numbers are concerned, was this: He apportioned the entire parish by districts, and appointed to each two men of good character and perfect local knowledge, to ascertain the several points set forth in this statement. Mr. Hughes is confident that the information may be relied on as accurate, both from its accordance with his own knowledge of the parish and his having made it understood by the persons deputed to collect it, that they should be prepared to verify it on oath.

This return was made for 1833. The total population of the parish, according to Mr. Hughes' census, is 10,553 *; the number of families is 2,041: they may be said to be all small landholders, the number that attempt to live merely by labour being very inconsiderable.

In this parish the possession of a cow is the very first ingredient in the poor man's idea of the lowest degree of comfort; without it, he may be said not to take milk throughout the year; yet there are 917 families, nearly one-half of the entire population, who have no cow.

The necessary conclusion † is, that this number live throughout the year on potatoes and salt, and occasionally a herring, and in seasons at all scarce, on a very insufficient supply of even this food. The potatoes they use are "lumpers," a soft wet description, which the poor are obliged to grow for want of means to cultivate a better or more wholesome sort. The potatoes grow plentifully on impoverished soils.

It is not to be understood that the other families have milk with their potatoes at all times, or in sufficient quantity; a great number of them use little of their own milk; most of them have it only for a part of the year, their cow being dry for the remainder; and Mr. Hughes does not believe that there are a dozen families in the parish, exclusive of the clergymen, gentry, and shopkeepers of Newport, who have as much as they would consume, were the supply unlimited, at each meal.

Of men and women of the age of 15 and upwards ‡, wanting clothes, there are 3,931; the proportions of males and females being nearly equal.

In the whole parish there are 400 feather-beds, so that supposing three persons to lie on each bed of the population of 10,553, 9,553 lie at the best on straw; from a similar calculation of the number of bedsteads, it appears that 7,070 are sleeping on the floors of damp cabins.

There is one village of 45 families, comprising 206 souls, having only 39 blankets; 16 of these families, being 84 persons, having but 7 ½ blankets among them, that is one blanket to every 12 persons; these blankets are generally nothing better than spent worn-out rags. Many have no blankets at all, but sleep on the floor, having no covering but the rags they wear by day. The villages generally, though in a state of great destitution, are not so bad as this; but many are not much better.

The only persons who are permanently employed in the parish, are weavers who have some small capital, with which they buy yarn and sell it, when woven into linen. The number employed at the time of this return, were 243.§ One boy of 14 or 15 years of age could attend a weaver, with this attendance, taking into account a day spent at market, to which he must go seven miles, and some delay which weavers having little capital experience in purchasing

* This is less by above 1,000 than the Official Return of 1831. Mr. Hughes does not think the population has diminished since, nor can he account for the difference, but he believes his own return the more correct.

† This conclusion is agreed in by all the witnesses.

‡ Every man wanting shoes, stockings, trousers, coat, waistcoat, shirt or hat, or women wanting shoes, stockings, cloak, cap, &c., being considered such.

§ There are fewer now, for since that time the trade has been further depressed.

purchasing the yarn, he requires a fortnight to produce each web, the average profit of which, having consulted with weavers, Mr. Hughes estimates at 4*s.* 6*d.*; thus yielding on the 12 working days, something less than 4½*d.* a day to be divided between the weaver and his attendant.* The weaver generally finds attendance in his own own family.

Except weaving, the agricultural employment of spring and harvest is the only employment in this parish; deducting then 2,500 for the probable number of children, too young to labour, 486 being the number of weavers and their attendants, having constant employment; 439 the actual number, as ascertained, of persons who do not work from age and infirmity; about 10 smiths, 20 tailors, and 20 shoemakers, generally employed; the remainder from the whole population, being 7,078 persons capable of labour, have no other employment than agriculture; this, even in spring and harvest, cannot afford employment to all that seek it; and it is presumed, in this country, all its operations might be dispatched in five months, three of spring and two of harvest. Thus, without making any allowance for persons unemployed in spring or harvest, it appears that 7,078† persons of ages capable of labour, are without employment seven months in the year.

The total number of acres in the parish, from a computation of its mean length and breadth, Mr. Hughes concludes to be at least 46,000; 16,000 may be pasture or arable, and 15,000 may be considered irreclaimable, the remaining 15,000 is all reclaimable mountain and bog, having almost throughout it, within from two to four feet of the surface, limestone and other gravel, found useful in reclaiming such lands from the unevenness of its surface; it affords in all parts a great facility of draining, and reclaimable mountain and bog is found to be the very best tillage land. On the estate of Lord Sligo, Mr. Hughes has seen the eighth successive crop of oats on a spot of reclaimed mountain, he never saw better. On the estate of Sir Richard O'Donnell, in this parish, there is a mountain farm of 80 acres, taken 25 years ago at the rent of 1*s.* per acre, which has for several years been let to undertenants at from 1 l. to 1 l. 5 s. an acre; most of the waste lands of the parish are of equal capabilities. "Thus," says Mr. Hughes, "the parish abounds with lands that are waste for want of labour to cultivate them, and abounds with labourers that are hungry and naked for want of land on which they may employ themselves."

By Mr. Hughes's exertions, 10 National Schools have been established in the parish; he gives us the attendance on eight of them, together with the number of children that belong to the districts in which they are situated,‡ and would attend, but are prevented by the want of clothes.

Besides these schools, there are only two others in the parish, the attendance on which may average 30 each. Thus of 3,011 children, 428 only are in attendance; though there is not one that has not a free-school within a convenient distance, a mile at most, the rest being prevented, not by want of shoes, stockings, cap, or bonnet, which are here scarcely thought of, as a part of a boy's or girl's dress, but by want of sufficient clothing to cover their nakedness, and suffer them to assemble without shocking decency. Mr. Hughes constantly urges the parents to send their children to these schools; he knows that they are not only willing, but anxious to have them educated; and, except for a few hurried weeks in spring and harvest when they can help in some light farm work, they have no inducement whatever to keep them at home. He receives for answer, what he sees himself to be true, "We cannot send them naked."

Mr. Hughes has ascertained the total rental, as paid by the occupying tenants of the parish, to be 6,972 l.; the amount leaving the parish, paid either to absentee landlords or mortgagees, 4,796 l.; the amount paid to residents of the parish, 2,176 l.

* This calculation of profits was canvassed in a very full room and agreed to by all present, including many weavers. Mr. Hamilton, who used himself to employ weavers, when the business yielded better profits; Rev. Mr. Storey, Rev. Mr. Wilson, Captain O'Donnell, and several other competent witnesses.

† This of course includes many too young to perform the work of fully grown persons, but of ages that find employment in other places.

‡ The population live mostly in villages, which affords a great facility of assigning different persons to particular districts.

Mr. WALDRON, roman-catholic rector.

LABOURERS' wages in this parish average 6*d.* a day. Hopkins says, "When I held half an acre of land, which my landlord has since required for some other purpose and taken up, I had 6*d.*, without food, allowed in my rent every day; my landlord called on me for an occasional day's work; I get 6*d.* and my food; even at this wages we cannot get six months' work through the whole year*, and such as we get is often badly paid us; sometimes the man that hires three or four of us is not able to pay us until a debt comes in to himself, and we must wait for it; often he is careless to pay us, until it comes perfectly easy to him. I have had seven payments made to me of 6*d.*, and spent as much time looking for it as I would be earning it, or worse; I have lost my shame in calling for it; I know I could summon my employer before the magistrates, and compel him to pay me, but if I did, I would lose more than I would gain, he would not call on me for seven years again. I depend for support on the con-acre; the pig pays the rent for me; this and the bit of land I can gather manure for, which I get for that year for nothing, as the owner has the benefit of the manure for the next crop, supply me with potatoes, and in a good season would give me enough throughout the year; when they fall short, I must depend on what earnings I can pick up throughout the summer. My earnings throughout the winter do not much help to pay the rent of the con-acre; they have enough to do if they buy a bit of tobacco, and a sole for my shoe, and a few rags of clothes, and pay the taxes of my con-acre, and the rent of my cabin."

The labourers pay from 14*s.* to 1*l.* 5*s.* a year for their cabins, according as they have a plot attached to them or not. The landlord undertakes to keep them thatched, but Rev. Mr. Waldon says, "They seldom fulfil this engagement; the poor man must often thatch his cabin with his own straw or potato-stalks, and very rarely one of them is found dry."

Rev. Mr. Waldron says, "The potatoes generally planted by the poorer class are what are here called 'lumpers,' which yield a more plentiful crop, and require less manure, but are a soft watery description, and very unwholesome food."

In many instances the labourer is unable to pay the rent of the con-acre, in which case the crop is auctioned, and the labourer of course left wholly dependant on casual employment. The witnesses mention several instances in which the crop being insufficient to satisfy the demand of the landlord, the labourer has been processed and decreed for the balance.

Mr. John Elwood (shopkeeper) says, he has been for several years receiving con-acre rents to the amount of 400*l.* and 500*l.* a year, and after auctioning the crop, has been obliged, as agent for another, to process for the balance; he has done it frequently; his words are, "a thousand times I have done it †."

In the little village of Cong alone, there are nearly 100 families having no land nor employment sufficient to support them, who principally depend for subsistence on the con-acre potatoes which they plant; when there is any failure of this crop, or when they are unable to "redeem it" (pay the rent, without which they cannot take the crop away), the greatest distress ensues. It is agreed, that it seldom drives them or their families to beg publicly, at least at home; but Hopkins says, "they are worse off than if they begged; but I would rather make three parts of a meal or fast two days, than see my wife and children go to another man's

* Mr. Finn stated that he had been on the previous day conversing with a farmer, who told him it was by "coaxing" he could get men to work with him, though he offered them 6*d.* per day and their food. Mr. Finn could not say what excuse they now offered, and said he did not mean to draw any inference from the fact, but thought it proper that it should be mentioned. On Mr. Finn stating this fact, Hopkins said, "Every poor man here must strive to live by having con-acre, and has work to do for himself at the same time that the farmer has work to offer him, is he to leave that work to get three or four days at 6*d.*? I would not go myself if he offered me 10*d.* a day, and beef and mutton besides. Would the man that strives to get me for 6*d.* at the season, give me 2*d.* next February?" Mr. Mullens, farmer and land-agent, who was present when Mr. Finn made the statement, and corroborated it by saying that he himself was one of the farmers that found such difficulty in procuring labourers, says, "that such always happened at a hurried season of the year." Never when the labourer was not likely to be employed for himself. All the other witnesses agree in the justness of Hopkins's explanation.

† Rev. Mr. Waldron, jun., Mr. Burke and Mr. Butler, agree that any indulgence shown to the poor is shown mostly by the middlemen and smaller proprietor, to whom they have free recourse, and who have an opportunity of being personally acquainted with their poverty. Mr. Butler says, "I have lost more by my dealings with the poor, than any of the large proprietors of the parish. They can exact the last penny by their agents, we cannot, as we know and see their deplorable condition." Molowney remarks that this rule is not without its exceptions. "There are farmers in your parish," he says, "that would not give the poor man his con-acre crop if he wanted but half a crown of his rent."

man's door. I and some of my neighbours suffered that, and I may lawfully say we were worse off than if we begged." Persons in this condition constantly receive private relief from their poor neighbours, particularly when the distress is confined to the individuals who have lost their crop from inability to pay the rent. The nature of this distress, and the manner in which relief is administered by the neighbours, may be understood from Jennings' story: He was married to an industrious woman, a dress-maker, who, he says, could earn a shilling a day. When she died, he was reduced to depend, like the rest of his class, on his labour and his con-acre; being unable to pay the rent of his last year's con-acre, the crop was seized and auctioned, to satisfy the demand; he says, "I was left without provisions; if my children dropt dead, I would not get a potato of them, as I had not the rent; I was left to depend altogether on my chance earnings. If I had three or four days' work one week, I might not have a day the next; I should make some shift to keep alive. Often I had a meal one day and had not a bit the next, and many of my sort had my story to tell. I never asked anything of my neighbours, but they were kind to me of themselves. My next door neighbour, on my right or left, would guess and know my distress, and make it known to others, and the Lord would inspire them to help me. If they thought within themselves that I was going to bed fasting, they would come in and give me a plate of potatoes; they would leave it with myself or my children, discreetly, and say nothing about it. I have done it in my time for others; though I am a shabby, poor fellow to-day, when my wife lived I was decent, and fit to appear before a congregation.

"I had plenty of potatoes, often a bit of meat, and was able and willing to help a neighbour."

The rent of the con-acre is usually paid by means of a pig. Molowney says, "Some of my neighbours, who cannot buy a pig to rear for the rent, fly off to Leinster to earn it, the moment they have planted their potatoes; some take their families with them. They must beg; and I have seen four or six in family leave home, and have but one fold of a blanket to take with them to cover them all." *

"Of the families that are left at home, some have early potatoes to support them, others must beg. I know that these labourers beg their way to Leinster, and their way home; if they did not, they would have but little of their wages. Some of my neighbours have been out since August; if they do not bring home the rent, they have no other means of support but to follow on the beggary at home for the winter, and the person they will ask relief from is the neighbour that holds a little land, and is almost as poor as themselves."

Malowney has known labourers who were unable to redeem their con-acre, and were thus left without a stock for the succeeding year, to work the ensuing spring with farmers for potatoes, and to eat one part of them while they planted the other: he says, "They fast all the summer." When questioned what he means by "fasting," he says, "I count it equal to fasting when a man and his wife and four children had to live on a quart of meal or a stone of potatoes for 24 hours, and I have known them live on that."

Hynes says, "They must often beg either here or elsewhere; they would do anything rather than beg; and before a man would take to that, you would see by his countenance that he was almost off. If you were taking your notes here in summer, you would ask us no questions; you could tell by the lankness of a man's jaws how much food he had in his house." Hopkins says, "Before a man would beg he would sell every article of furniture first, and many a man has cut his blanket in two, and sold one half for food. I sold many a little article from my own cabin last summer, and did not get half a supply from them." Butler says, "You would see the labourer in summer eating boiled cabbage and a little meal shaken through it, without a potato to eat along with it; may be the woman spent two days spinning a pound of flax, and went another day five miles to the market of Ballinasloe to sell it, and had by it but the 2*d.* that bought the meal; many a shift they make, all struggling to hold a grip of life." Hopkins says, "You would eat the boiled cabbage without the meal, when the smallest child in the house would eat all the potatoes they have along with it." †

No person can procure provision or credit that has not some visible means of repaying them. Those who get credit are mostly small landholders.

The

* Mr. Finn remarked that, as regarded blankets, he did not think the poor of their parish could be very badly off, as he himself had not long since supplied a great number with them from some money given him for that purpose by an English gentleman.

Hopkins said that he (Mr. F.) could not tell how many of these blankets had since been eaten. Mr. Finn asserted that it might have been the case.

† In reference to other parts of the inquiry, Mr. Finn expressed his doubts as to the existence of much "misery" in the parish. The Assistant Commissioners asked him, would he not call it misery that the greater part of the labourers should be obliged to live in the manner described above. He said he could scarcely credit such, and asked, would not the men in such distress come to him, could he refuse work in that condition? On putting Mr. Finn's question to Hopkins, he answered, "Suppose a man got the work, and for every day in the week, which every one here knows he cannot get for half the days, what would the wages of 6*d.* a day do for him and family, and potatoes 4*d.* per stone, as they were this summer?" Mr. Finn explained, that the labourer in this country, except in summer, did not pay out his wages for food as he received them, but had laid in a stock of con-acre potatoes, which lasted him through the winter, and often through the summer; that part of his winter wages, therefore, might be available to purchase food in summer. Hopkins said, "That is gone long since, sir: what paid the rent of the con-acre, and the rent of the cabin, and purchased his clothes?"

The provisions they get are generally potatoes; the common agreement is to pay 2 d. or 1 d. a stone advance of the present price (potatoes rating at 2½ d. and 3½ d.), or the highest price they rise to before they are paid for. Mr. Blake says, "They endeavour to pay for these provisions by selling their cattle, often by giving their labour in lieu of money; I have known them to be processed for the price of them, and the law expenses to exceed the original debt, though of all debts that is the debt they are most anxious to pay, in order to keep up their credit." Butler being asked whether he had known landholders to sell their cattle in order to pay such debts, answers, "Not only their cattle but their clothes."

Molowney says, that in the mountains of this parish, when the potatoes fail them, they bleed the cattle and eat the boiled blood, sometimes mixed with meal, but oftener without it; he has himself known the same beast to have been bled three times in one season; they never bleed their cattle for this purpose when they can procure any other food; he says, "The mere labourers would not get a potato on credit; they would gladly take credit on any terms if they could get it; they would promise anything before they would beg, what some are obliged to do, and to leave their own place in shame. They take one journey by night before they begin, that they may save the exposure."

It is very common among those labourers who go to England for the harvest, to beg their way to Dublin. Hopkins, who has himself worked in England, says, "A man determined to pay his way, should have at least 1 l. leaving home; he might travel to Dublin (about 120 miles) on 7 s.; 5 s. would pay his passage, and he ought to have the other 8 s. beyond to carry him to a place where he would find work; those that are not able to get so much or near it, must beg one way or other on the road. Those that determine on going are thinking and providing for it, perhaps for 12 months before, and many beg from their neighbours at home to make up a little money for it. I sold my pig myself, to enable me to go. I thought little of my pig when I had the good English wages before me."

Rev. Mr. Crampton says that it is common with labourers going to work to England, to apply to the gentry of the neighbourhood for assistance in making up the sum necessary for their expenses.

All the witnesses agree that a labourer can make no reserve for any purpose; being asked, "Did not a labourer spend or drink what if laid up at the end of the year would amount to a sum considerable to him?"

Hopkins answers, "The tradesman may drink, the labourer cannot, we have not that much pleasure in life."

Molowney says, "A farmer when he takes his sack of oats to market, may take a drink, but that and a pound of meat at Christmas is all the comfort he has in the year."

Being asked what class of the people were observed to marry earliest,

Hynes answers, "The poorer the man the sooner he will marry; if he has anything he will look before him, and expect money with a wife." To the question, "Does he not dread the burthen of a family, for whose support he has made no provision?" He answers,—

"They never think of it, he fancies himself rich when he has a large family; the only comfort he has is to be looking at his children when he comes home." Mr. Butler has made the same observation, and says, "They are anxious to make any change in their condition. A young man will marry a servant for the few shillings of wages she may have saved; as a drowning man will catch at a straw."*

IN the whole of this parish, containing a population of above 11,000, there is no class of independent labourers, no employers of labour. The land is cut up into so many small holdings, that Mr. Reid says, "There are scarcely a dozen farmers in the whole parish occupying as much as 10 acres of good arable land." All the witnesses agree that a man can scarcely procure 30 days' labour through the entire year, that no man can support himself without land, and that any man with a family, holding less than two acres at a moderate rent, must, at one time or other of the year, apply for support to the charity of the neighbours.

The nominal rate of wages is 6 d. and 8 d. without food; persons well able to pay for it, as the clergymen of the parish, will not get a day's labour for less; but Mr. Gibbons says, "For

"For any person that need not be ashamed to make a bargain with them, they will work for much lower wages. I knew a man having a cabin, four miles distant, come in and work last spring in this little town for 2 d. a day and his food, he was a good labourer; when I reproached his employer with taking his labour at so low a price, he boasted he could get another to work for 1½ d., and I believe he could."

It is much more common to exchange labour than to hire it, the farmers being all persons who labour themselves. The witnesses all agreed, that distress has rapidly increased of late years among the small holders.

M'Donald says, "The women can now give us no help, there is no employment for them. There is no price now for our corn, while our rents are kept up as high as ever, or when a lease drops, are even raised." Rev. Mr. Gibbons says, "It is quite common with them to sell all their oats to meet the rent in harvest, when the prices are lowest, not being able to reserve even seed, which they buy in spring at double the price at which they sold it, and often upon credit; I have myself lent them money to pay an arrear of rent, or purchase seed for their ground; the only means they had of repaying me, was to hand me over a portion of their farm, which I allowed them to redeem, deducting the rent for the intermediate time; there are two of these persons present in the room."

M'Donnell says, "A neighbour of mine, holding three acres of land, when threatened with a distress for an arrear of rent, sold a rood of his ground for five years for 40*s.* (8*s.* per annum) ready money, and now rented it from the person to whom he sold it, at 17*s.* per annum."

Mr. Gibbons says, "I know holders, paying 3*l.*, 4*l.* and 5*l.* rent, to be so destitute of clothes, as to be obliged, when going to market, to borrow a coat from one man, a trousers from another, and a waistcoat from a third; the person that looks decent in the market to-day you would take for a beggar if you met him at home, in his own rags, to-morrow."

M'Donnell says, "This day, I lent my coat to a neighbour taking his sack of oats to the market of Westport."

Rev. Mr. Gibbons says, "When I go to a village to hold a station, one man comes and confesses to me, and when he has done, goes out and lends his coat to his neighbour, that he may come in also; the very women do the same, and change not only their cloak, but their gown."

In connexion with the foregoing answers, Rev. Mr. Porter observes, "Say what you will, you cannot too highly colour the distress that prevails."

Pat M'Donnell, living in the village of Cahir, containing 42 families; mentioned by name, to the satisfaction of both the clergymen, 12 families that are obliged to apply, at one season or other of the year, to the charity of their neighbours for support.

Roger M'Donogh similarly names 10 in his village of Mooneen, containing 37 families.

James Frehill names 26 in his village of Carramone, containing 74 families, and adds, "There are many more who want assistance nearly as much as them, but shame makes them hide their poverty."

M'Evilly names 10 in his village of Benown, containing 39 families; all those named are mostly persons holding from a rood to an acre of land.

In each of the families that have been named, with the exception of some widows' families, the witnesses say, "There are men able and willing to earn their bread, if they had any one to employ them." Some of these beg throughout the year, some live on the private charity of their neighbours or relations, for four, three or two months of the year; a few get occasional assistance throughout the year; it is common with these last, when the neighbours are digging the potatoes, to apply for assistance from ridge to ridge, when they think little of helping them with a few stone. Most of the families named endeavour to have a stock of potatoes, that lasts them through the winter, which they have either from a small holding of their own or con-acre, the rent being paid by a pig. The relief they receive from their neighbours and relations, is by getting a stone or two of potatoes from one to-day and from another to-morrow.

M'Donnell says, "Many of them endeavour to live, a part of the year, without applying to their neighbours, by working on a piece of barren mountain, which they get for three years rent-free, and when reclaimed, rent at a bulk price that may be equal to 10*s.* or 15*s.* an acre."

Mr. Potter says, "That these villages may be taken, on the whole, as fair instances of the condition of the parish. The last (Benown) is a favourable instance, as it is considered comparatively comfortable; Carramone is the reverse."

Miles Joyce says, "I am a labourer; I rent an acre and a half near the little town, at 40*s.*; I have nine children, and am unable to support them, without either getting assistance from my neighbours for nothing, or borrowing from a friend, when neither of us can have much hope I ever can repay him."

Joyce is a stout, able labourer; as the other witnesses say, "He would work as much as two men."

Distress is comparatively unfelt until summer, when the potatoes run out; if the season be at all scarce, the small holders are then reduced to the greatest distress.

Gallagher says, "He knew a family this last summer (1834) to have, during three days, but one substantial meal of potatoes;" he says, "They kept life in them by picking shellfish on the strand."

Cox says, "A neighbour of mine was reduced to great distress this summer; he was forced to send his family out of the parish to beg, while himself strove to struggle on at home; I knew him to live on one meal for two days: I tell you, as he told me, and I cannot disbelieve disbelieve him, his case is too common; besides, I have reason to believe the same man lived on less in a former year."

In the failure of their potatoes these small holders are obliged to borrow meal at a great advance of price; it is borrowed in summer, the price to be paid at Christmas. M'Donogh knew meal to be selling in summer at 12*s*. per cwt., when borrowers pass their notes payable at Christmas for 17*s*. Henry Malley, a cottier, names four neighbours of his, who, at an earlier part of this summer, when meal was selling at 10*s*., undertook to pay 18*s*. certain, or the highest price it might reach in the mean time, at Christmas; he says, "They would promise any price rather than want it:" when at this advance of price, many who cannot give security for re-payment are unable to procure it. M'Donnell says, "Latterly, the small farmer cannot afford to keep over the meal, it is difficult to get it at any rate; I know many that would have promised 30*s*. this summer, but could not get the meal. Their last resource is, either to beg (Burns and Gallagher mention several instances of this) or to dig their potatoes before they are half ripe; sometimes they go the best-looking stalks on the ridge, and root out the young potatoes with their fingers, then turn back the mould that they may injure the growth as little as possible." There were several small farmers and cottiers in the room, scarcely one of whom was not pressing on us some instance of his own neighbours, who would gladly have promised 30*s*. for the meal, but could give no security for its re-payment. One of them, Michael Sweeney, says, "A neighbour of mine was distressed for provisions this year; he tried to borrow meal, and he offered to pass his note for any price, but was poor, and could give no security but his own; at length the priest gave his word for him to the miller, but when he went to the miller the meal was gone: I know that for two days he had not as much food as he ought to eat at a meal. When he was disappointed of the meal, a neighbour lent him a shilling; it was only last week he was able to pay that shilling, by cutting the grass from the sides of his potato furrow and selling it for hay; when the shilling was out, he tried the potatoes; I was with him when he was digging them, and I declare to you they were scarcely as big as hazle-nuts; it was only hunger could see them on the stalks. I do not think his case was singular at all, for I know there were people in the parish had a better right to be in want than he."

Rev. Mr. Potter, though he cannot vouch for each particular case, says, "That from what he knows of the distress that prevailed before the new crop of potatoes came in, he believes them all to be perfectly credible; and wishes to add, in order to show that this distress does not prevail for want of resources in the parish, that as much potatoes were sent in from it, for sale to Westport, in this as any ordinary summer."

Rev. Mr. Gibbons, though not present at this day's examination, told us yesterday in connexion with this subject, that the greatest anxiety prevails among his people to learn whether any changes are in progress that are likely to better their condition; in the words of one of themselves, "Is the Government doing anything for us, or will we better off next year than we are this?" They always apply to him, as he gets the only newspaper that comes into the parish. "When I can tell them the Government is thinking of them," he says, "I send them away happy and contented: this inquiry has given them great hopes. God grant that they may be not disappointed!"

In answer to a question regarding the labourers, the witnesses tell us there are none in this parish.

On further inquiry it appears, that the demand for labour is so insignificant that there is no class who are called labourers; because no class can subsist altogether on their hired labour. But though the farming of land is the only means by which a subsistence can be earned, it appears that a considerable proportion of the population of this parish hold no portion of land (however small); and in the absence of almost any demand for their labour, can scarcely be said to possess any visible means of existence.

These persons paying no rent for the spot of ground on which they build their cabins, or the coarse mountain-land on which they plant a few months' consumption of potatoes, are called by a burlesque name of "freeholders."

Feargus (bailiff to the property of which he speaks) says, "On Mr. Everard's estate there are living altogether under 200 families; 50 or 60 of these are 'freeholders' having no holdings of their own, but trespassing on this man and that. The men are as able and willing to work as any men in the country, but there is no work for them, and they must be trespassers on their neighbours.

"They take a few ridges of ground for the season from a holder, and pay him in labour. This gives them potatoes, but often not as much as they would consume in two months; they must then turn out and beg at home until summer comes, and they are believed to steal nearly as much as they beg. The tenants make great complaints of them, that they steal.

steal their cabbage and potatoes, and that their pigs (for some of them have pigs,) root up their ground. I have orders from Mr. Everard to clear them off. We cannot look to what becomes of them afterwards; but we see that when they are cleared out of one village, they go and settle down in another."

By a census of his parish made two years ago by the Rev. Mr. Lyons, it appeared, that of the 1,648 families then constituting the whole population of the parish, 371 belonged to this class.

Some of these "freeholders" are ejected tenants, others never held land. They mostly settle in some village where they have relations who permit them to build themselves cabins upon their ground, and who will be more ready than strangers to assist them on occasions of pressing distress. Very little of their subsistence is derived from their hired labour.

The witnesses are of opinion, that one of these men having no more than ordinary advantages, could not count on employment in his own parish for much more than 20 days in the year, at money wages of 6*d.* or 8*d.* a day. Besides this employment they get occasional work from the poorer farmers, for which they are paid in potatoes, the quantity given being almost discretionary with the giver; but this mode of employment seems to be regarded by the witnesses as little more than a profitable mode of dispensing the charitable assistance which, under any circumstances, would be afforded to persons in so distressed a condition.

Captain Ireland says, "If they were paid in money at the end of each week, I am confident these men would not only engage to work for 4*d.* a day, but would feel grateful for being employed. They are constantly forcing themselves on me, and making interest with my servant to have them employed, offering to work at that rate."

Deane says, "There are five men in my village, who go a distance of 50 miles into Tyrawley to seek employment in the season of potato digging, expecting to work for 3*d.* a day and their food."

Burke says, "An able man that lives near me went there this season and came back, having got but two days' work at 4*d.* a day."

These "freeholders" obtain from the poor farmers, in return for a few days' labour, a small piece of their worst land for the season.

This manured with sea-wreck, and planted with potatoes, yields them a supply of provisions for from two to six months, affording at the same time to the farmer who has given his land, the benefit of a corn crop, for which the ground is thus prepared for the succeeding year. When this supply is not sufficient to last until spring, it is eked out (necessarily with great privations) by the charity of relatives or neighbours, aided by occasional employment of the nature above stated. Their great object is to remain at home until spring, in order to plant potatoes to afford them a similar supply for the ensuing winter. By the time spring arrives they are generally destitute of all visible means of existence; but having once planted their potatoes, are free to seek a subsistence wherever and however they may devise. Some remain at home, undergoing great privations; far the greater number leave home, taking their families with them, and do not return until the potatoes are fit to be dug. These sometimes accompany their families, carrying their spades on their shoulders, seeking employment; and if unsuccessful in this, live on what their families beg. Sometimes they separate from their family, going in seach of work, generally to some part of Ireland, less frequently to England. This class, being so destitute as to be unable to procure the necessary expenses, fewer of them than of the small landholders go to seek employment in England. The labourers present think 15*s.* or 1*l.* almost indispensable to one leaving this place (the extreme west of Ireland,) for that purpose; some of them however do go. Burke says, (pointing to him,) "There is one of them that goes, and the signs are on him, he has the uniform home on him;" (he was comfortably clothed, and thus presented a contrast to every other person of his class in the room.)

Pat. Lavelle, the person alluded to, gave the following account of himself: "I have a wife and five children. Some years ago I held land, but being unable to pay the rent, lost it. I now live in a cabin that I built for myself by the way side, on Mrs. Nash's ground; I had no leave to build it; the leave was not worth asking. During the winter I support my family by potatoes, which I have planted on some coarse mountain-land that I get rent-free for the season; hitherto I have got this land from a gentleman that I was able to oblige in turn, by killing game, &c.; not every one could get it so; but the gentleman has now left the country, and I must look for it as others do next year. These potatoes have generally lasted me six months of the year; when they were out, finding no employment at home, I have gone to seek it in England or Scotland, leaving my family at home, where they must beg if they do not choose to starve. It requires nearly 1*l.* to bear my expenses; I make many shifts to raise it. This year I had a son at service, who gave it to me; last year I borrowed part of it from a neighbour, to be paid when I would return, the rest I had laid by myself. While I am eating my potatoes in the winter, I eat them sparingly, when I think that I must make that up for the summer. I undergo great hardships in going to England; nothing but the want of something to do at home drives me there. I would engage to work at home every working-day in the year for 8*l.*, without food or support of any kind, and never think of going to England."

Dominick Frehill, who is also one of the class called "freeholders," affords an instance of their general condition, and more particularly of the privations suffered by those who remain at home during summer. He says, "I am a labourer. I have no holding of land, and never had one. I have a wife and five children. My hired labour would scarcely do anything towards supporting me. A neighbour gives me a piece of coarse mountain-land for the season; I give them three or four days' work in return for it, and for three or four days more I may get as much potatoes as will plant it. The neighbours have often given me this this assistance for nothing. The return from this crop may last me, some years, three months, some years, six months, but little as it is, I must often sell part to buy something to cover me when I am naked. When these potatoes are out, I have little dependence but on the goodness of the neighbours. There is little employment to be had; a neighbour often calls on me to help him, and gives me for my work a few stone of potatoes. I oftener work in this way than for money. The neighbours, that had potatoes to spare, have often given me a few stone on credit, until I would be able to repay them in work, and when they have seen my children wanting, have sometimes given them, without asking payment in any way. When potatoes are scarce in summer, and few of the neighbours have them to spare, we must often live without them. My wife then goes through the fields and gathers some of the green weeds and boils them. We sometimes have a small share of potatoes to eat with them, but we have often lived three or four days without a potato, on the weeds alone.

"I have not had a shoe or stocking these seven years. It is easy to count all the shoes I ever bought; two or three pair, I believe; I have not bought a new coat for four years, nor trousers for five. I was three weeks in the house, I could not go out for want of clothes, and you see (showing us his clothes) whether I am fit to go out now either, for the cold or for the shame. My sister's son gave me these old breeches; I have no hat of my own, good or bad; I borrowed that old hat to come to you to-day." (Mr. Lyons says, "Yet there is not in the parish a better workman.") "I pay no rent for my cabin; I got leave from the tenants to build it for myself on a bit of the waste land; I have one pair of blankets, the whole family (seven in number) lie under them on one bed, lying heads and points; they are worn and spent now, and are the only pair I have had since I was married, 17 years ago; I get a bed of straw from any neighbour I am threshing for."

Martin Hoban affords an instance of the miserable shifts by which an able-bodied labourer, having no stock of potatoes, and unwilling, as he says, "to beg outright," is obliged to live at home during the winter.

He held a small division of land up to last year, and being asked how he now supports himself, answers, "Here is all my support (pulling a roll of pins from his pocket); when I get a few days' wages I buy these, and afterwards exchange them for potatoes through the villages; it is just a decent way of begging; a man is ashamed to beg outright, and must have some pretence, and I take this when I can make up the money for the pins, but for three parts of my time I cannot do so, and must beg. My wife and five children beg most of their time; they are not begging now; I have had three or four days' work each week since the potatoes have been digging; I have as much potatoes as may last me for a fortnight; while they last she shall not go out; when they are gone she must beg; I may not get a day's work this month again; I pay 5*s.* a year for a part of a cabin; I have not worn a shoe these five years, nor within the same time have I got any article of clothes, but one second-hand jacket, for which I paid 3*s.*"

Deane says, "The support of these 'freeholders' presses very heavily on the villagers, and as much from what they take without leave, as from what they get in charity. Among others, it is a very common complaint against them, that they do not cut turf themselves, but steal it from their neighbours; people set this down as idleness against them, as they have nothing else to do in summer, and the bog is plenty." Burke says, "They cannot cut it; most of them are away begging, when the turf should be cut in summer, and such as stay at home are not always able to cut it at that season, when provisions are scarce, as they have little of them to get; I have seen them in summer lying in the ditches with weakness, and I have seen them on the bog, when they could not throw the third sod without resting from mere hunger and weakness." Mr. Lyons says, "The habit of pilfering potatoes and cabbage, and even plucking wool from the backs of the sheep in the fields, is common; but it is induced by destitution; a constant struggle is proceeding between honesty on the one side, and hunger and nakedness on the other; the former must often yield, but it not unfrequently triumphs in a manner that, considering the temptations with which it contends, does credit to human nature."

There is another class of labourers besides these "freeholders," persons renting small divisions of land, insufficient to afford them an adequate subsistence; they are a more respectable, though it appears from the evidence, they can scarcely be called a more "comfortable" class. Their destitution arises, like that of the "freeholders," from want of employment for their labour, but is in some degree mitigated by the miserable resource which their land supplies. Mr. Lyons says, "Divisions so small as an acre, or half an acre, are very common." Burke and O'Donohoe say, "Much more common than any other; 15*s.* to 30*s.* rent is the most common run of the parish." In answer to an inquiry regarding the comparative condition of this class, and those who are called "freeholders," Burke says, "For some parts of the year I would say these landholders are in the worst condition. In this way: in the summer, when provisions are scarce, the 'freeholders' leave the country with their families and beg, and escape the hunger that falls on those that struggle on at home. No man is so desolate as the man that sticks to the house at home." Mr. Lyons concurs with Burke's observations, and says, "These landholders very seldom beg; they rank with the villagers; they take great pride in being landholders, and are so unwilling to lose caste, that they will submit to any privation short of absolute starvation rather than beg." O'Donohoe says, "There are numbers of them that fare worse, and are worse contented than those that beg from them. They are next door to beggars themselves, and one day often makes them beggars. It is customary here among landlords, when the rent is not paid, to make seizure of the provisions in harvest. If it can be found above ground or under ground, the landlords will have their own; the poor may go on the world."

On our inquiring of the witnesses whether there was any person in the room who would furnish a fair illustration of the condition of this class, Deane says, "I am one of the class myself, and you need not pass me." Brien Deane says, "I hold land for which I pay 30 s. a year; I am also a cooper; I may be employed for three months of the year. I can earn 2 s. every day I am employed, and am therefore better off than most people that are under the same rent as myself. I have been in this parish these 10 years, and my trade is getting worse every year. The people are in that poverty that they cannot afford to employ me. There are many cannot afford even to repair their wooden vessels; once they are damaged they throw them out on the dunghill, and use their one pot for every thing; they carry in the water from the well in it, they wash the potatoes in it, and they boil them in it; and many roast their potatoes, not having even a pot to boil them. I have a wife and six children. The potatoes I grow on my own ground are not sufficient for us; when my own potatoes are out, my trade generally enables me to go to the market, but there are times when I am hard pressed to make out enough in any way, we must then live on a shorter allowance; or, if I be working a day at a farmer's that has the provisions, I take one or two of the children along with me, and they get their food; anything to pass over the distress." In answer to the question, "Does your family generally use milk with their potatoes?" Deane continues, "Milk, sir! I declare solemnly before my neighbours here, that know whether I speak the truth, for eight weeks that I have been lying on my bed, having blister after blister on me, I did not drink a quart of milk, but eat potatoes and salt herring, and had no drink but cold water. A great many of us would pray to the Almighty to take us off; it would be better for us than to live on in our poverty and need." Mr. Lyons, "He speaks reasonably; and his class is numerous; even in sickness, as he tells you, their food is potatoes and salt herrings, and their only drink, water. In their condition, it is almost loving life too much, not to pray to be released from it." Deane being asked if such be his condition, "What difference his trade sets between him and others of his class, than whom he says he is better off?" answers, "I get an occasional job that gives potatoes to my family, when others sit idle and hungry at home." And Hoban says, "It keeps him in the house always, while others are obliged to beg; and may be his children are not so naked as other men's." Deane goes on to say, with the concurrence of the other witnesses, "These very small holders seldom have a sufficiency of potatoes throughout the year; during summer a great part of them live on half allowance of potatoes; they make shift to add to them by picking shell-fish along the shore, and I have known many of them to live for days on shell-fish without potatoes, and it has brought many of the young ones to their grave." Mr. Lyons says, "This, and other unwholesome food, which they are compelled to use in seasons of scarcity, makes dysentery very common amongst them. This disease is so prevalent in this parish, that when called on to attend the sick, though uninformed of the particular nature of the attack, I always take with me the medicines proper for this complaint."

Hugh O'Malley also belongs to this class of small landholders, and has no other support than his work as a common labourer; he may perhaps be a better instance of their general condition than Deane.

He says, "I have a wife and four children; I hold three-quarters of an acre of land, for which I pay 1 l. a year, taken from me in labour. This generally gives me and my family potatoes for five or six months of the year; my principal support besides this is making brooms, and selling them to the housekeepers for potatoes. I go to a mountain 10 miles distant for the heath; this takes me one day; I spend another day making them, and a third hawking them; if any one offered me money for them, I would gladly sell them all for 1 s. I would think myself well off if I could employ myself throughout the year in this manner, but there is not sufficient demand for the brooms; I cannot resort to this mode of living more than once a month. I get an occasional day's work; I have often taken 3 d. a day rather than sit idle. My wife may earn 1 ½ d. on a day she is employed to spin; but if she is employed one day, she may not be employed for a month again; she has been sickly with me during the last seven years, but can do a little at spinning when she is left by the fire, and the cold kept from her." (Mr. Lyons says her complaint is one of those that are common here, arising from the nature of the food used by the poor, which is such that I am confident if a person used to wholesome diet were reduced to subsist on it, he would not be alive in a month.) "During the past summer I had not enough, nor anything like enough of potatoes for myself and family; we lived principally on herbs gathered in the fields and shell-fish from the shores, and we would not have lived it through but father John (Mr. Lyons) helped us with a hundred weight of meal." (Burke says, "When the potatoes begin to run short with them, they use them very sparingly, and live for three days on the proper consumption of one day; they help them out by boiling a large quantity of cabbage, or wild barrage gathered in the fields, with a small quantity of potatoes.") "Bad as I was last summer, I will be worse next; my potato crop has failed this year; the cause was, that I had no money to buy proper seed, nor no means of earning it, and was obliged to use the refuse of what others planted, paying for it by labour. My crop used to last until May, now I am bare in November. I had a small patch of barley, which I sold, and have bought a month's consumption of potatoes; I do not expect any employment to support me when these are consumed, and I do not know how I am to live afterwards, but to go upon God." (Burke here remarked, "It is a miracle they are alive at all," and Malley goes on.) "Only for the good neighbours, these that have a little support to spare, and God will remember it to them, we would not be alive at all. My family never begged but twice; once for three weeks, and again for a month; but I will not be able to keep them from it this winter. I will hold the land on still though they be begging, for my rent is paid, though I could not have paid a halfpenny of it, if it was not taken from me in labour. I have not worn shoes for 10 years since; I was married, 23 years ago; I am sure I have not bought more than three pair since, I have gone without shoes. I have had no stockings but such as you see, the legs of stockings that a neighbour gives me when he has worn out the feet of them. I have not got a new coat for five years; this is an old one a neighbour gave me six months ago; you see it is nothing but rags. There is a son of mine (putting forward a half-naked boy, about 11 or 12 years old), he never wore a trousers, he never had one; this is a borrowed coat he has on him now (a man's coat, all rags, dangling and trailing about him); you see he has nothing else covering him but his shirt; that shirt is the only stitch of clothing he has of his own. In cold weather he must keep close to the house, unless he runs from one house to another, or as he gets a borrowed coat, or a sheet to roll about him, he may run from village to village. My other children are not so naked as he is; they are older, and can occasionally earn something to clothe themselves. We lie on straw that we get from some neighbour in charity; we do not change it; we do not part with it all, but as it wastes away the neighbours give us a wisp to add to it." (O'Donohoe says, "When persons of his sort cannot procure straw, they pull the rushes that grow on the sand-banks by the roots and shake the sand from them and spread them as a bed for themselves, just as they would litter pigs." Mr. Lyons says, "Their beds are in such a state from filth and vermin, that to any one accustomed to cleanliness, it is purgatory to approach them.") "All the bed-clothes we have is the single fold of a blanket and a sheet; my wife and I use the blanket, the children all lie on one bed, and have no covering but the sheet.

"There are numbers in the parish as badly or worse off than I am."

Mr. Lyons says, "That man is as fair a sample of his class as could be produced to you, or rather a favourable sample, as he is an honest fellow and well known, and liked amongst his neighbours." O'Donohoe says, "That is true; he is generous about his brooms, he throws two or three of them to a housekeeper without pressing a bargain, and when she sees him in want at another time, she does not hesitate to give him 100 or 200 potatoes."

Mr. Lyons says, "I told you that by the census I made two years ago, that of the 1,648 families composing the entire population, there were 376 belonging to the class we know by no other name than 'freeholders;' I think about one-half of the remainder are holders of land of no greater value than from 10 s. to 1 l. 10 s. a year."

This (the small landholders) is the class that most commonly goes to seek employment in England. Men having wives and children often go, but young unmarried men go more frequently. Burke says, "The men who have families must go too. They go to earn the rent, and save their provisions from the landlord. All the landlord has to look to for his rent is the crop, and he must take care of himself, though he send them to beg the world. I knew a man sell the quilt off his bed to enable him to go to England, that he might earn his rent and keep the provisions for his family. The pig is commonly sold for that purpose. The wife and children often beg while the husband is away."

It is the opinion of all the witnesses, most decidedly and unanimously expressed, that no man who could procure sufficient employment at 6 d. a day would leave this parish to seek work at the English harvest. Captain Ireland says, "Persons who do go are exposed to such hardships, that when they come home they are commonly seized with sickness, supposed to be caused by the cold they are exposed to after the heat of hard work, lying as they generally lie there in out-offices." Mr. Lyons says, "They are not only exposed to cold and fatigue, but frequently to hunger and disappointment of the employment which they seek. In the year 1831, I met that man (pointing to a man named Gibbons) in Liverpool lying on the steps of a hall door, pale and exhausted, evidently from hunger; he had gone to seek work in England, and being disappointed, had not the means of paying for his passage to Ireland. I paid their passage from funds which I possessed, applicable to that purpose, for him and 130 others, who were similarly circumstanced." Gibbons himself says, "I was six weeks away, and, as Mr. Lyons says, I was not able from what I earned to pay my passage back to Ireland; from the hardships I suffered, I never went there since, nor do I think I ever will."

As regards the clothing of the labourers, the witnesses say you may take Hoban, O'Mally and Frehill as specimens; they are without shoes or stockings, and their other clothes are mere rags, leaving them everywhere open to the weather. Frehill declares that he has no hat, that the shapeless piece of felt he holds in his hand is actually borrowed to come to us to-day, and that he has been three weeks unable to work for want of some covering against the cold.—(See his evidence.) O'Brien says, "We have told you that the beggars are naked, but it is not the beggars merely, but the persons that relieve the beggars that are naked; the old clothes that I wear on week-days I lend to my neighbours, decent people, to go to mass on Sundays." Mr. Lyons says, "When I hold a station (religious meetings, held for the purpose of confession), persons commonly request of me to let them go early, as they must lend the clothes they wear to neighbours, that they may come in turns. And when women have come to me with their persons naked, a sense of decency, as much as charity, has compelled me to give them the price of a handkerchief." Captain Ireland says, "A man living in the next house to mine has been lying ill for 18 months; he held a small division of land, and his wife and children worked hard and tilled it that they might not lose possession of it while he was lying ill. He is now sufficiently recovered to go out, but the wife and children being miserably clad could not forbear using his clothes during his illness. They have now worn them out and are unable to replace them, and she has been begging of me to-day for any article that will enable him to leave his bed. No man that has a heart can live here; if he has a family he cannot afford it; his means are dragged out of him, without his knowing how or where they are gone." Mr. Lyons says, "According to the census which I made two years ago, there were then in this parish 751 men who had no shoes, and were unable to procure them; and there were, out of a population of 9,000, 3,136 persons, male and female, who, who within five years had not purchased any important article of clothing, as a coat, a gown, &c."

The condition of the poor with regard to night-covering is quite as bad as their condition with regard to clothes. Mr. Lyons says, "According to the same census of 1,648 families, being the whole population of the parish, 388 have two blankets each, 1,011 have one blanket each, 299 families have no blankets at all. You may well be surprised at this; it surprised myself, although many years resident as parish priest. Until I made this census, I had no idea that there were families in the parish who lay without a blanket, and even when, on inquiring how many blankets they had, I was told by some persons they had none, I could scarcely believe they meant more than that they had not a sufficient supply; but I ascertained that they were literally destitute of any. This may serve to show how little the poverty of the people of this district can be understood by persons viewing it at a distance, when I, their parish priest, living among them, was unacquainted with some of its forms, until I had made the most scrutinizing personal inquiry. The people would hide their poverty even from me." Burke says, "There are families about me that have no bed-clothes; some of them often come to get a bed in my house for the night, and I know it to be common when a large family has but one blanket among them, that they should go to bed by turns, one part rising to make way for the others. If we were telling you of the poverty of this country for a week, we would have forgotten part of it after all."

Mr. Meredith, chief constable, says, "Last summer some disturbance prevailed in this parish, of persons visiting the houses of farmers at night, to compel them to sell potatoes, which they were supposed to be holding over for the purpose of realizing higher prices. In the performance of my duty, as chief constable of police, I had to make search for the offenders. Until the night that I made that search, I knew nothing of the destitution which prevailed, and which prompted to these outrages. In about 15 houses which I searched, with one exception, I found no provisons, but a few stones of potatoes carefully preserved in a corner of the same box in which the inmates kept their milk and their Sunday clothes. Their having milk and a change of clothing showed that they by no means belonged to the lowest class even of landholders. In one instance, as we were groping for the door, a policeman called my attention to a bundle of weeds which was stopping what appeared to be nothing more than a breach in the cabin wall; on removing the weeds we found this to be the only entrance, and the weeds the only means of closing it. The opening was so small that the policeman had to take off his appointments in order to creep in. I found the occupant of the cabin, the person I was in search of, lying on a miserable straw-bed; I had to take him from bed, from beside his wife, who was at the time pregnant, to be perhaps transported for an offence to which it was evident the fear of starvation had prompted him. The scene of misery I witnessed on this occasion, and others which I saw in the course of my search of that night, I shall never forget. My duty, of course, compelled me to take the offenders before the proper authorities, but the destitution of which I was an eye-witness, enabled me to make such representations as ultimately procured their release."

Though the witnesses differ as to whether the cultivation has extended of late years considerably, or contracted in this district; all (including Mr. Lyons, Captain Nugent, Captain Ireland, and Mr. O'Donnell, a resident land-owner,) agree that the condition of the poorest class of the people has decidedly deteriorated. Marriages are contracted without any forethought of the means of providing for a family. Captain Nugent says, "They marry here on the slightest chance of being able to support themselves." Mr. Lyons says, "Those who are more comfortable and somewhat educated, wait longer; but persons unacquainted with comfort do not feel the want of what they never knew. They marry if they have enough of potatoes to last them for a year." "Aye," said many present, "or half a year." Frehill says, "I married a wife, and was promised the foal in the mare's belly as a fortune; the mare quicked foal, and from that day to this, I never got as much as a noggin to hold a drop of water in by my wife, yet I never was sorry for taking her since." "Oh," said Burke, "the chance of a foal or a calf is thought a fine thing; I have known them marry on the promise of a lamb before the ewe was tupped at all, and lose it as he lost the foal."

There is no system of advancing provisions to labourers on credit.

The desire for emigration is occasionally very great among the inhabitants of this parish. If any acquaintance who has emigrated be heard of as thriving, the greatest anxiety prevails to follow him; but if one or two unfavourable accounts arrive, the subject is not thought of for a long time again. This applies to persons who can have any hope of emigrating from their own resources. The mere labourers cannot think of this; all of this class who are present agree that two-thirds of the labourers of the parish would gladly emigrate if they were furnished with the means. Burke says, "Their idea is this: they could not be worse off in any part of the world than they are here."

It is also agreed among the witnesses, that great numbers of the labourers would avail themselves of a house of industry if such existed in the parish, but no person would enter it who could support himself with any degree of comfort outside. Burke says, "From June to August it would be full, and it should be a very large one too." Hoban says, "I would go in myself with my family for one half of the year, even though I were separated from them; I would submit to the separation, provided I were certain they were not wronged any more than myself; but I would do anything to live out of it. I would take a basket on my back and carry stones in it from sunrise to sunset, if I could earn potatoes for my family, and if I could add a drop of milk to them, I would be as happy a man as any in the kingdom. I would think my separation from my wife a great hardship."

On our road from Erris (the place where the examinations were taken), we had occasion to to go into a farmer's house by the way side, when we met a man named Michael M'Cue, carrying a heavy load of wattles on his back. Our attention was attracted by the wretchedness of his appearance; and on inquiry into his circumstances, we thought them sufficiently illustrative of the consequences entailed on the labourers by the want of employment, and the general desire to follow any mode of industry in preference to begging, to deserve insertion in our report.

M'Cue's case, as stated by himself, is as follows:

"Two years ago I lived in the county of Roscommon, where I held one acre of land; my cabin was burned, and not being able to rebuild it, I was obliged to give up the land, and beg with my wife and three children. I was ashamed to beg at home, so I came into Erris, where my brother-in-law is living, and I hoped that in time I might get a piece of land, as it is so plenty, (Erris consists principally of waste lands); after I had begged for a while, I got a piece of wild mountain, which I was to have free for two years. I got it about November, without a shed on it. I and my family were still begging; it was the season of potato digging, and I went out into Tyrawley until I earned sufficient to pay two men for four days in helping me to raise a cabin, which we have lived in since. We lie upon straw; we have no bed-clothes, but throw over us by night the clothes we wear by day. We continued to beg during the first winter and spring. Of the potatoes my wife and children begged during the spring, we eat one part and planted the other on the piece of mountain. We still lived by begging until the potatoes were fit to dig; they were sufficient to support myself and family in our cabin without begging until near summer. We begged again during the summer, until our second crop of potatoes were fit to dig; between the bad ground and bad seed, our crop turned out a failure, and we have not now a potato left. I do not know how I am to get through the winter without begging. I am well able to work, but there is no employment to be had. My wife and children are begging at home now, and we must soon give up the cabin and the land, as we have got notice to pay 30*s.* rent, now that it is partially reclaimed; we cannot do this, and must quit. I was to have gone out and begged with my family the next morning, when my brother-in-law lent me 2*s.* and advised me to go to Crossmolina for a back-load of wattles, for making flails, and to carry them to Erris, and sell them for potatoes. We will use all the potatoes I get for them, and my brother-in-law, who has a small farm of mountain land, will allow me to repay him the 2*s.* in work next summer. I will have travelled, when I get home, about 60 miles for these wattles. I paid the 2*s.* for them, and if any one offered me money for them when I get home, I would give them for 3*s.* I have been three days on the road. When I was leaving home I had no money with me beside the 2*s.*, but 3*d.* which I got for three back-load of turf, which I carried into the town of Belmullet. I intended that to pay for my lodging and potatoes for the first night; I expected to reach home on the second night, and thought I might get a potato in some house by the way. I left Crossmolina without eating anything in the morning; I came halfway without breaking my fast, and found that from weakness I would not be able to reach home that night. It is a wild country, and I do not know what would have become of me, if I had not met a man that knew me formerly, who took me to his house for the night; when I entered the house I fainted from hunger, for I had not tasted food from the night before; he lodged me and gave me food; I left him this morning. I am now within six miles of home. I came in here to warm myself, and in hopes of getting a few potatoes.

"When we have eaten the few potatoes I get for these wattles, I know no means that will enable us to live without begging. If any one took me into his house, I would be glad to work for him all the winter, if he but gave me my food and kept me from begging. I would let the family beg for themselves. My two next-door neighbours would do quite as much to earn 1*s.* as I have done."

We may here mention, that desiring to authenticate, as far as possible, any evidence we might report, and finding that the house at which M'Cue said he was lodged lay in our road, we afterwards called as we passed, and found the statement he made us, to coincide exactly with the facts which occurred, and the account he gave of himself there. The woman of the house, Mrs. Hastings, said, "On that spot he dropped, as he entered the house; when he came to himself, he told us he had not eaten a bit that day. We gave him food and lodging, as he seemed a decent poor creature; he had nothing to give us for them, but offered us some of the wattles he was carrying; of course we would not take them."

We also inquired of John M'Donnell, the farmer, at whose house we met him (he, M'Donnell, being present at the statement, and appearing to be a trust-worthy person,) whether he thought we might rely on the facts he had stated as true. M'Donnell answered, "I cannot be certain that he has not added something when he sees you taking notes of what he says, but if he told the same to myself, I would never doubt him, because I know his case to be a very common one. There is a man of the name of Swift, from the same neighbourhood with M'Cue, a cousin of my wife, that was stopping with me for a few weeks, a short time ago, and has just as bad a story to tell as M'Cue has told you. I will tell you how that man is striving to live this year. He has a wife and four children; he rented for one season a few ridges of potato ground, which he planted, and was to pay the rent before he would take away the crop. Coming on the season for digging them, he could find no employment where he lives (in Erris), that would enable him to release the potatoes, though the whole rent was only 5*s.* 6*d.*, so he left his wife and children with a friend, that took compassion on them, and set out for Tyrawley (a district about 35 miles distant), to try and scrape so much together. My house was six miles on the way for him, so he stopped with me the first night; he left home without a halfpenny in his pocket, nor I believe

I believe able to get it, though he were to die for want of it, but just with the expectation of falling into some houses, where he might get his lodging and a share of their meal for nothing. He first went to a place about 30 miles distant, but they had so many hands at home there that he could not get above 3*d.* a day; he then came back, and brought his wife and family to my place. While he was remaining with me, he heard a rumour of labourers getting 4½*d.* a day in another part of the country, about 40 miles distant; he left his wife and family with me and set out for the place; after five weeks he returned, and brought just the 5*s.* 6*d.*, the rent of the potatoes with him. He was not able to leave me for three days, he hurried so much, and treated himself so badly on the road, loath to part with a halfpenny of the rent, and he behaved well to have it home with him, and to get home as soon as he did; if he had been much later, he would never have eaten a potato of them, for they were canted (auctioned) for the rent the day before he arrived, but he managed to redeem them from the man that bought them. I saw him since, and he was planning with me how he would live for the winter, He said, the potatoes would be sufficient for a part of the family for a few months. He will send his wife and the strong children to beg, away from home, in Tyrawley; he will keep the weak ones at home with himself, while his potatoes last, and he is earning a little to add to them for seed for next year. Then in spring, when he has his potatoes planted, he will wander about, earning and begging, as they come across him, till the potatoes and the winter come in again.

"He spent a fortnight with myself of late, helping me to build this house. He is a generous poor fellow, and would not charge me for his labour, as he had no earning to get at home, but I promised to give him a basket of potatoes in spring, when he will want them for seed.

"I am told he is earning something at home now; he is threshing oats, and is paid in straw, with part of which he will thatch his cabin, the rest will make manure, that will help his potato crop next year."

IN the town and suburbs of Boyle, there are 188 resident labourers, out of whom only 11 are in constant employment. The labourers are frequently, during the summer months, reduced to one meal a day, and "that," said O'Brien, "of dry potatoes and no milk."

When the husbands go to England for work, the wives and families go into some distant part of the country to beg; from one to two dozen families do so. The rising population is thus habituated to mendicancy. In some rare instances the women and girls are driven to prostitution; women with families are never abandoned by their husbands owing to distress; there are, in a few cases, other motives which may produce this result.

Mr. Lloyd stated, that he once saw a man cutting a large hole in the side of the road, which he said he was doing to obtain manure. "If you persist, I shall be compelled to send you to gaol." "Indeed then, your honour, I should be extremely obliged to you if you would." It is not uncommon, said Mr. Crofton, to hear the poor jesting upon their having such a last resort, but the instances where it is put in practice are exceedingly rare.

Potato pits, in scarce seasons, have been known to be broken open, but dishonesty is not fairly chargeable upon any class of the poor, except the hardened beggars; starvation is, generally speaking, not heard of.

KENNEY says, "I am not out of work at present; but we are out of work all the year through, for all the good it does us." During the periods when they are out of work, they must sell the egg to buy the salt.

There are no instances in this parish of women being abandoned by their husbands. There are five months in the year, May, June, November, December, and January, during which there is no work at all; hundreds would be glad to work at those periods for 5*d.* a day, without diet.

Credit is a most common and a most ruinous system. Every advantage is taken of the wants and necessities of the poor man; and when the potatoes are out in summer, and his wife and children look in his face for food, he will promise anything to whoever will give him trust. Coniton mentions his own case: "In last June I got one cwt. of meal; I promised to pay 16*s.* at October for it. The price of the best meal in the market at the time was 8*s.* 6*d.* a cwt. I know twenty men in my own parish who bought at the same rate."

To the question, Could a labouring man lay by against the time of scarcity of work?

Mr. Elliot answered, "From an extensive experience, I feel perfectly confident in saying, that wages or profits of the immense majority of the agricultural population are wholly inadequate for the supply of their present wants, and consequently insufficient for any purpose of saving. A respectable man in my own neighbourhood has a horse and two cows, and, to use the phrase of the people, 'has not a coat to his back;' and he is a man, compared with hundreds of heads of families in the district, considered well to do, and a hard-working fellow."

Matthew Kelly stated that he was reared a weaver; has a loom still, but can obtain hardly any work.

"About 18 years ago could earn 2*s.* or 2*s.* 6*d.* a day, every day in the year, by weaving linen or woollens: I had those wages for five or six years. From that to this it went down ahead. Knows men who formerly had looms in the parish; there are now about 25, and they are all of them old men who can turn their hands to nothing else. Eightpence is the most I have been able to turn any day these ten years. No flannels or friezes made now at all, since the rise of the price of wool during the last two years; very little linen made now for sale out of the parish. If it was not for what is wove for private people, the looms that are yet in it might go, like the rest, for firing. There is no flax sown in this neighbourhood now, except what is necessary for home use. Thinks there may be three months' work still for the 25 weavers, at 8*d.* a day; but they are fallen short of their speed, and each requires the assistance of a man or boy, and you must take his share out of the poor old man's wages. The linen season is from May till August. The time was when I never wanted milk for myself or my family; I have not been able to have it, except once or twice, since last May twelvemonth, and I know that the third cow is not in many a village now."

A CARPENTER who lives in a neighbouring parish, and is a fair specimen of a considerable class, formerly had full work without leaving his house to look for it; now can get little or no work to do. Through the decline of business, he has not got six weeks' work, putting all the odd days together, since November last. It is Friday now, instead of Christmas-day. He had meat twice a week then; he does have none now: a sup of milk would, in these times, be doing well. The decent family who are in real misery, and suffering hard from privation, feel a spirit in themselves that keeps them from asking charity. The beggar goes to every one; but the poor housekeeper will not go to any one but the kind, and this is a thinly-peopled part of the country. My wife has sent during the last year assistance (chiefly meal and potatoes) to widows and the families of con-acre men, none of whom ever asked me for help, and none of whom, I believe, could, during the scarce time of the year, have prolonged existence without relief.

Parish Moore. Bar. Moycarnon.

When they purchase meal and are given long credit, they generally engage to pay 2*s*. 6*d*. more than the market price at the time. Being continually in debt makes a man heedless; it beats down his spirit, and would cause him gladly to embrace the opportunity of going into the institution for the parish.—(Murray.)——Patrick Mitchell, a beggarman, says, "I am 40 years of age, and have a wife and two children; I support myself and them, and also my wife's sister, who is blind and foolish, by begging, and by collecting rags and selling them. I sometimes give tape and pins in exchange; but I can never obtain as much for what I collect in a day as would buy myself alone enough of food to keep the life in me. My wife begs, and the people seldom refuse when they see the poor object that she leads about with her. We get more one day than we would get another; sometimes, of a wet day, we would get little or nothing, and other days we get a stone of potatoes: may be, we would not get 2 d. in a whole fortnight. It is only when a man is coming home from a good market that he would chance to give a trifle of money to a poor person. When we go beg at a gentleman's house, it is always the wife that asks relief, and the answer is frequently, 'Go from the door, woman! what do you want here? why do you annoy us in this manner?' The farmers are kindlier by far; it is the humble sort, that live on the road-side, that are really good to us; but half the gentry, God help them! have no Christianity in them at all.

"My father was a pensioner; while he lived, we had a sort of comfort. After my father died, I married, that I might have somebody near me to hand me a cup of cold water when I would be in sickness or grief: my wife left her service to marry me. Neither of us had either land or money, so we were forced to shift about from place to place, I selling rags and she begging. When the wife's mother died, we took charge of the sister; and the people compassionate her so much, that she helps the family to live and take care of her."

As an illustration of the want of accurate information amongst the poor classes upon subjects the most intimately connected with their wants, and as an instance of the numberless vexations and disappointments every effort they make to relieve themselves is attended with, the following observation is given:—"In the month of July 1833, I passed on the road upwards of 200 men, going from the county of Mayo to England for harvest work. When I was returning from Athlone in the evening, I met the people again; they were engaged in debating whether they should proceed on their journey or return home. In a short time they unanimously determined to go back, in consequence of some vague report that had been carried by a few ignorant men, who probably believed all they told, that the cholera was depopulating England, and that it would be madness to venture onwards. For my part, I did not give full credit to the story at the time, and I suppose they think now that they were misinformed; but there was no way for the mistake to be corrected then. We never see as much as a newspaper here, except an old one that may be obtained from the servants of the gentry, and there are only a few of those in the neighbourhood."—(T. Macnamara.)

HUGH GRAY, farmer, says, "The periods of the year at which a portion of the labourers are without work, are from December to March; in June, July, and part of August. For six months the labourers do not get more than three days' work in the week, and during the remaining six months they get scarcely any employment. Every man has a plot of ground, or con-acre. Some get as much ground as they can manure; but they have no mode of getting manure but by purchasing the sea-weed from those poor people who rent the right of collecting it with their farms: they pay 1 l. 10 s. for as much as will manure half an acre."

The poorer people are, the earlier they marry; generally, they are from 20 to 22, and often younger. Those who have anything will not marry without some fortune equal to their own means: often people go to be married and have not the marriage-money. A great cause of early marriages amongst the farmers is, that when a man gets in arrear he will give up the farm to his son, if he can get a girl in marriage who has saved a few pounds, and thus he will get out of the temporary difficulty.

O'KEAN, parish priest.—ROBERT ORR, farmer.—MICHAEL PRICE, labourer.

THE periods of the year at which the labourers are almost entirely unemployed, are June and July, the time between sowing and reaping; and December, January and February, from the digging of the potatoes to the beginning of the spring work. John Scanlan says, "I live in a village in which there are 19 farmers. There are 23 families besides, who have no ground, and are depending on the wages they can get from us. We cannot give them more than four weeks work in the year; they strive to have some con-acre besides."

To the question, whether when out of work they subsisted by begging? He answered, "It is a general custom, every man must at some time expect it." John Scanlan said, "I have a brother who lived next door to me; he had seven in family besides himself and wife; he left the place, as he was loath to beg in his own country; he is now at work in a distant part of the country, and his family are begging." Dr. Longheed said, "I knew that man." Another man said, "I was last winter at work till Christmas for 6*d.* a day, without meat or drink. I took sick then of a pleurisy, from hard work and cold. I was seven weeks, and I did not do a turn of work. I am rejected upon that work now, though I am well, as they do not think me strong enough, and there are many stronger men to be had. I had a son 22 years old, he died last September; he got sick while turning out clay in a basket on his back to manure a bog; but that we are all doing." And Dr. Longheed adds, "I attended that man, and am sure he died of hardship, bad food and cold. I knew he could not live the moment I saw him, as his frame was worn out with exhaustion." Mr. Cogan says, "Turning out clay on men's backs is a general thing here; not that the bog is too soft, but because they have neither horses nor asses to do it with." The same man further states, "I have about 20 perches of land and a house for 3*l.* a year. I had a lock of oats on it this year, which produced 23*s.*" What did you do with the money? "I buried my son with it. I have a rood and 17 perches of con-acre; for it I am to pay 3*l.* 2*s.* I will not get the potatoes out of it till I can pay the money. I have a daughter at service. I expect to get 1*l.* from her, and may be earn something myself. I will get as much of the potatoes to live on during the winter as I can pay for, and would perhaps get some one to join me in a note, and will thus perhaps get the entire. I will pay the whole by next spring work if I can; if not, I must leave some unpaid. We paid the con-acre rent last year by labour, and I was so supported while I was sick; but my boy is now dead, and I have no help. I would be glad to work for my food rather than be idle."

Some get credit when their own provisions are run out. James Davy says, "If a man can get a sufficient mark to join him in a note, they will give him credit; if not, he may starve. If the meal is in the market 10*s.* a cwt., they charge 15*s.* I paid 8*s.* advance for three months' credit."

The most destitute are the most reckless in contracting marriages. Dr. Longheed says, "Certainly they are; to my own knowledge very young couples in this neighbourhood often marry, under a belief that nothing can render their situation worse. I frequently attempt to show them the folly of their conduct; but their general answer is, either that they trust in God, or that they can but go out; by which they mean, that they can but beg."

FROM the 1st of November to the 1st of March, two-thirds of the labouring classes get nothing to do; and from the middle of July to the middle of August, there is very little employment. Putting all the days together that the generality of the labourers get work, they would not make five months.—(M. Fenny, labourer.)

In general, the working classes do not at first beg publicly, but go among their neighbours, borrow, pledge their clothes, and get credit. They often go to America, and either send for their families, or send them money to support them out of their earnings.—(James Mullen, labourer.)

John Fenny, labourer, says, "I am a weaver, and had some ground; I was turned out of it, though no more in arrear than many who remained; but my landlord wished to enlarge his grass land and demesne. My house was thrown down, and I am now living in a house eight feet square, which I built for an ass. I am not strong enough to do heavy out-door work, and got but 9*s.* by my trade since May last. When I was turned out I had 34 perches perches of ground for 11*s.* rent. I got 1*l.* for my house, and 3*l. for the manured soil of last year. I have eight in family, none of whom can earn anything; they are all living with me in the ass's stable, which I have got notice to quit. The house will be thrown down at the 1st of November. I have potatoes enough to do me until after Christmas. I do not know what to do after that. If God does not give me some help, I have nothing for it but to go and beg. There are over 200 put out, and the most of them are as badly off as I am; many of them have put up sheds in the old walls, and live there."

"There are no instances of the poor committing outrages to save themselves from starving, as starvation never occurs except in seasons when there is a total failure of the potato crop, but at all other times the beggar can get enough of food for his support.

"The poor householders, who are too proud to beg, are invariably considered the most wretched class."—(P. Fenny, farmer.)

James Mullen, labourer, says, "I got credit for potatoes for 1*s.* a peck, when they were sold for 8*d.* in the market; they are often as much more as the market price, but mostly one-fourth. It is also usual to give credit, on condition of paying the highest price the article may rise to during that season."

There are some instances, but they are very rare, of proprietors of estates who, in scarce seasons, employ more than a sufficient number of labourers, with the view of relieving distress.

John Fenny, labourer, says, "It is quite impossible for the working man or cottier tenant to lay by anything out of their earnings for a time of sickness or want, and the trifle some lay by for scarce seasons, is by stinting themselves in food."

The most destitute of the lower classes are always the first to marry. Those who are more comfortable will not marry without a fortune. When marrying, they do not calculate on being supported by their children in their old age, but think they may be a help in that way.

THE periods of the year at which almost the entire of the labourers are out of work, are June, July, and part of August, and December, January and February; "and in fact," the people said, "there is not a single month in the year of constant work, as every man does his own work himself, in order to avoid employing any one." One man said, "I could get 100 men this day to work for me at 4*d.* a day and food;" and Mr. Hyleas said, "I could get 500."

When out of work, their families subsist by begging, and at some seasons live on weeds; but no one present could remember more than three years of this distress.

There are not many instances of persons being driven to commit robberies to relieve themselves from destitution. Some years ago, at a time of very great distress, there were robberies of provisions, and certainly from hunger solely.

It invariably happens that the most destitute marry earliest. Those who have any property are more cautious, and, as the people said, "they mind themselves, and will not marry without a fortune."

Farmers' boys often marry at 18, and have no more than the marriage-money, and often borrow even that. The roman-catholic clergyman said, "I often speak to them about the foolishness of marrying, and they say they cannot be worse than they are, and threaten to go to a 'tackem;' when it comes to that, nothing will deter them."

A GREAT number are out of employment from December to March; this, in the country, is not the worst time, as the greater number have a stock of potatoes; but labourers in the town are then very wretched. Mr. Martin, M. P., said, "The want of employment in the town is caused in some measure by the great influx of persons from the country." Of the state of the labourers during the unemployed season, R. Henry said, "During the winter quarter, half the labourers get very little work; I get then about two days in the week; but for

for the last three weeks I got only three days, at 1*s.* a day. We often have but one meal, and must be content with whatever we can get; last summer I did not taste food some weeks oftener than five times." He further says, "I have a wife and three children; from November to August I was sick; I caught cold while working in a store; I pledged every piece of clothing I had, and sold every piece of furniture; when all was expended, my sister assisted me, and my family went to our friends and neighbours, who used to give us a basket of potatoes; I have now only a wisp of straw to lie on." There seems to be no forethought whatsoever made use of in the contracting of marriages amongst the most destitute. James Rafferty said, "I was married at 19, and had not 6*d.*; even the marriage-money, that my wife's people gave us." Those who have something are much more careful; for if a man have something, he will be looking for a fortune to match "what he has himself." There was a difference of opinion as to whether it was an advantage for a man to marry early or not; the greater number seemed to be in favour of early marriages, even without any provision being made for the burthen of a family. Frank Kennet said, "I was employed when I married, but had nothing spared; what I earned in the day, I spent at night. At the time of the linen trade a wife was of great service, because then a woman could earn more than a man; but since then, marriage is poverty." Here a number of persons said, "They never saw a case in which a careful man and woman could not be better off married than single; in the country children can be useful to a man." Rev. Mr. Armstrong said, "A wife is of great use to a man; she will prepare his food, make his shirt, stockings, &c.; if he have not a wife, he must have some one else to do those things." And Dr. Kenny said, "I think early marriages are most useful here; a man looks forward to be supported in age by his family, and thus often says, 'If God give us a family, they will support us when we are beyond work.' If a man marry at the age of 35, he will be broken down and unable to work before his children can be grown enough to support him, as a boy seldom gets more than half a man's hire till 18; but when a man marries young, his children will be able to support him before he is beyond his labour."

FROM December to February, and during the months of June and July, there ceases to be any employment, even for the able-bodied and willing labourer; at those periods he is often reduced to a single meal in the course of the day. Some are enabled to meet the difficulty better who possess a small portion of ground, and have contrived to reserve a supply of potatoes. There exists no fund to which they can have recourse.

Begging they appeal to with the greatest reluctance, and always in secret; yet they have hardly any other alternative: as their distress is to a certain degree but temporary, it rarely has the effect of inducing prostitution in the women of their families. There are one two instances, however, where men, under the pressure of distress, have abandoned their families, and not since been heard of. Their families now are confirmed mendicants.

The petty robberies of potatoes which frequently are committed, arise altogether from destitution and want, not from immoral feeling, and never to procure their being sent to prison for food. Outrages against the person, caused by starvation, are unknown.

Formerly those who were out of work found persons who supplied them on credit with food and other necessaries, and made large profits from the high prices at which they sold each article, always higher than the market price. At present the difficulty of procuring employment is so great, that even this dubious advantage no longer exists. Few are so fortunate as to have work four days in the week, at 8*d.* or 10*d.* a day, without diet, or 6*d.* a day, with two meals of potatoes.

Nothing but the general prevalence of great scarcity and distress has ever moved the gentry to employ more labourers than they stood in need of; through charitable motives, such a thing has never occurred on absentee property. Mr. Lenon has occasionally done so at a positive loss to himself. No kind of labour-rate has ever been in operation. The poorer a person is, the earlier is he observed to marry. Mr. Lenon knows a young couple, each under 20 years of age, who got married about two months ago, though totally destitute of an abode or any means of subsistence. Mr. Kinsela considers that the proneness to marry is in proportion to the destitution of the parties, as they feel that no step can plunge them much deeper in misery and want; they are, therefore, reckless of whatever consequences they may bring on themselves or their offspring. This opinion is much confirmed by the decidedly greater caution and hesitation evinced by those whose circumstances are easy previous to their entering into the marriage state; they feel that they have what suffices for their own wants, and if they possess no more, they are slow and unwilling to diminish what falls to their share.

THE seasons when the labourers are out of employment are, the month of December and from the beginning of June to the end of August. There is never more than one-third of the labourers in constant employment, and in the unemployed season there are at least 500 out of work, many of whom do not get two days of it in the month. Dr. Nolan says, "I know an able-bodied labourer who for six weeks was confined from want of clothes, though there was work to be had at the time, during which period every article of clothing he had was pawned." Lynch says, "I think the able-bodied never resort to begging when they can get food; as an instance, I had some employed last week up to the armpits in water; they were so anxious to work, that my feelings would not allow me to discharge them, though I had no work for them; I desired another person to discharge them." A labourer of 50 years of age can scarcely get a day's work. During these periods they have sometimes only one meal a day. Byrne says, "I know a man of the name of Lawrence Brennan, who for six weeks past has but one meal a day, and scarcely that same, and this is very common. In the mean time the wife and children are obliged to beg; they must either do that or worse." Byrne and Kenna state, "Every morning during the half hour we are at our breakfasts, there are five or six persons at our door looking for food." By these means whole families have become mendicants, and continued so for life, except in a few cases, where the boys enlisted, there being an objection to employ them when known to beg for any length of time. In this parish there are no instances of the husband deserting the family on account of destitution; but in an adjoining parish one instance was told by Byrne to have occurred: a man deserted his family, a wife and four children, about four years ago; he could not get employment, and could not bear to see them starving around him; he had been industrious; the family became beggars.

They do not commit offences for the purpose of being sent to gaol, where they would get food; they prefer begging. But Mr. Butler states, he has heard a woman exclaim from the dock, when acquitted, "she would rather go back to prison, as she had no means of support."

Mr. Jackson knows instances of four females coming out of prison who were sheltered, and work provided for them by a society of ladies; but one by one they left it, and the patronesses were obliged to give up the establishment. The poor have been known to attack bakers' shops, and boats with provisions, in times of great scarcity and distress.

Half the petty thefts are from distress. "Many," says Mr. Butler, "have been brought before me, as a magistrate, under such circumstances. It is to us all a matter of wonder how they bear their situation with half the patience they do." Kenna states, there were five stone of potatoes stolen from him to-day; five barrels of potatoes have been taken from the same cause in one night; and Kenna observes, "My cow has been often milked in the night to rear the children."

Byrne and Kenna say, "If, under such circumstances, they took half what we possess in the world, we would not prosecute." They have not committed outrages, though left most destitute. All the witnesses agreed, that without doubt the amount of evil thus created and propagated was greater than any that would arise from giving them a direct support.

They get credit in town from hucksters, and from millers and farmers in the country, frequently at an advance of 50 per cent. on oatmeal, thus being kept in debt and rendered reckless. "We have known," says Kenna and Byrne, "five or six under such circumstances sent to gaol, their wives and children begging, and themselves, when liberated, destitute and reckless."

There never was a labour-rate in operation in the parish. Mr. Butler knew one instance of a landed proprietor employing more labourers than he required actually; but, on the contrary, Lynch, Byrne and Kenna say, if the landed proprietors had one more than they wanted, they would discharge him. All the witnesses agree that a labourer's wages will not enable him to lay up a provision for the time when work is not to be had.

The poorest class marries earliest. If they waited for means to support a family they could never marry; the more wretched they are, the more inclined to marry; even the beggars intermarry among themselves.

IN December, February, March, June and July, a portion of the working classes are out of employment in the parish of Wells.

The Rev. Mr. Kehoe states, "Fifty men applied to me last summer for characters and recommendations to obtain work, only 10 of whom were successful; their wages were 10*d.* per diem; and they were forced to walk five miles each morning to their work, and the same distance returning."

John Homan observes, "I have known several cases of labourers, when out of employment, who, with their families, were reduced to one scanty meal of potatoes and salt in the 24 hours."

Mr. Dowling says, "In seasons of scarcity, I have had to direct a servant to prevent the wives of labourers from plucking a weed, called 'pressagh,' which grows amongst the corn, and which they used to boil as a vegetable, and live on, rather than submit to the disgrace of begging."

The Rev. Mr. Kehoe, Rev. Mr. M'Mahon and Mr. Dowling, all agree, "that at particular seasons of scarcity, when the poorer classes are obliged to eat this weed, their skin is observed to assume a yellow colour, resembling that of the weed."

When the labourers are for a time out of employment, their wives and families beg for food, and often the females are driven to prostitution by their poverty. John Homan says, "I know a dozen instances of girls who were thus driven to prostitution."

Messrs. O'Neill, Dowling, &c., say, "they know many instances of labourers out of employment threatening to commit trifling offences, that they may be sent to gaol, if they could not procure some food for their wives and families."

All agree in thinking that it would be much better for the morals of the working classes, that there should be some regular relief for them when sick or out of employment.

Formerly, the working classes used to get credit for provisions, when out of work; but latterly they do not, from the dread of their being unable to pay for them.

John Homan says, "he has known several instances where notes of hand have been given for 1*l.*, when the market price was 15*s.*"

Mr. Dowling observes, that the labourers think themselves a wretched neglected class.

The inclination for early marriages is in proportion to their wretchedness amongst the working classes; the poorer the grade, the earlier they marry; the more comfortable are less prone to marry early.

In elucidation, the Rev. Mr. Kehoe states, "that in Old Leighlin, the poorest district in his union, the greatest number of marriages take place; that in many instances they had not a pair of blankets, a skillet to boil potatoes in, or beyond one meal in reserve for the following morning. In one instance the bridegroom told him he had only 2½*d.* to buy his wedding feast, consisting of potatoes and a few herrings."

THERE are two periods of the year at which the great body of the labourers of the parish are nearly altogether thrown out of employment: viz. from the 1st of December until the 20th of February; and in summer from the 1st of July till the 15th of August. "At these times," says Mr. Galavin, "were it not for the assistance of their friends and neighbours, they would often be reduced to one meal a day: even this degree of want is endured by some;" and Dr. Wilcocks has known three or four instances of it. There exists no fund to which they can appeal for assistance, and the consequence is, that in many instances their wives wives and children have recourse to begging in order to find subsistence. They never beg in their own neighbourhood, but always at a distance; whilst people in similar circumstances resort to St. Mullins from other places. Prostitution, however, has not at any time been observed as a result of a state of destitution; nor have men been known to desert their families, though suffering under the most extreme want. "A man," observes Dr. Wilcocks, "who left his wife and four children in the adjoining barony of Borris, and who was thought to have absconded altogether, returned lately, after an absence of two months, during which, it appears, he had been successful in finding employment elsewhere."

No one has ever been known to have committed a crime for the mere purpose of being sent to gaol for subsistence; but instances are not wanting where great distress has driven poor people to steal potatoes and other provisions. Dr. Wilcocks is induced, from what he has heard, to think the practice very frequent; and the Rev. Mr. Saunders states, "I have at the present moment a man in my employment who robbed me of potatoes, four or five years ago, when labouring under sheer privation, for which reason I did not prosecute him." Outrages on the person, however, have never been traced to necessity.

When labourers are out of employment, they very frequently supply their immediate wants by getting provisions on credit, which they obtain by binding themselves to pay more for them than the market price at the time of the transaction. The usual difference is ½ d. in the stone of potatoes, and about 2 s. 6 d. in the cwt. of meal. In the country the lenders of potatoes are generally the masters of the labourers; but meal it is customary to procure from the hucksters on the security of their employers. The debt in which the working man must necessarily involve himself under these circumstances is not so ruinous as might be supposed, as he has in most instances a pig, which enables him to discharge it; but he never could do so out of his wages.

Mr. Kavenagh is the only gentleman who employs more men than he requires, through a desire of relieving distress; this he does to the extent of nearly twenty workmen. A labourrate has never been in operation. The ordinary rate of wages in the parish is 10 d. a day without diet, or 6 d. a day with two meals of potatoes; in harvest time, and when potatoes are being dug, 8 d., also with diet. The average number of days, according to Mr. Whitney, that a man is employed during the week, does not exceed four. It is unnecessary to add, that from these moderate earnings no man who has a family can lay by anything.

FROM April till August, and from November till March, the able-bodied labourers are generally out of work, during which time they have very often but one meal of potatoes in the day. Mr. Lawlor found a woman pulling weeds in his field, and she declared her family consisted of five persons, and that they had only weeds to live upon for the three or four days previous. "This occurred," continued Mr. Lawlor, "last July, when there was a scarcity. This weed, which resembles Scotch kale, and boiled nettles, are frequently used in time of distress as food." There is no regular fund to relieve them.

When out of work, their wives and children beg. James Neil knew two, and Patrick M'Anally ten families doing so at this moment, who would not beg "if they could keep life together in any other way." A large portion of the rising population is not habituated to mendicancy; but the women and girls are frequently driven to prostitution. There are numerous instances of husbands deserting their families. James Keely, mason, stated, that "about a month ago my son-in-law, who was a blacksmith, finding himself without employment for five weeks, deserted his wife and three children, who returned to me for support."

None have committed offences for the sake of being supported in gaol; but many declare their disposition to do so to obtain food, which they would rather do than starve.

Many are guilty of small thefts, chiefly of taking potatoes by night out of the pits. Mr. L. Murphy has had his cows milked three or four times this summer, as he believes, from mere distress; and he also lost in one night two barrels of potatoes. The destitute have not been guilty of outrages upon person for the purpose of preventing starvation. Unquestionably, society suffers more by the demoralization thus created than it would by directly supporting them. The custom of giving credit has almost entirely ceased, from the great uncertainty of employment and the improbability of payment. The prices thus charged are materially above the market. Dr. Payne gave an instance where the labourer applied to his master to pass his note of hand as guarantee for the payment of some meal; his family were starving, and no work to be had. Previous to consenting, he discovered the huckster's terms to be 50 per cent. above the market price. As not more than 2 s. credit is ever given, the labourer does not become reckless from debt; but although he may escape, the cottier tenants and little farmers suffer greatly from such charges.

No gentlemen or farmers employ more labourers than they require. Rev. Mr. Nolan prevailed last summer upon a good many farmers to do so, being a time of distress; but they very reluctantly did it. No labour-rate has ever been in operation, the average rate of daily wages being 6*d.* with two meals of potatoes per day, or 9*d.* without; and employment only lasting generally three days in the week, it would be impossible for him to make any provision against want of work. Rev. Mr. Nolan stated there were above 1,000 labourers in the parish, 500 of whom are unemployed half the year; the remainder, at least two thirds of it labourers, during the last five years have increased certainly not less than two-fifths. Pat. M'Anally stated he was driven out of his holding of 2½ acres close to the town, which supported a family of six persons for 14 years; he was obliged to become a common labourer, and can now only procure three days' work in the week at 6*d.*, with diet, per day. Rev. Mr. Nolan knew 42 families dispossessed of their holdings in the Queen's County, five of whom had combined to murder the landlord and his agent, who were to pass by that night. Mr. N—— went to the wood where they were hid, and persuaded them to give up the fire-arms, or they certainly would have committed the murders. The reverend gentleman mentioned another precisely similar case, in which he prevented a man, who was rendered desperate, from shooting his landlord: the labourers constantly, by destitution, become reckless. The young tradesmen generally marry earlier than others. The Rev. Mr. Nolan stated, in the union of parishes most of the marriages are contracted in the poorest one. The people, who have but little knowledge of comfort, are reckless in contracting marriages, and have an inclination to do so in proportion to their wretchedness; those, on the contrary, who are accustomed to comfort, are less prone. Rev. Mr. Nolan stated, "There are six in one street who are afraid of thus decreasing their comforts; and I know others in the extreme of misery contracting marriages within the last month." The clergy encourage marriages, in case of previous connexion.

THERE is seldom full employment for the able-bodied labourers of the parish. During the winter and spring the meals of the unemployed are scanty. Messrs. Boyne and Mulvaney say there are four months during which the labourers are unemployed.

The wives and children are sometimes obliged to beg, when the men are out of work; but those who only ask occasional relief from the neighbours seldom become beggars.

They steal potatoes when in great distress; and in the neighbouring parishes outrages have been committed by plundering boats and provision-carts. Society suffers much more from such outrages and constant pilfering than it would by a tax. All concur that if a small tax would prevent the evil, it would be desirable; but opinions were divided as to the effects of the tax.

Labourers obtain credit from hucksters and provision-dealers at an enormous price, usually 25 per cent. above ready-money price. Mr. Nangle says, "Labourers constantly employed by farmers obtain an advance of provisions, for which they afterwards pay in labour. The labourers are most punctual in their payments." James Marks says, "The labourers are always in debt; they call it 'working for the dead horse.'"

THERE is no fund for assisting the able-bodied who may be out of work. A large proportion of labouring men are unable to find employment in summer, and again from the 1st of November to the 21st of March; during this interval not only working men but several small farmers are compelled to reduce the number of their daily meals, and it is no uncommon thing for the poor at those periods to live on one meal in the 24 hours, and that partly composed of refuse weeds. John Doran, himself a labourer, on being asked how the labourers live when not employed, stated, "Sometimes we have a bit, and sometimes I have been fasting for the length of a day, and well inclined to earn something at the same time; and many is the time I have come home after an odd day's work, hungry and wet, after being up to my knees in the gripe of a ditch, and had not a bit to eat, or a spark spark of fire to dry my wet rags at."—"I knew," says Styles, "a young man last summer, who did not taste food for 24 hours, until a friend brought him some bread. He could not get work, and was too proud to ask a meal's victuals from any one; for when once a man takes to begging, he is fairly broke down, and does but little good afterwards." Though the men do not beg, yet necessity forced them, in many instances, to permit their wives and children to do so. At no time have any of them been known to commit an offence for the purpose of being sent to gaol; nor have any outrages been traced to those who were suffering under starvation.

Sometimes when labourers are out of work, both in the country and in the town, they have recourse to a farmer, who advances to them a certain quantity of either meal or potatoes on credit. For this accommodation a very high price is usually paid; an advance of 2*s.* 6*d.* a barrel on potatoes, and 2*s.* 6*d.* or 3*s.* a cwt. on meal, being always exacted over the market price by the lender. The constant exertions of the labourer are applied to the discharging this debt. "If he does not," as Kelly and Styles observe, "the next time of distress no one will trust him, and he is forced to beg among the farmers." This practice leads to frequent processes at the quarter sessions.

Nothing approaching to the nature of a labour-rate has ever been in operation in these parishes. None of those who occupy land in them, of whatever rank in life, employ more labourers at any time than they require. Kelly and Styles say, that "were it not for Messrs. Robert and James Archbold, half the country might starve." The wages of labour are 10*d.* a day, and work is not to be had during more than half the year. Kelly states, that "if a man has anything of a family, he cannot exist, unless his wife and children take to the road." (He speaks of labourers who have no ground.) By the constant recurrence, or rather by the permanence of destitution, resulting from want of employment and other causes, the ideas and modes of thinking of the working man are radically and most injuriously affected; he becomes in time perfectly reckless. "Many is the time, I have heard a man say," remark both Kelly and Styles, "that he was tired of life, and that, except for the sin of it, he would wish that he was out of the world." Marriages are observed to be not only more premature, but much more frequent among the poorer classes of the population, and in proportion to their wretchedness, and to their conviction of the impossibility of increasing their misery, may be said to be their inclination to improvident matches. The Rev. Mr. Murphy states, that "in parts of his parish, which are the poorest, eight times more marriages take place than in the others." He recollects three or four instances where the couple had to get their nuptial dinner from their employer. Others of the witnesses observe, that the poorer a man is, the more likely he is soon to get a wife, while those that are rich are harder to be pleased. They add, that those that are in middling circumstances never marry so soon as those who are distressed.

FROM the middle of November to the middle of April, and from the middle of May to July, are the periods when the labourers for the most part are out of work. Christopher Adams observes, "We do not get four months' work in the entire year. Average 10*d.* a day without diet." The want of work is attributed to land being laid down in pasture. At these seasons they often have not one good meal in the day. They are obliged to live on a weed called "pressagh." And Mr. Hughes states, "When the children of these poor people come to my shop for a grain of pepper to make it palatable, I have told them it would be their destruction. They have asked, 'What can we do? can we starve? and if this would kill us, we would be dead long since, because many is the time we have been obliged to put up with worse.'" M'Dermott says, "they are often reduced to one meal; and if they have not got a good beggar woman out, they won't have one itself." Adams remarks, "Can any hardship be greater than to get up in the morning, as I have done, hear your children crying for food, and not having any to give them, to look at myself, a man able and willing to work, obliged to send the eldest of my children out to beg food to feed the young ones?"

There have not been any instances where persons have committed any offences for the purpose of being sent to gaol, in order to get food and shelter there. And Mr. Hughes states, "If they were to break all the windows in Kilcock, not a soul would send them to gaol, well knowing their real wants and distress." And he further adds, "there is no act to which a destitute starving people may not be driven, naturally thinking that any change must be for the better."

The poor here do not steal anything. Mr. Hughes says, "they would rather go beg it from the farmers than steal." Though they are not guilty of any outrages on person, but for the most part depend upon the neighbours, yet during the month of July 1830, a time of great distress, the canal boats were stopped and robbed of provisions; and in order to create employment they cut away the embankments of the canal, and caused a loss of property to the amount of 3,000*l.* or 4,000*l.*; so that in every way society must suffer from the degradation of the labourer.

The unemployed labourer will not get credit. Mr. Hughes says, "Not that we doubt their principle, but we know they would not be able to pay." Smith observes, "When we are in work we may get some; but when we are thrown out of work, our credit stops." Mr. Hughes states, "I know those men who are employed on the country roads pay a great deal more for provisions than the price of the day; for instance, I knew a man pay 17*s.* a cwt. for meal, when I was paying only 11*s.*"

The gentry and farmers sometimes employ more labourers than they absolutely require, from one to six men each. Those holding over 100 acres of land will employ four men more than they require. This practice lasts about two months in summer. This custom has held now for the last three years. Two seasons of extreme distress occurred, when the labourers waited on the parish priest for advice; a meeting of the landholders took place, who consented to take a certain number each, according to the number of acres they held; by such means 100 labourers were employed at 1*s.* per diem, and saved from all but starvation, or the commission of outrages consequent upon extreme destitution.

As to labourers saving anything, Patrick Ivey says, "It is not enough to support us for the day, not to say lay anything by." So precarious is the condition of the whole people here, that there is no distinction to be made as to the time of marrying; they are all reckless, and give way to the impulse and feeling of the moment. But in cases of previous connexion, the clergy, from motives of morality, always recommend marriage.

FROM the 1st of November to the middle of April, and the months of June, July and August, are the periods when labourers are without employment, during which time they are reduced to fewer meals, and sometimes obliged to eat the "pressagh" weed. The Rev. Mr. Parker states, "During the month of August last, employment was so scarce, and provisions so dear, that in order to prevent actual starvation, I made a subscription to buy meal; and on making an investigation, I found there were 317 families of labourers, amounting in all to 1,600 persons, out of employment, who would have died, but for the relief they then received."

The lack of employment here is attributed by Captain Connor, and all concur in his views, to the following causes:

1st. The ground that was formerly cultivated is now turned to grazing.

2d. The introduction of the Scotch plough, that is in very general use here, which with two horses does as much work as 20 men can do.

3d. The very high rents extracted from the farmers, and the very low price of agricultural produce, render them unable to employ the requisite number of labourers to till the ground properly.

John Stanley states, "We can get no employment at all in winter; the potatoes are mostly all set with the plough, and dug with it; and when the young men are idle, how can it be expected the old ones will get work?"

William Corcoran adds to Stanley's statement, "And we are often obliged to eat the 'pressagh' when the blossom is on it (that is, when it is thought most unwholesome). I declare to my God, I know several men who never tasted food for 48 hours."

The Rev. Mr. Parker observes, that it was during this period he gave out meal; and in order to relieve, he intended to give it at half price; but if a halfpenny would purchase a pottle, they had it not.

Andrew Neill, a labourer, states, "I myself fasted for 24 hours last summer, in order to relieve a man of the name of Kempton, a labourer, who had a wife and seven children; I knew them not to have anything but five or six potatoes from one day to another; I thought it bad to see the children wanting, and I did without it myself to give it to them."

When labourers are out of employment, their wives and families are driven to begging, or go collecting weeds or anything to keep life together; sometimes the women of the family are even driven to prostitution; and families are occasionally abandoned by men out of work, who cannot bear to see them starve. The Rev. Mr. Parker states, that there are more confirmed desperate beggars in this town than in any town in Ireland. The way he accounts for it is this: it is a great thoroughfare for coaches; besides, the Connaught labourers coming through to cut the harvest, and working so much under the wages of common labourers, create a surplus, and are the means of throwing out of employment a great number of the resident labourers, whose wives and children are of course obliged to beg for their support. Mr. Hardy states, "During the cholera I was going along the road, and saw a woman lying in a ditch, with six children round her; I gave her a drink of water and had her removed to the fever hospital, where she died in three days; this woman I knew had been abandoned by her husband, he not being able to get work, and not having the heart to see his family famishing."

It is a matter of frequent occurrence to find able-bodied persons committing trifling offences for the purpose of being sent to gaol, and getting food and shelter there, and of course must mix with the worst characters, and suffer by contamination with their vices.

Captain Connor states, "During season of great want, when any provisions are stolen, the magistrates direct the police to go to the houses of those labourers whose destitution is well known, and the provisions, if not discovered within the house, are always secreted near it."

Pat Byrne, now a labourer, formerly a farmer of 60 acres, says, "I have often stolen potatoes from my mother, in order to give them to men whose families I knew to be starving."

Mr. Louton states, "I consider the want of employment, and consequent distress, to be productive of most serious evils to society; on a market-day I see the children of men whom I knew to be decent and industrious, cribbing a potato from one, and straw from another, and so on; they are driven to it by misery."

The labourers used formerly to get credit from the farmers for provisions; but credit is now very limited, because employment is so precarious; when it does take place, however, the provisions are always given at a price far higher than the market price.

More labourers than are absolutely wanted are never employed by any one here, nor has a labour-rate ever been in operation in this parish. It was deemed utterly impossible for a labourer, all circumstances considered, to lay by any provision for a time of non-employment. Mr. Fitzpatrick states, "I know a man of the name of Grogan, who works in harvest for me; I know him to beg in winter and other times, when he can get no work."

Mr. Lalor, on remarking that labourers when out of employment generally have a garden of potatoes to live upon, was replied to by Mr. Finamore, who remarked, "The garden of potatoes would not pay its rent, not to say anything of the labour expended on it." Patrick Byrne, being asked the cause of his downfall, states, "My first 'take' was 1*l.* 8*s.* per acre, and when my lease was out, my landlord raised my second take to 2*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.*; I should either promise to pay it or quit at once. As I was loath to leave the place I was born and reared in, I strove to stay and keep the roof over my poor mother's head; however, with all our industry and hard work, what was not in the land could not be taken out of it; we could not pay the rent, so of course we were put out. The old woman, however, went to the landlord, and told him he got all the produce that came off the land; that he knew very well he got the very corn, after it was cut, drawn away by his own carts and horses; that the cows we reared went to pay the rent; all would not do; and the only answer she got was, that the ground was his, and the money hers, and as she could not pay the rent he fixed on it, she should go somewhere else. She is now 70 years of age, sir, and it is hard to see her depending on my labour, particularly when I can scarcely get any."

It is not remarked that one class marries sooner than another; but it is supposed that the poorer they are, the more inclined to marry; those who have anything being very careful of it. The clergy always encourage marriage, in cases of previous connexion.

THE periods of the year when the labourers are out of work are from 1st December to the end of March, as well as from the middle of May to the middle of July, during which time they are often reduced to one meal. Byrne states, "We might be employed in the morning, and broke in two hours, if there was sign of rain; and if you are not noted as a good labourer in the busiest season of the year, you may be left in the streets for a month together, without any one asking what brought you there; and I know many labourers who, except for the 'pressagh' that grows in the field, would be lost entirely. Mr. George Pim states, "Last spring there was a meeting of the inhabitants to relieve the poor, and several unemployed labourers came forward and stated they had not tasted food for 24 hours; and I am sure, in such periods, many get up in the morning not knowing where to look for a potato during the day."

The Rev. Mr. Bourne: "About the year 1826 upwards of 50 families were turned out of their small holdings and driven to live by the roadside in miserable huts. The husbands of 10 or 12 women abandoned them; they were all young men, and supposed to have embarked for America." Dr. Fitzsimon states, "I have this day attended an unfortunate female who has three children, one of whom was by her first marriage; last spring her present husband abandoned her, first having disposed of every article he possessed to defray his passage, as is supposed, to America."

There are many instances of their being driven to begging, but it is agreed on all hands they would be next to starving before they would do so. Mr. Townsend remarks, "I remember the time when a labouring man would as soon be accused of a capital crime as of begging; but now, from want of employment, they think nothing of it."

They seldom can get credit. Gorman says, "'Faith, we would not get it; there is little chance of paying it back." Whenever they do get credit, it is at an advance of from 40 to 50 per cent., and this, beyond a doubt, keeps them in debt; "from which," Mr. Townsend says, "it must be a very fortuitous circumstance that can set him free. I was present, some time ago, when a farmer was settling his accounts with his labourers, 13 in number, and there was not one that was not in debt to him, incurred in summer for provisions given by him, and they seemed very well pleased at it, as it ensured them work during the winter." Wm. Gore says, "Last summer one man whom I knew, neither himself nor his family tasted food for 24 hours, and I knew him the next day obliged to give his note for a guinea for 15*s*. worth of meal. Mr. Fagan and Mr. Malone state, "It is a general custom to give the labourers their day's wages at breakfast-hour, because it is well known, if they do not, they will be weak and not able to work the day out, as they have no means of getting their breakfasts." Mr. Malone states, "I was this morning obliged to employ two men whom I saw going home dejected from the market square, (where they wait for employment,) because I knew, if I did not, they could not get their breakfasts." When asked if the labourers could lay by for the time of non-employment, Kavanagh says, "How could their wages do that? Now the potatoes are dug out, may be I would not get a day's work to the middle of March; and sure, except the farmers were kind to us, what would become of us? But, thank God, they are very generous!"

The Rev. Mr. Brennan states, "It would make your blood run cold to hear the tales of woe and misery that are told me in my confessional; that the hardships the poor bear are beyond endurance." Here the reverend gentleman got excited at the recollection of some of these scenes, and remarked, "They attribute all the midnight murders and assassinations in this country to political causes; but, sir, I tell you, and am ready to swear, if necessary, that poverty and destitution are at the root. One instance, sir, I'll tell you, that of a decent farmer's wife, her children, kindly reared and respectably brought up, driven out of their holding, without a roof to put their heads under; some one built them a wretched hut by the roadside, which covered them for 45 nights. Her son, a young man, came to me when he heard it, and in a state bordering on distraction said to me, 'What am I told, sir? am I to live and see those things?'" Mr. Brennan further states, "that in the month of July many labourers, who were out of employment, were thrown into such a state of destitution, that they became quite reckless, and asked my advice how they were to act, saying they could not bear up under such misery, and were determined not to submit to it any longer." A mason's wages are 2*s*. 6*d*. per day; but Gorman states, "I was 13 weeks without employment, and often went to bed without any meal in the day at all; and so much did it work upon my mind, that I fell sick." (This was corroborated by the curate and dispensary surgeon, who were present.) "I often did not care if the ground opened and swallowed me, and that's more than any one heard out of my mouth before. I would willingly turn to any part of the land that I would get employment; but this moment I don't know what or where to turn for employment, and often, if a penny would get a dinner for my wife and children, I could not get it. From the fair anxiety of mind, many is the night I do not sleep a wink, thinking on my destitution; and often, from weakness, my wife is not able to leave the spot she sits in. What is to become of us, I do not know*!"

Mr. M'Kenna remarks, "I am schoolmaster of the Male National School: the average number of pupils is 40 per day. My salary from public grant is only 10*l.* per annum, the remainder of my support depending on the weekly collections of 1 d. each from the parents of the children; but such has been the distress and poverty of the people, that during the last 10 months I have only received 9 s. 6 d. among them all; and I declare most solemnly, that last Sunday my wife, myself, and my two children, dined off the mere dry potato. Who can wonder at ignorant people in such a state joining Whiteboys, or other such illegal associations? and but for the education I have been fortunate enough to receive, my miseries might have driven me to such acts."

All agreed that, although one class does not marry earlier than another, the reckless are the most inclined to contract early and improvident marriages.

JOHN CASEY, cottier.—HUGH DOOGAN, small farmer (10 acres).—CAPTAIN GRAHAM, magistrate.—Mr. JOHNSTON, an extensive farmer.—Rev. Mr. M'CAN, parish priest.—Rev. Mr. MAGUIRE, rector.—Rev. Mr. MOFFET, protestant curate of an adjoining parish, and a magistrate residing in the town of Ballymahon.—Mr. EDWARD ROONEY, a general merchant.—MICHAEL ROURKE, labourer.

ACCORDING to the evidence given by the Rev. Mr. M'Cann, Capt. Graham, and Mr. Rooney, there is not employment for a fourth part of the labourers belonging to the parish between the months of September and March, and again during the interval between the 1st of June and the middle or latter end of August. Michael Rourke details as follows the circumstances of his own mode of life, as well as of the greater number of his fellow-labourers:—"In winter we have a stock of con-acre potatoes, the rent of which we are enabled to pay by the sale of our pig at Christmas. Some labourers belonging to the town endeavour to help out their stock by bartering herrings for potatoes throughout the country. In spring the con-acre potatoes begin to run out, and though there is then a demand for labour, the working man must in general pay away his wages for food just as quick as he gets them. By the time the summer comes the con-acre potatoes are usually exhausted, and at the same time there is no employment to be had. Some few who are known to be honest men and good labourers, by getting another person to join them in a promissory note, obtain meal on credit at an interest of from 30 to 40 per cent., to be paid for by their harvest wages. It depends entirely on the heart of the man that sells it whether he contents himself with a certain advance on the price, or whether he also stipulates for the advantage of any rise that may take place in the article before the time for paying for it. I have known the price to have doubled between the day on which the meal was delivered and that on which it was paid for, and the labourer had to pay the double price in consequence of such stipulation." Upon this statement being made by Rourke, James Magrath, a labourer who was standing by listening, observed, "I got meal on credit last July, when it was selling at 10 s. the cwt. My bargain was to pay 16 s. 6 d. at Christmas, without any regard to a rise or fall in prices. I have no blame to the person selling it at so exorbitant a profit; if he gains largely by one, he loses by another." Magrath was asked whether, with the aid of such credit, a labourer could afford himself a sufficiency of food. His answer was, "You know we will not eat plenty, nor half plenty, when we are paying such prices; and, moreover, he is a favoured man that can get credit; not one-fourth of the labourers can obtain it; so that we are often obliged to dig our potatoes long before they are half-grown." Being further asked what those do who cannot get credit, he replied, "I'll tell you what they do; they go through the fields and gather the wild weeds. They boil them with salt, and they live on them without even a potato to eat along with them. I could tell you the names of those who have done so this summer." Others of the witnesses, viz. Mr. Rooney, Capt. Graham, and the Rev. Mr. M'Cann, say, "We know what he (Magrath) states to be a fact. We cannot say what number of labourers get provisions on credit this summer, but we know that nine-tenths of them would have gladly taken them on the terms just mentioned." There has been somewhat more than ordinary distress this last summer, in consequence of the dearth of provisions. Potatoes rose to 4½ d. a stone; but they may, even in ordinary summers, be rated at 3½ d. If they were bought at 1½ d. at Christmas and kept over for sale, from the loss of weight and difficulty of keeping them, they could not be sold sold in July under 3 d. There is no regular fund out of which the periodical distress that has been described can be in the least relieved.

Under these circumstances, labourers are in summer frequently driven to mendicancy as a refuge from impending starvation. They seldom beg at home, they go to distant places where they are not likely to be recognised, and there endeavour to subsist on charity while the season of distress continues. In connexion with his general observations upon the distress to which the labouring population are so peculiarly subject, the Rev. Mr. M'Cann adds, that he has known at least forty instances where persons of the richer classes have endeavoured to take advantage of the great poverty of young females, and have tempted them by the offers of money to yield to their purposes. In only three cases have such practices been successful. Another effect of the pressure of misery is, that it sometimes happens that a married man, driven to despair by his hopeless condition, takes the extreme step of deserting his family, and absconding to America, leaving his wife and children with very slender means of subsistence. The individuals who have acted thus are in some measure excused by the witnesses, who state that they always leave their homes with the fixed intention of sending for their families whenever they shall have acquired the means to do so. "I heard at one time," says Mr. Rooney, "that a labourer, who had a wife and six children, had determined to go to America, leaving them at home until he had earned the means of taking them out. I succeeded several times in dissuading him from his design; at length he stole away without acquainting me, and his wife and family were forced to beg. Two years after, I was surprised to see him entering my shop, well dressed. 'Well, sir,' said he, 'had I taken your's and my priest's advice, I had been hopelessly struggling with poverty still; I can now make my family independent, and I am come to take them back to America.' He did," continues Mr. Rooney, "take them out with him, together with some of his nephews and nieces." The witnesses represent the general eagerness for emigrating to be so great, that a family often sells its only cow to enable one of the members to go out, in order that, after a time, he may furnish the means of emigration to the rest.

An instance has never been known of a labourer, under the pressure of want, committing any crime with a view to being sent to gaol, in order to enjoy a sufficiency of food while there. It has however happened, that potatoes have been rooted up in the early season, it is supposed by individuals in a state of destitution.

A regular labour-rate has never been in operation; but in times of peculiar distress, additional employment has been devised for the poor by the resident proprietors and by many extensive farmers. The witnesses do not know this expedient to have been adopted on the estate of an absentee, with the single exception of, according to one witness, the estate of Lady Ross.

There is but one opinion as to the possibility of a labourer laying by anything out of his wages, as a provision for the time, when he knows he will be unable to earn anything. Such a saving is stated to be quite out of the question with the existing rate of wages. Michael Rourke, on being asked whether a labourer does not often drink as much as would make some provision against a want of work, replied, "Labourers do not drink, nor cannot; for myself, I would feel it sorely if I drank to the value of 6 d. out of my quarter's wages."

The Rev. Mr. M'Cann was not able to draw any distinction as to the greater or less prevalence of early or improvident matches among the labouring classes and those immediately above them.

WINTER, and June and July are the seasons when a portion of the labourers are out of work. A labourer in the country always plants some con-acre potatoes, the rent of which he is enabled to pay by rearing a pig, which he sells at Christmas. This supplies a sufficient stock for the winter, and he never considers himself in distress while he has enough of potatoes. In summer both potatoes and work are scarce; this is the season of distress, when it is quite common for labourers to be stinted both in the number and quantity of their meals. Rev. Mr. O'Brien knew this summer two families of labourers to remain in bed all day, as they said, "to stifle the hunger." They told me that several of their neighbours did the same. Keeffe said, "I have no regular employer, and have frequently been distressed in the summer months, and reduced in the number of my meals; this constantly happens among my fellow-labourers. My brother has a large family, and was obliged this summer to eat the potatoes he had prepared for seed; he must suffer for it next winter. My children may occasionally go to a neighbour's house looking for a meal when I have not had it to give them, but not to my knowledge, I would not permit them." There have been some summers that the labourers were not stinted in food; they certainly were not one in three. There are some employers in the parish that give constant work to their labourers, and never see them want, as they either advance them money or give them provisions for nothing. There is no fund from which they can receive assistance.

The wives and children do not beg. "If I were to fast for a week, and starve at the end of it, I would not let one of my family beg."—(Keeffe.)——None have been known to be driven to mendicancy, prostitution, or abandonment of their families by destitution. Potatoes are often stolen under such circumstances. "Several persons," said the Rev. Mr. O'Brien, "have privately given me money to be paid to persons from whom they had stolen provisions, when they and their families were threatened with starvation. I hold at this moment 4*s.* 6*d.* given me for that purpose." Injury to morals may result either from a provision or the contrary.

Those who are without work obtain credit, and are generally charged at an advance of 50 per cent. on the market price. This is paid whether provisions rise or fall; but there is a stipulation besides, that if, up to the time of payment, provisions rise higher, the very highest price will be paid. "In this way," said Keeffe, "I was once obliged to pay 36*s.* for a hundred of meal, that at the time I received it, might be purchased in the market for 16*s.*"

"I myself," said Dr. Crawford, "employ more labourers than I require; but the practice is not general. I do not know an agent or any absentee estate authorized to do so. No labour-rate has ever been in operation. The wages of a labouring population could not possibly enable them to provide against a want of work."—"I have observed," said Mr. O'Brien, "that small farmers are more cautious in contracting marriages than labourers; they wait until they can get a fortune with the wife, and themselves expect something from their father. The labourer is more precipitate, he is readily matched, as he seeks no fortune, and his parent has less power to enforce providence, as he can hold out no expectations. When the female's character has suffered, the clergy always encourage marriage."

A GREAT portion of the labourers are without work in winter, and during June and July. The summer wages are 10*d.* a day without food; the winter wages, 6*d.* to 8*d.* Those who are engaged by a constant employer receive 6*d.* for the winter half, and 8*d.* for the summer; but many persons offer their work at lower wages, and cannot get them. The witnesses had all seen several hundred men in the months of October and November, when potatoes are dug, stand in the street, offering their services for 5*d.* a day with food, and at least 100 go away unemployed. In winter the extremity of distress is prevented from following want of employment by the cheapness of provisions, and by the labourer having a stock of con-acre potatoes, which lasts during the winter. A dear summer produces the greatest misery. In no summer has the labourer a sufficiency of dry potatoes. This summer the potatoes rose to 4*d.* and 4½*d.* a stone (the average summer price being 3*d.*), the consequence was, that not only were the labourers stinted in their food, but they were unable to get seed for the con-acre which they had engaged, and on which they depend for keeping them out of the potato market in winter, when there is no demand for labour. There is a field in the immediate neighbourhood of the town, containing eight acres. It was all engaged for labourers for con-acre, and actually scored out; but those who had seed were obliged to eat it; those who had not could not procure it. The sods turned up to mark the divisions were laid down again, and the field is still in grass. Wages were at that time 10*d.* a day, a stone of potatoes 4½*d.* A stone of potatoes is a fair allowance for one meal for three men. ("They would require more," said Maguire, "when they had no other nourishment, as milk, with them; nothing but salt.") Mr. Moxham had at that time, (and he added, "I speak considerately,") four or five applicants for one he could employ. "In the winter," said Maguire, "the labourers have always a sufficiency of potatoes, but as milk is scarce then, they have nothing to take with them but salt. The con-acre keeps them from the market in winter; but in summer they must depend on their wages. They must go to the market every Monday; in the latter end of the week they feel the hunger, for the children that feel want on Saturday and Sunday, will not be kept from the potatoes, but will be robbing one on Monday."

It is uncommon for the wife and children to beg in the neighbourhood; when they beg they go to a distance. None of the witnesses believed they were ever in this way habituated to mendicancy, or driven to prostitution, or that the husband ever abandoned his wife and family.

Potatoes and turf are commonly stolen in summer, and it is attributed to persons in want.

"The man that gives credit," said Maguire, "must look sharp to see how he will be paid, and he will be very shy in giving it to a man that has nothing but his labour." The credit price in the country is materially above the money price, but not in the town.

Mr. Sheridan knew one gentleman in the neighbourhood, who, to relieve distress, employed more labourers than he required, but the practice is not common.

There are, however, several employers in the town who do so on occasions of extraordinary distress; but this never occurs on an absentee estate. There has never been a labour-rate established. The labourer could not possibly provide against a want of work. He marries earlier than the small farmer, as he has little difficulty in settling the preliminaries of the contract.

THOMAS BURKE, farmer, who holds 20 acres of land, and occasionally labours himself.—Rev. Mr. O'FERRALL, P. P.—CHRISTOPHER GEEHAN, day-labourer.—Rev. Mr. POWELL, protestant curate.—Rev. Mr. PRICE, wesleyan clergyman.—MICHAEL SHANLEY, schoolmaster, surveyor, and occasionally labourer for hire.—VALENTINE SKIPTON, esq., J. P.—ROBERT WILSON, middle landlord.

THE season when labourers are out of work is winter, and the months of June and July; the mode of living then is thus given by witnesses:

The Rev. Mr. Powell, protestant curate, stated, "Provisions were dearer this summer; I retail meal; the labourers often bought of me; I am certain many of them had not one substantial meal in the day; I have known a family of three or four live on a pint of meal, mixed with cabbage, for a day; I have known three in family live on a stone of potatoes for a space of two days; such instances were common. A stone of potatoes ought to give a meal to four men." Mr. Wilson stated, that in winter the labourer was not so badly off, as it was usual to grow some corn-acre potatoes.

The families of labourers out of work do not beg in the neighbourhood. Some rare instances have occurred in the parish of labourers taking their families to distant parts of the country; it was suspected they went to beg. In the parish no instances have been known of the women and girls being driven to prostitution where work fails the family.

The reply of the priest to the query, Are there any instances of women having families being abandoned by their husbands? was thus: "In 15 years' experience I knew but one instance in this parish; a labourer went off, his family knew not whither; it was reported he went with some strange woman; he returned in a few months."

No cases took place of labourers or their families committing offences for the purpose of being sent to prison.

There has been no instance of any person committing theft with a view to relief from a state of destitution.

With regard to the circumstances of credit that the labourer is placed in, the following account was agreed on by all: As the labourer in the country does not purchase from day to day, his mode of living is but little affected by being a few days out of work; he generally plants some potatoes; as this stock holds or runs out before summer, he is seldom obliged to borrow before then; but it is frequently exhausted before the new potatoes come in, during the dear season, when labour is scarce, and then he is forced to borrow, which he effects on these terms: he obtains from a dealer a certain quantity of meal, the price of which he is to pay at Christmas, that price is to be 2*s.* in advance of whatever meal rose to between the times of sale and of payment. As the same cause which drives the labourer to borrow, namely, the scarcity of potatoes, causes an increased demand for meal, the price is always on the rise at the time he buys, so that he has to pay more by 40 or 50, or perhaps 100 per cent., than if he had had ready money.

This statement was confirmed by Geelan's account of his own case: "I was obliged to borrow meal at the early part of this season, I could then get it for 8*s.*; it rose afterwards to 15*s.*; so I will have to pay 17*s.* per cent. at Christmas."

Geelan further stated, when asked if the necessary result of such a system must not be to keep a labourer constantly in debt, and, therefore, reckless, "I owe half a year's rent for my cabin, and money for meal; I have generally been in debt since I was married, 15 years ago."

Mr. Wilson corroborated, by stating, "I am in the habit of employing 15 labourers, and know their condition; I do not believe more than three are out of debt, and I am not sure of more than one." The gentlemen and farmers have not been in the custom of employing more labourers than they require for the purpose of relieving distress; Mr. Wilson said they could not afford it; nor is there any system of co-operation among the gentlemen and the farmers to provide employment for the poor.

The wages of the working classes, considering the various demands, were not considered as by any means admitting the possibility of the labourer laying by for a time when he could get no work.

The witnesses had not observed whether one class marries earlier than another.

WORK is scarce during both winter and summer. In winter, the general condition of the labourers is not much deteriorated, potatoes are then cheap; and though the town labourer has no stock, they are plenty with the small farmers, and the wives (who are generally engaged in this traffic) take salt herrings out to the country, and exchange them with the small farmer for two or three times their value in potatoes; besides, they generally have a pig to kill about Christmas, which helps them through the winter. Summer is the season of distress; tress; there is no summer in which some of the labourers are not obliged to live occasionally on a meal a day, and that often very scanty. This period of distress lasts from a month to six or seven weeks, as the harvest is early or late. The labourer is generally ashamed of acknowledging that he is reduced to this state. Both Mr. O'D—— and Mr. W—— have seen cases, where a dish covered over with a cloth has been carried out to him in the field, and when he has separated himself from the other labourers, as if to eat, in order to conceal his poverty; they added, that when this was suspected, the others have sent for him and divided with him their food.

The wife often tells their distress to some more comfortable neighbour, to obtain relief; the children are seen loitering about farm-houses, not begging, but with hunger in their faces, and evidently waiting to be asked. This has not the effect of habituating them to mendicancy; nor are the women or girls ever driven by their distress to prostitution. The witnesses knew of no instance where women having families were abandoned by their husbands.

Some idle and profligate characters have committed trifling offences in order to be transported, or cured in prison of some disease, but no industrious labourer.

Rev. Mr. O'D—— stated, that in scarce seasons potatoes were commonly rooted up in the fields, but he believed principally by children to relieve hunger. Mr. G—— had apprehended several in the act, and never knew an instance where the intention was not rather to sell than to eat them. None left destitute have been known to commit outrage to prevent starvation.

Those who are likely to get work soon, and are known to be honest, can obtain meal and potatoes on credit, without any advance in the price; if likely to be long out of work, they may perhaps obtain an advance from some one who frequently employs them; if not, they must pawn their clothes or furniture, or sell their pig; the last resource, rather than resort to which they will almost starve, is to go into a distant part of the country as if seeking work, while the wife and children beg. When credit is given, the price in the town is not usually above the money price at the time; in the country it is.

Lord Longford has, for each of the last two years, expended from 60*l.* to 70*l.* in draining a deep bog, for the purpose of employing labourers in the idle season; no similar instance has occurred. A labour-rate has never been in operation. The wages of the labouring population certainly do not enable them to provide against a want of work.

Rev. Mr. O'D—— has observed, that the sons and daughters of farmers do not marry so early in life as those of day-labourers; the cause is, that the poor cannot be worse; the rich are afraid of getting into poverty. He also stated, that the clergy uniformly recommend marriage where the character of the female has been injured, but that in ordinary cases they are opposed to early marriages.

THE only periods in which employment is to be calculated on are, a month in spring, planting potatoes, a month in harvest, and a month in autumn, digging potatoes; and during other times the labourers are often without one meal of potatoes in the day. Hugh Donoghoe, a labourer, states, "During the unemployed season, I know many people who cannot take food for 24 hours; and if it was not for an odd bit the Almighty sends from a neighbour, would have died through the mere dint of starvation." There is not any regular fund out of which they receive assistance.

The wife and children of the unemployed labourers are mostly driven to begging, and thus are initiated into mendicancy; and though the husband does not often desert them, yet Mr. Nangle remembers two or three cases where it has occurred.

There are many instances of stealing from destitution. Mr. Flood says, "I perfectly recollect three or four instances, but none of outrage on persons."

They get credit for provisions, and if from farmers or dealers, they generally pay from 1*s.* 6*d.* to 2*s.* more than market price for a cwt.

It is not general for the farmers or gentry to employ more labourers than they want; but on two occasions of great destitution they did so, averaging two labourers additional to every 100 acres, and this gave them all sustenance for 10 weeks, during which it was in operation. Mr. Hevey, an extensive farmer of 700 acres, states, "During the scarce seasons seasons I took a number of labourers into my employment, and reclaimed, by draining, about 20 acres of land; however, when it was discovered by the landlord, he took it from me and set it to another."

It is considered perfectly impossible for labourers, considering the calls upon them by their destitute friends and relations, to make a sufficient provision against a want of work. Mr. O'Neill says, "I cannot tell how they manage to live at all." The effect of destitution here is described to be, that the labourer is driven to distraction, anxious to get ardent spirits, or any temporary relief from the constant thought how to provide for the day. The poorer classes likewise marry earlier than others, under the feeling that they cannot be worse; the clergy, too, encourage it to prevent bastardy.

JUNE and July in summer, and January and February in winter, are the periods when labourers are without employment, and in summer they are reduced to fewer meals in the day. The want of employment in June and July is to the last degree injurious to the labourer, because, when his stock of potatoes is run out, he is obliged to dig the new ones, though at that time scarcely larger than marbles; which, in addition to being the very worst food, cannot of course give him a proper return to meet the rent, which is mostly at the rate of 7 l. an acre; and besides, it very much lessens his stock for the ensuing winter.

The families of unemployed labourers in this district do not go out to beg; they endeavour to get through the period of non-employment by credit, and by assistance from their neighbours. There are some, but very few, instances of men abandoning their families when labour was scarce, and they did not wish to see the family in want.

No case was known of persons committing crimes for the purpose of being sent to gaol, and there obtaining food and shelter; yet Mr. Tuite says he can in no other way account for the great increase of petty crimes: however, he knows no instance.

Mr. West, J. P., mentioned that a man under sentence of transportation for an attack upon a poor woman's house, stated to him that he was induced to the act by information he received that there was a large quantity of meal in the house, he being in absolute want.

Labourers out of work get credit from the farmers, otherwise many would starve, and the provisions thus obtained on credit are often at prices considerably higher than the ready money price; so that the system of credit has a strong tendency to keep the labourer in debt and difficulty, which not unfrequently produce recklessness and misery, as it would be impossible for a man to lay up any adequate provision against the time of non-employment. The more destitute they are, the more anxious to marry, thinking they cannot be worse, and seeing no chance of being better. The clergy, too, encourage marriages in cases of previous connexion, and otherwise they do not often dissuade, lest immorality may be the consequence. To the question, Can a labouring man save anything as a provision for his age or infirmity? the labourers present at the examination answered, "A labourer thinks he has made sufficient provision for his old age when he has reared up a family. This formerly answered well enough; but now the young men, as soon as they grow up, go off to America, and leave the old to beg."

J. MONVEAL says, "From December until the 1st of April is the period at which a portion of the labourers are out of work. Almost every labourer has about one rood of ground for his potatoes, for which he pays 1 l. 15 s.: this will produce nine barrels of potatoes, each barrel containing 42 stone. A family of five will consume three stone per day; at that rate, the produce will support them until the 1st of April, when employment begins. The refuse of their meals, with about 5 s. worth of bran, will fatten a pig, which cost them about 6 s., and which when fat will not sell for more now than 2 l., which is 6 s. less than the cost of a pig and the rent of the potato-ground: the rent of the cabin is 1 l. For the three summer months, about half the number of labourers are employed at 8 d. per day, on an average. The potatoes are then, on an average, 3½ d. per stone, rising at times to 6 d.; so that if they consume three stone per day, the cost of potatoes alone will be 10½ d., which, not including Sundays, is much more than his earnings, and leaving no provision for the cabin-rent. They are then obliged to stint themselves to one stone per day, and make up the meal with cabbage (a little plot of which he got with the cabin) or weeds, &c. They will not go out to beg, because they have a spirit above that. I often went into a labourer's house, and

The most destitute classes invariably marry the earliest; those who are accustomed to comfort will not marry without fortune.

The best situation for a man to be in is as a farmer's boy; but they get tired of that, and wish to have a house of their own. To keep one, they must have wives to take care of them, particularly to assist in collecting manure for the con-acre: for this purpose, every child a man has over 10 is an advantage to him.

Rev. JOSEPH FITZGERALD, P. P.—LAURENCE LLOYD HENRY, esq. J. P.—Mr. MICHAEL HOPE, farmer.—Rev. ROBERT A. MARTIN, protestant curate.—Mr. JAMES SEERY, farmer.—ROBERT MORGAN TIGHE, esq., J. P.—The Marquis of WESTMEATH, lord-lieutenant of the county.

ALL labourers, especially those residing in the village of Castletown Delvin, which is the property of an absentee, are a portion of the year without work, generally from November until March, or later.

They must necessarily depend upon casual employment in the absence of the proprietor; this, however, is not the worst season of the year, potatoes being then plenty, though they are sometimes bad. There is no fund to afford assistance.

When out of work and food, the wife and children are necessarily obliged to beg about the neighbourhood, and are thus habituated to mendicancy. The women and girls are, perhaps, in a few cases driven to prostitution, but not generally. There are but few instances of women having families being abandoned by their husbands.

Two of the witnesses thought that there were some few, but very rare instances, where able-bodied persons and their families had committed trifling offences for the purpose of being sent to prison to obtain food and shelter. Mr. Hope thought no such cases had occurred, but had heard labourers say it would be better for them to steal a sheep and be transported, being supported in the meantime in gaol. In instances such as the above, both they and their children must be greatly demoralized. Those who have been once driven to the shelter of a prison, seldom return to industrious habits.

Persons are sometimes guilty of robberies to relieve themselves from destitution, and some cases are known to enable them to emigrate to America: such crimes are, however, not generally committed by those most in want. Society suffers more by the demoralization thus created than it would by affording them a direct subsistence.

Those who are without work frequently obtain provisions on credit; "but this," said Mr. Hope, "is not so much the case as formerly, which is one reason of the increase of vagrancy." The price charged is generally about a fourth more than the money-price at the time when the credit is given; the labourer, in such cases, is necessarily kept in debt, and rendered reckless.

All the witnesses, except Lord W——, did not believe that gentlemen or farmers employed more labourers than they required, in order to relieve distress. Lord W—— said that Mr. R. Fetherston, lately deceased, did so, and that his death, therefore, would cause an irreparable loss. All agreed that on absentee estates there were no instances of this practice. A labour-rate has never been in operation.

The labouring classes are rendered reckless by the constant recurrence of destitution. Those who have a little property are more cautious in marrying than the poor; the latter say they cannot be worse. Lord W—— attributes the improvident marriages in Ireland to the habitual interference of the priests in the temporal affairs of the roman-catholic population.

In cases of previous connexion, the clergy always encourage early marriages; but the three witnesses agreed that in no other case did they do so. Lord W——, however, never knew of an instance where a roman-catholic priest dissuaded from any marriage; he remarked, "Whether an exuberant population are to be employed or to languish, to live or starve, the priests consider numbers as their boast and pride, and as the source of their newly assumed political power; and thus it is a struggle between proprietors and the craft of influences foreign to industry, and favouring the never-failing sources of distress and poverty. In the meantime it is the policy of the law to side with the fraudulent sub-division of land and bad cultivation: scarcity and periodically recurring famines are the necessary consequences."

DURING a considerable portion of winter, and in midsummer, many of the labourers are out of work, and although in winter they have some stock of potatoes, in summer they are most wretched. Mr. Fagan stated that he knew a person last July to have lived on three quarts of meal for 11 days.

They are driven by necessity to begging, but generally go to a distance for that purpose, and thus their children are habituated in great numbers to mendicancy, although it does not often occur that the girls are driven to prostitution. In the parish there are five instances of women having families being abandoned by their husbands.

There are no instances of their going to gaol to obtain food and shelter. An anxiety to relieve themselves from destitution did not appear to be the cause that stimulates to robberies, though they are often driven to thefts.

They get credit from the farmers generally at market prices, but sometimes at one-fourth more than the price, and thus being for the most part in debt, and unable to extricate themselves, they necessarily become reckless.

Farmers and gentlemen also often employ more labourers than they actually require, but never on absentees' estates.

Considering the wages of working people in the parish, and the various calls to be supplied, it was deemed impossible for them to lay up for the time when they had no work.

The more destitute, and therefore the more reckless, marry younger than those who have comforts; their usual language is, they cannot be worse.

In cases of previous connexion only, and then if the woman's character is otherwise good, the clergy advise marriage.

Rev. JAMES ALEXANDER, rector.—Rev. JOHN CURRAN, P. P.—GEORGE M. T. DROUGHT, esq., police magistrate.—MATTHEW KEEFFE, farmer.—DAVID MOORE, shopkeeper.—PETER PURDON, esq.

THE periods of the year during which a great portion of the labourers are unemployed, are, the winter, and from May to July; during these periods they very frequently suffer very great distress, "often starving on one meal a day." Mr. Purdon said, "The winter is not the worst time, as every man has a stock of potatoes, which generally lasts till May;" but from that time until July, when the new potatoes come in, there is very great distress.

There is no regular fund for giving relief. In some instances, when the labourers are so distressed, their families beg until employment recommences. Instances of women with children being deserted by their husbands are extremely rare. Instances have been known of persons having committed trifling offences for the purpose of being sent to prison, in order that they may obtain food and shelter.

Those who are out of work frequently obtain provisions on credit, and at a price materially above the rate of the market. This system, Matthew Keeffe said, is very injurious to the labourer, but he cannot do without it.

Sometimes in very scarce seasons the gentry employ more labourers than they require, from a desire to relieve distress, but it is not a custom do so.

It is impossible for the labouring classes to make any provision against a want of work. There is often a great recklessness observable among them, particularly with regard to marriage. Those who are most destitute marry earliest, to which, in cases of previous connexion, the clergy encourage them, but in no other case.

THERE is scarcely any employment from the middle of November to the middle of March. In May all are employed in planting potatoes either for themselves or the farmers. In harvest many are unemployed, as all then work for hire. A witness said, "During the seven months from March to November, the majority get on an average not two days work in the week, at wages averaging 6*d.* per day."

Mr. Egan and all the farmers said, "When the potatoes are dug out, they go over the fields again and dig out with their hands all the small potatoes, turning up the ground as pigs would; when these are all gone, their wives must beg for them."

Hugh Lanigan says, "At some seasons men often entreat to be allowed to work for their support alone. I could produce 40 persons who made no stipulations with their employers except for food, and anything else they may wish to give them; this year I could get men living in the parish, not strangers, to cut my harvest for their food alone. I was ashamed to give less than 5*d.* a day and their support."

Robert Kennedy, formerly weaver, now a labourer, says, "Three years ago I was very glad to work 13 weeks at 6*d.* a day without food; I had a wife and child. I got one day a single potato, which I brought home to my child to keep it from starving. I was at one time hard at work and 48 hours without food, except one potato, and I tried to 'kill the hunger with water.' I could get nothing, as I had overdrawn my wages; none of my family begged anything then, except from the Rev. Mr. Rolleston, who gave my wife 2*s.* 6*d.*: when she brought me food I could not eat it, my stomach had closed up against it. The spade often fell from my hand on the potato ridge from weakness. I did not send my wife to beg, I would starve rather than do so in our own country, and when we were driven to it we went to the Queen's County."

The labourers often get credit, in most instances at an increase of from 25 to 40 per cent.

JAMES DOHERTY says, "There is scarcely any employment from October to May. I am a cooper, and can earn at the best but 1*s.* 6*d.* a day for three or four days in the week from May to October. I may have that one week, and not 1*s.* the next. From October to May I can scarcely earn anything, as there is no butter made then, and I cannot sell my firkins. I have five children, the eldest a boy of 13 years, and not able to earn anything. They very seldom get enough to eat, but we are satisfied with whatever we can get.* I would be well content with 1*s.* 6*d.* a day, and would rather fast half the day than be confined." Michael Glynn gives the following statement: "I often have not worked a single day in the winter quarter. I did not get one day last winter, and spent the time in collecting manure for myself. While the potatoes last, we live on them; when they are out, we get credit."

The following evidence was given by Robert Walsh, weaver and labourer:

"About 20 years since I could earn at my trade 5*s.* a day; 15 years ago 4*s.*, and 10 years since about 1*s.* 6*d.* per day. I have done nothing at all these last three years, but for about two months last winter, when I earned 6*d.* per day. I have a wife and three children, and now live mostly by going among the neighbours and working for my food. If I get a day's work from one, should the next day come wet, he will not perhaps turn me out entirely. My wife draws water through the town, and will get perhaps a stone or half a stone of potatoes to bring home at night to the children. I pay 4*d.* a week rent for a house; I have no bed, but a little straw, and the roof is so bad, that whenever it rains hard at night we are obliged to get up, the floor and bed being flooded. I cannot now earn more than 6*d.* a week, do what I will. There is no prospect of employment until March. I do not know how to get on till then; it is all chance. I am six weeks on the church books, and get 10*d.* a week. We can never get more than two meals a day of potatoes; a man may eat three, and be poor enough. During the last summer we had often but one meal a day; we could never get through, but that my wife's mother, who is old, and not ashamed to do so, went to beg through the country. I would sooner starve than do so myself. I never did beg from any one but the Rev. Mr. Browne, who often gave me a couple of shillings. I have not a second shirt, and have had this coat these five years, and do not know how to get another. I got some weaving to do last winter, but on New Year's-day got sick, spitting blood; it was brought on by perspiring at my work, and getting cold in my cold house. I lost the work, as I was three months sick; it would have continued six months. There is nothing doing now in that way. I was supported in my illness by my mother-in-law begging, and got nothing to do at my trade since. Dr. Middleton told me I could be very well if I had proper food; the last I had was a potato and bit of salt herring."

George Reeves says, "I know a man who used to go into the country to cut sticks by the way, in order that he may be put into gaol." Robert Mears, turnkey, says, "I knew that man; he used to go in every winter for his support; he was transported since for felony." The Assistant Commissioners visited the county gaol, where Mr. Fielding, the governor, gave us the names of 25 individuals,† mostly young persons, and of both sexes, who within the last last 12 months had committed minor offences, chiefly, as he believed, to obtain the food and shelter of the prison. One fine lad of 17 years old was particularly pointed out to us as having been committed on the preceding day for stealing a fowl, avowedly with that view (he had been there before for several months); and when we contrasted the plenty, cleanliness and comfort of the gaol with the wretchedness of the cabins, we could not be astonished at the fact.

* This remark was elicited by the fact of the Assistant Commissioners having observed that the witness estimated the quantity of food necessary for the support of his family at a sum much less than they could conceive to be sufficient. On being pressed on this point, it became evident that he absolutely did not know how much food his family (if sufficiently fed) should consume, but, through long habit, was (as he said himself) "satisfied with whatever he could get." A remark made at a subsequent conversation, by a respectable individual, well acquainted with the habits of the lower classes, will perfectly illustrate the foregoing observations: "You are not to consider the people here as insufficiently fed, because they consume less food than those of the same rank in England; the fact is, they are accustomed to require less."

John Bracken, road contractor, says, "I employ many men at road work. I get contracts from the grand jury. I am paid myself but three times a year, and never till the work is done. I pay the men in provision, chiefly meal, which I get on credit myself, 2*s.* or 3*s.* above the market price, which advance I charge to the men. I give them 10*d.* a day, but of course deducting the 3*s.* a cwt. additional which they must pay for meal; it is much less; they prefer potatoes, but are obliged to take meal, as it is easier to be had and less liable to waste." Marriages take place much earlier among the most destitute than any other class. Rev. Joseph Gibson said, "Those who have nothing are by far the least cautious in taking on themselves the burthen of a family; they often marry and have not 6*d.* the next morning;" and the answer to any remonstrance invariably is, "We cannot be worse." Those who have some property will not marry without a portion, or a woman whose careful qualities are considered equal to one. Persons are also induced to marry with the hope of having a family to support them when they have become old and infirm: as was said, "they consider that when they have brought up a family, they have made a provision for their old age." Formerly it was a certain provision, but now the difficulty of support is so great they are often obliged to beg.

MR. YOUNG thought that half the labourers were unemployed six months in the year; Mr. Gibson, two months; Mr. Dowling, three months. They are not, however, reduced to fewer meals in the day, as every man has a store of potatoes.

Their wives and children do not beg. Neither they nor their families have committed offences in order to be sent to prison, nor have they been guilty of stealing to relieve themselves from want, or committed outrages on person or property for that purpose.

Credit is given to those who are out of work, but for this they pay very dear.

Gentlemen and farmers, at seasons of particular distress, employ more labourers than they require. On one occasion, when, by the influence of Mr. Browne, this course was adopted, "distress was entirely banished thereby." It would be impossible for the labouring population to make any provision against want of work; by the destitution to which they are constantly exposed, they must necessarily be rendered reckless. This feeling leads the most destitute to marry earlier than any other class, since they cannot suffer more by any change of circumstances. They often say, "they could not be worse." Those who are better off are more cautious in thus connecting themselves. An instance was given where a man with some little property refused to marry a woman, otherwise unobjectionable, because she had none. The clergy always encourage early marriages in cases of previous connexion.

FROM the 1st of June till the middle of August a portion of the labourers are out of work, during which period they are reduced to two scanty meals a day. There is no regular fund for their assistance.

When out of work, the smaller number of the wives and children beg through the neighbourhood; and when they once begin they stick to it, and get bad habits. Women having families are never abandoned by their husbands through distress, if not inclined to do so before.

No instance is known of able-bodied persons having committed trifling offences for the purpose of being sent to prison in order to obtain food and shelter, but it is thought such may have occurred. If a man had not a very strong mind, it must do a great deal of harm. Witnesses think that those driven to a prison do not often return to industrious habits, and would rather have them before. Persons will not consent to starve, when by the commission of an illegal act they obtain the shelter of such a place. One of the witnesses does not think a man ought; he would steal a loaf himself rather.

Some instances may have occurred of persons having been guilty of robberies, with a view to relieving themselves from a state of destitution; but none know of outrage on persons for the purpose of preventing starvation; nothing but real hunger would induce a man to do so. Mr. Dalton often wonders that people are so honest, and many of them so very poor. Those who are out of work and are honest, obtain provisions on credit till they are again employed, in both country and town, chiefly from the employers; but in many cases it would be difficult. In most cases they are not charged materially above the money prices; but when credit is got from hucksters, they are, especially in summer; under such circumstances, the labourer is constantly in difficulties, with little hope of extricating himself.

Some gentlemen may, but the farmers in general cannot afford to employ more workmen than they really want, from a wish to alleviate the distressed. There is no such thing as a labour-rate in operation here. A man who gets 6 d. a day and his diet may be enabled to make a sufficient provision against a want of work; but a man who is paid entirely in money, cannot. In town the labouring people are rendered reckless by the constant recurrence of destitution, but not so in the country. Small farmers marry earlier than other classes; the cottier cannot, from want of any sufficiency in prospect.

A reckless people, or those who have little knowledge of comfort, seeing the impossibility of greater misery, are careless in contracting improvident marriage.

They commit a kind of murder in that way, not one day having plenty or enough of anything. Those who are well off, who know some comfort, calculate more; that is, the man who has from 20 to 30 acres. The clergy, in case of previous connexion, encourage early marriage.

The rates of wages, with diet 6 d., and 10 d. without; a good workman may reckon on employment at such rate from two-thirds to three-fourths of the year.

In many instances, where he has not land, the labourer's wife and children are often forced to beg, from his inability to support them on such wages. The small bits of land are set at double the large farms.

The largest number in family known to derive their entire support from such rate, with ordinary prices of food and land, five, not more; their food consists in potatoes and buttermilk, of which they seldom get enough; their children are very often so destitute of clothing as to be prevented by shame from going out of doors.

The lowest wages on which a man with three children could maintain himself throughout the year, without land, 10 d. per day.

THERE is less work for labourers in winter than in summer, but they are not therefore reduced to fewer meals in the day, for they generally have a sufficiency of potatoes from autumn until the end of spring. There is no regular fund out of which they receive assistance.

When out of work and food, the wife and children go about the neighbourhood to beg, which of course habituates to mendicancy a large portion of the rising population. Women and girls are not often driven to prostitution on the failure of work in the family. Women having families are very seldom abandoned by their husbands.

An instance has not been heard of able-bodied persons and their families committing minor offences, with the view of obtaining such food and shelter as a prison affords. Persons who have been once driven to take shelter in a prison, in many instances return to industrious habits. It does not seem credible that any such case can arise, where a person would be placed in the alternative of starving or of committing an illegal act to obtain the shelter and food of a prison.

Mr. Bolton has known persons reduced to one meal a day who had an opportunity of stealing food, yet did not do so. Those who have been left destitute have not been guilty of outrage on person for the purpose of preventing starvation.

Credit for provisions to persons out of work for a time is given both in country and town, and generally by their employers. The loan-fund system is rapidly doing away with the custom of individuals lending. When provisions are given on credit, it is not usual to sell them materially higher than the money price. Usurious charges are considered shameful: they are scarcely ever made except to those who are employed at county work, who can always afford it. The instances are not many where a labourer, from getting credit, is kept so constantly in debt, and with so little hope of extricating himself, that he becomes reckless.

The gentry occasionally employ more labourers than they actually require, in order to relieve distress, but the farmers do not. There never has been here a labour-rate in operation. It is not thought that the wages of labourers, considering the calls upon them by their destitute relations and friends, can possibly admit, in ordinary circumstances, of their laying by a sufficient provision against a want of work. The labouring classes do not become reckless by the constant recurrence of destitution through the want of employment or high prices of provisions. The cottiers and small farmers marry earlier than the other classes. A reckless people, or a people who have little knowledge of comfort, and seeing the possibility of greater misery, are reckless in contracting improvident marriages; and in proportion to the wretchedness of the working classes are they inclined or disinclined to early marriage, for those who have been always well off, and have experienced some comfort, are undoubtedly less disposed to marriage than those who have never known anything but extreme extreme wretchedness. The clergy encourage early marriages in case of previous connexion. The rate of wages is 6 d. a day with diet, and without diet, from 9 d. to 10 d. in the country; it is somewhat higher in the towns; and from the beginning of August till the beginning of May, the majority can get work at such prices. Agricultural employment is as great now as formerly. They are not frequently obliged to send a part of a large family to beg from inability to support them on such wages, for nearly all can get employment three days in the week, and there is a considerable demand for female labour. Nine is the largest number in family, with land, known to derive their support from such wages; their only food is potatoes, of which they have two or three meals a day. The children are not frequently so destitute of clothing as to be prevented by shame from going out of doors.

Tenpence a day is the lowest wages upon which a man could support himself, a wife and three children, throughout the year without land. From 8 l. to 10 l. per acre is the usual rent charged to a cottier tenant when the land is given to him manured, but sometimes it is given for the sake of a certain quantity of manure agreed to be used on the ground. In such cases a house is not supposed to be given with the ground. There is not one pawnbroker in this district. There is a savings' bank in the town for the circumjacent neighbourhood. WINTER is the season at which a portion of the labourers is out of work; they are not at that time stinted in their meals. There is no fund from which they could receive assistance.

They very rarely beg about the neighbourhood. The women and girls are not driven to prostitution, nor are there any instances where women having families are abandoned by their husbands.

No instance is known where an able-bodied person has committed a trifling offence in order to obtain support in prison; they would suffer much sooner than take such a course. Very few steal to relieve themselves from destitution, nor are they ever guilty of outrages on persons to obtain relief.

Those who are without work get provisions on credit till they obtain employment: they generally get an advance from their employers. In the barony of Forth there are few labourers who are not occupiers of land. The prices at which they obtain provision are from 12 to 20 per cent. above the money price at the time the credit is given. The labourer is thus kept in debt, and rendered reckless.

Some charitable persons, in seasons of peculiar distress, employ more labourers than they require. This is not the practice on absentee estates. No labour-rate has ever been in operation. The wages of the labouring population hardly ever enable them to provide against a want of work.

The poor in general marry earlier, but the almost destitute are not so likely to marry young as the grade somewhat above them. There is little prudential consideration on this head. The very lowest marry earlier, as if their condition could not be rendered worse by the incumbrance of families. The clergy always encourage early marriage, in case of previous connexion.

The rate of wages in the country is 10 d.; in the town, 1 s. 2 d. A labourer may reckon on employment at this rate for nine months in the year. On such wages they are very seldom obliged to send a part of the family to beg. Six is the largest number in a family which is known to receive their entire support from such wages. They are not stinted in their food. In this part of the country the children are rarely so destitute of clothing as to be ashamed to go out of doors.

The land in the hands of cottier tenants is not sufficient to give them food and pay their rent. They generally pay the rent by giving their labour to the middle-men. The surplus labour is the only source whence they can look for clothing and food for at least one-third of the year. The lowest wages on which, without land, a man could support himself, a wife and three children, is 20 l. The usual rent per acre charged to cottier tenants is 3 l.

It does not often occur that they commit minor offences for the purpose of being sent to gaol; and though when they are sent to prison they must suffer in morals, yet the evils are greatly lessened since the improvement in prison discipline.

There are many instances of stealing for the purpose of relieving themselves from want, but none of outrage. To the question whether society would not be improved by giving them a direct subsistence it was answered, No, the evils of the present system are particular, the evils of a provision would be general.

They get credit from hucksters, and advance of wages from employers until they get work, although in a great majority of instances a feeling of honour ensures the payment; yet it is a heavy weight round the neck of a struggling man.

Neither gentlemen nor farmers employ to any extent more labourers than they want, nor in a single instance has it happened on the estate of an absentee. No labour-rate has ever been in operation in the parish. The want of employment and dearness of provisions often drives the labourer to recklessness; nor would it be possible for him, looking to wages and the calls on him, to provide against the want of work. The poorer class marry earlier than others; there seems to be an inclination to marry improvidently in proportion to their wants and destitution. In case of previous connexion, the clergy invariably encourage marriage. The rate of wages in town is 1*s.* a day; in the country, from 6*d.* to 10*d.* with food, being equal to the support of five in family; this lasts for two-thirds of the year. The quality of their food is potatoes and buttermilk, two meals a day; very often the children are almost without any clothing. The usual rent is from about 40*s.* to 60*s.* an acre for land with a cabin. In Enniscorthy there is but one pawnbroker, nor was one ever known till within the last ten years. There is a savings' bank; the total amount of deposits, 6,000*l.*

FOR about three months in winter the labourers in this parish may be out of work; for the other nine months of the year employment is to be had at 10*d.* a day, without food.

Sometimes, when a labourer's family is very large, and his store of food consumed, his wife and children are driven to beg about the country, and thus many of the young population are initiated in habits of vagrancy; but there are no instances of men, from want of employment, abandoning their families.

There are no instances of men committing depredations for the purpose of being sent to gaol, to get food and shelter there; yet certainly men will not consent to starve, though they will suffer much privation before they commit a breach of law. In this district it has not been known that destitution has driven any persons to commit either thefts or outrages.

Labourers in the country get credit from the farmers, but in town no such system prevails.

It never has been the custom here to employ more labourers than actually required, in order to relieve them when work is scarce; neither would it be possible for a labourer to lay by any provision against such time, as the witnesses say that not less than 1*s.* a day constantly would enable a man to support and clothe himself and family; and it too often happens, that when a family is very large, some of them are obliged to go out to beg, and others are almost destitute of clothing. On the point of marriage, it did not seem to the witnesses that the poorest were the most anxious to marry; but of course they said that recklessness and poverty brought about improvidence in this matter, as in everything else. The priest encourages marriage in cases of previous connexion.

THE periods at which work is most scarce is about a month in summer and a month in winter, during which intervals the labourers are reduced to fewer meals, as there is no fund out of which they can receive any relief until employment comes round again.

When the labourers are out of work, their wives and children are often obliged to beg; so that a large number of the rising population are thus initiated in habits of mendicancy.

When out of work, a man of good character gets provision on credit, generally from his employer; and whenever he is charged more than market price, it is considered extortion; but the system of credit keeps the labourer constantly in debt, and never permits him "to raise his head above water."

The system of employing more labourers than are actually required does not exist here at all; neither could the wages of the district enable a labourer to lay by a provision against the want of employment; "so that," says Mr. Sparrow, "they must be both destitute and reckless."

In this parish there is full employment nearly all the year round for the labourers, at wages of from 10*d.* to 1*s.* in summer, and from 6*d.* to 8*d.* in winter. The class of persons who marry earliest are the farmers' servants; and according as they are poorer so are they more inclined to marry. The greater number of labourers in the parish are altogether without employment for more than half the year, spring and harvest being the only periods at which labour is in demand; the latter end of March for the setting of potatoes, April, May and June in spring, and August, September, October, and part of November in autumn; but in these months there are frequent interruptions, and by no means continued employment for all. Wages are nominally about 6*d.* a day for the short days, and 7*d.* or 8*d.* for the long ones, and never rise beyond 10*d.* or 11*d.*, even in harvest. Mr. Hynes employs several men, even at 6*d.*, throughout the year; and their condition is considered enviable by the labourers who depend on casual employment; for it is calculated that, putting the setting and digging of potatoes, and sowing and reaping altogether, there are few persons occupied for more than four months in the year. Of the unemployed months, July is by far the severest for the working man. His stock of con-acre potatoes is then nearly exhausted, and the price of potatoes is then at the highest; and if the number of his meals suffer no reduction, they become more scanty, and he is obliged to do without the addition even of a little milk. Mr. Hynes thought that the labourer was at all times under-fed; for while he allows himself but two full meals at home, though employed, he is able to eat three when dieted by the persons for whom he works. There is no fund of any kind to assist the working man; and were it not for some con-acre, and what he gets upon credit, he must starve. "As it is," said Serjeant Norton, "it is a miracle to me, who am accustomed to England, how the most of them live at all; and yet," said he, "except in peculiarly scare seasons, neither their wives nor children are to be seen begging; at least openly. They may go to a neighbour's to borrow a lock of potatoes, but nothing more." The women and girls are never known to be driven to prostitution when work fails the rest of the family, nor have there been any instances known of women being abandoned, with their families, by their husbands.

The able-bodied and their families have never been known to have committed any offences for the purpose of being sent to gaol; and Serjeant Norton very fairly remarked, that there was "not a bridewell within 20 miles to tempt them."

In ordinary seasons, thefts of potatoes are not common; but when there has been a failure in the crop, Mr. Hynes has been obliged to house both his turnips and his potatoes; and he has frequently seen people stealing the leaves of mangel wurzel, which of course he did not prevent. As to outrages arising from destitution, it was considered that those which characterize the "Terry Alt system" were almost entirely the result of a dread on the part of the labouring population of impending starvation; for their object seemed in most cases to have been attained, when they had so far rendered themselves masters of pasture ground as to be enabled to turn it up for the purpose of planting potatoes; and much jealousy still prevails towards those who keep their land extensively in grass.—(Hynes.)

When out of employment, the labourer is obliged periodically to involve himself in debt, by taking provisions on credit, for which he pays in all instances an exorbitant interest. The usual persons who lend on these occasions are middling farmers; but none refuse to do so who have a surplus of potatoes; and it is seldom that an offer of an advance of less than one-third on the market price will procure a poor man this kind of accommodation for a period of not more than three or four months. And Scanlan observed, that the matter goes much farther than acquiring the potatoes at an unfair price; for as the labourer has no money to pay for them, he is obliged to give his labour on account, and is often allowed only at the rate of 4*d.* a day for it. O'Loughlin, the labourer's wife, showed the tally or notched stick on which she kept the reckoning, or number of days which her husband had given her employer for a load of potatoes borrowed last August. Since that time, she assured them that he had not received the value of a single day's labour in money. He had also got on credit a bonnuff (a young pig) in September, when they cost for cash in hand only 3*s.*, but he was obliged to pay 7*s.* 6*d.* for it, when it was sold to him in that way. The labourer in this manner becomes insolvent to a degree that leaves him very little hope of extricating himself from debt; he makes little exertion to free himself, and he is ultimately rendered perfectly reckless.

There has never been any plan tried here in the nature of a labour-rate, nor have the landlords in the slightest degree endeavoured to alleviate the distress of the unemployed, by setting them at work, which did not hold out a prospect of immediate profit. A few years ago, in the summer, when potatoes had become dear, Mr. Hynes contrived to find occupation for a few men in addition to those whom he would otherwise have required; and though he paid but 5*d.* a day, he said he never in his life saw people so grateful as those whom he selected on that occasion.

It is clear from the evidence detailed above, and it is expressly asserted by the witnesses, that it is not in the power of a labouring man to save anything as a provision against a want of work, or any other contingency.

With regard to the proneness of the labouring classes to contract early and improvident marriages, and the causes which lead to this disposition, Scanlan remarked, that it is always the poorest who marry the earliest, especially poor boys and girls who live in other people's houses, and get tired of working for strangers, and wish to have a home of their own. Mr. Hogan has known the parish priest demand higher fees than usual, in order to deter indigent persons of this class from marrying, but without effect; the sum, whatever it was, has been borrowed or procured in some way or other. The sons of farmers who have been accustomed to greater comforts, generally remain single for a much longer time than others, and will not marry without some portion. It is, however, considered most desirable by farmers that their daughters should be settled when young, that they may be withdrawn from the dangers and schemes to which their fortunes expose them—(Hogan.)

FROM the month of November till the month of March, that is, from the digging of the potatoes in autumn, and the setting of them in spring, and during the sowing of corn, there is little or no employment for the labourer, neither are there any improvements in progress which could afford occupation during the winter, when that arising from husbandry has ceased. A few men earn a small pittance by a fatiguing and dangerous voyage up the Shannon to Limerick with boat-loads of turf; but even in this way they cannot obtain more than 6*d.* a day. Mr. Sheehy calculated that there were about 200 men altogether in the parish who, having no con-acre, depended entirely on labour; of these nearly 100 in the winter are totally unable to find it; and the remainder obtain it only occasionally from large farmers, or from the few gentlemen who reside in the parish. The greater number of labourers, however, have some portion of con-acre; but as the rent of this is to be paid in labour, labour may be looked upon as nearly their sole means of existence. "Our only resource," said Ginehan, "during winter is to do with a dry potato, sometimes without salt; during that time we look to the muck potatoes (the produce of the con-acre). I have as much potatoes now as will do me until Christmas; after that I do not expect more than one day's work in the week, and if that does not do, my wife must go out and ask something from the farmers, while I stay at home to mind the children. Last Christmas I had saved a pound, from being employed in a lighter, which was better work than at the spade; but this year I have not a penny. Winter is the worst time for the labouring man." This poor man hesitated to describe the circumstances in which he was placed; and another labourer who was present observed, "The truth is, a man is ashamed to tell before his neighbours half the misery and misfortune he goes through in private."

Mr. Sheehy said, that indiscriminate beggary had not been observed by him since he came to the parish, even at the periods of most distress; at such times the wife will perhaps privately go to such individuals as she is best known to, and will get some potatoes. He stated positively that prostitution never had been traced by him to temporary destitution. However, another bad consequence has been known to arise from it, that of husbands quitting the country entirely, and leaving their families to struggle on as well as they could. Some months ago one James Kelly secretly left that place, and after some time a letter was received received from him from America, saying that he could not bear to look on his wife and children crying every day for the want of a meal.

In answer to the question whether offences had ever been committed for the purpose of getting into gaol, Major Ross Lewin answered, that as a magistrate he had never reason to suspect that any such thing had occurred. There is no bridewell in Kildysart, and the county gaol being at considerable distance, the people are in general unacquainted with the treatment adopted there, which is certainly superior to what the labourer ever enjoys at home. It is very unlikely, however, that any person would consent to starve when, by committing an illegal act, he could obtain the shelter of a prison: if any person were driven to such an extremity, it would have been cheaper for society to have given him those means of subsistence at first which would have rendered it unnecessary for him to have resorted to such a stratagem.

Advantage is often taken of a labourer who is out of employment to charge him an exorbitant price for the potatoes he may require when the produce of his con-acre is exhausted. Mr. Sheehy said, that he proclaims the practice as usurious, but that the persons who hold over their stock till the end of the summer, in expectation of a rise of price, do not mind him. The assistant barrister also endeavours to check the system by applying the closest scrutiny to all suits arising out of it, but hitherto without success. John Carrig, a labourer, said, "If I had cash last July, I could have got potatoes at $1\frac{1}{2}$ d. a stone; but I had none, and I was afterwards obliged to give at the rate of $2\frac{1}{2}$ d. The only way I had to pay was by giving work; I was allowed 8 d. a day, and was obliged to begin immediately: this we call getting potatoes against time." The people are well aware of the exorbitant interest they pay for a short accommodation of this kind, and have not recourse to it until necessity compels them to do so. Hurley said that they will often pawn their clothes and furniture first, and even sell their pig, on which their sole dependance lies for paying their rent, at less than two-thirds of the price they would get for it if they were able to keep it until it was fat. Carrig described the effect which debt thus incurred had upon him, "as a weight that broke down his spirits, that he felt he was giving his body's labour for nothing; but a man would do anything rather than starve. All the time he was working out the potatoes he got last July, he had but two meals a day, and my children should have the same; if they had not, they would screech, and he could not stand that."

No person in the parish ever employs more labourers than he requires, and, from the low price of agricultural produce, the farmers are rather inclined to dispense with some of their present workmen. "Perhaps," said M'Namara, "Mr. Scott of Cahircon is an exception to this remark; but then his supernumerary workmen are his own tenants, who pay their rents in labour." The ordinary wages of the country are 8 d. a day in summer and 6 d. a day in winter, and in both seasons without diet, and no man gets more than eight months' employment in the year. The lowest price of con-acre ground is 5*l.* an acre, and the smallest cabin is 30*s.* a year. With these data, therefore, it is unnecessary to say that it would be next to impossible for a labourer to save anything. The low rate of remuneration for labour, and the worse than indigent condition in which the labouring classes usually are, tend to produce a conviction in them that nothing can make them worse off, and render them in the end reckless, or at least indifferent as to what their future lot may be. Mr. Sheehy observed, that it was difficult to say whether the early and improvident marriages of the peasantry, which contribute so much to the aggravation of poverty, are the result or in part the cause of this recklessness. That it is sometimes the cause would appear from the fact, that individuals have been pointed out to the Assistant Commissioners who had been industrious and had saved some little money when single, and who, having married without sufficient resources, soon squandered their savings, are now notorious for their idleness. In the agricultural population of this parish there are not very distinct classes. There are few farms over 12 acres, and the sons of a man holding a farm of that size will, by the division of it into small lots, become eventually nothing more than cottiers. All are poor, and all of them but too prone to premature matches, but decidedly the more prone in proportion to their destitution. As for the labourer, he seems to think he never can get married early enough. A farmer's son will wait till he gets a fortune, or till he settles his sisters; but with the labourer, an acquaintance begun the night before at a wake or a dance is sometimes consolidated the next morning into matrimony. "Not long ago," said he, "a girl of about 13 came down from the mountains with a young lad of 19 or 20, and wanted me to marry them, which I refused; and the very next night the mother of the girl came, and insisted upon being married to the same man who had proposed to be the bridegroom of her own daughter. I complied, and the mother said that either she or her daughter should have a husband, in order to have somebody to look after their acre of ground." Mr. O'Grady observed, that there was reason to think that the wish to have children, on whom they could depend in their old age, was an inducement to marry with some, but not so much with the young people, who do not often give themselves time to make such calculations as with those rather advanced in life. He has heard it observed, when a destitute unmarried person has been seen begging, "What a fool she was not to have got married, and she would have had children to keep her from that line of life."

P.—Mr. MORONY, postmaster.—MICHAEL MURROUGH, farmer of 11 acres.—PATRICK MURROUGH, land surveyor, and a farmer holding 10 acres.—JOHN OWENS, grocer.

FROM the month of December until March there is nearly a total cessation of agricultural labour. It was attempted to ascertain from the persons present the number of hands unemployed during that interval, when Kearny exclaimed, "There is no use in talking about the proportion of employed to the unemployed. I hold some hundred acres of land, and I can tell you that there are absolutely none employed at that time, except upon their own account." Again, from the middle of June until August, it is calculated that a man could not procure more than two days' work in the week; this latter season is by far the worst for the labouring man, because potatoes have then become scarce, and have reached their highest price, just before the digging of the early crop. The labourer is then not only restricted in the number of his daily meals, which fall from three to two, and sometimes even to one, but impending starvation compels him not unfrequently to anticipate his harvest, and to dig his potatoes when they are not only unripe, but unwholesome. There is no regular fund of any kind for the relief of periodical distress recurring from these causes, either arising from the labourers' own contributions to benefit societies or from the benevolence of the wealthier classes.

In seasons of peculiar scarcity the wives and children of many labourers have no alternative but to beg about the neighbourhood. Of late years, however, potatoes have been cheap and plentiful even in summer; but still as wages for labour are with difficulty procured at that time, the effect to the poor man is the same; and Murrogh said he knew some men whose wives had left the parish of Kilmurry the last July to beg, as he was convinced, and who had not then returned (in November). There were no instances known of the wives or children of this class being driven to prostitution, nor of women being abandoned by their husbands from distress.

Mr. Davoren stated, that he had never any reason to suspect that they or their families had ever committed offences for the purpose of being sent to gaol; and he owned that he was the more surprised at this when he considered the contrast between the diet and lodging of the independent labourer, and the condition of the prisoners in the county gaol. Mr. Morony observed, that one could hardly expect that they would starve sooner than seek the shelter of the gaol by these means; but still many did die of starvation in 1822, who were not known to have committed any illegal act.

Thefts of potatoes from the pits in which they are generally stored in the fields, are not unfrequent, but the offenders are seldom detected, as the offence is committed silently, and at night; however, suspicion rather falls on the evil-disposed. There were no cases of outrages on the person, arising from destitution.

As for the labourer who will not beg by means of his wife, or apply underhand to some friendly neighbour, there is no mode of existence for him when he is out of work, and is not so fortunate as to have any of his con-acre potatoes remaining, but to borrow potatoes on credit from some person who may be willing to trust him.—(Murrogh and Molony). He considers himself lucky if he finds such a person, though the interest which he is constrained to pay is always enormous, and rarely less than 100 per cent. per annum. The lenders are more generally middle-sized farmers than large ones: farm servants also who have been permitted to plant a portion of their master's ground, are enabled to speculate in this manner, as they are always dieted in addition to their wages, and being generally unmarried, can dispose of all their produce. Several labourers concurred in stating, that the ordinary overcharge for potatoes under this system was one halfpenny; that is, that when they were 2*d.* a stone in the market, they were charged 2½*d.* by the lenders for three months' credit, which is at the rate of interest mentioned above. Mr. Maguane, however, observed, that on the whole this system was losing ground, and was at any rate not so extensive there as elsewhere, in consequence of the general abundance of potatoes produced by the application of sea manure.

It has never been attempted to alleviate the distresses of the poor, even by the least expensive mode of giving them employment when it was not absolutely necessary. And Clancy observed, that, on the contrary, every one endeavours even in summer to do with as few labourers as he can. It was admitted, however, on all hands, that at the present amount of employment, and the ordinary rate of wages, it would be utterly impossible for the labourer to save anything; and Mr. Maguane observed, that he does not attribute this to improvidence, for formerly when wages were not higher, but the population less, and therefore a greater facility of finding employment, a good many to his knowledge had placed their little savings in the banks; and when these failed, they lost everything, and their economy became a loss.

With regard to improvident marriages, it appears that the labouring classes marry earlier now than formerly, and that their recklessness on this point has in some measure kept pace with with their increasing destitution. "Of all people," said Mr. Maguane, "I know none so prone to matrimony as farm servants, who have not only no provision for themselves or their probable families, but, being frequently strangers in the parish, cannot even look to a house to shelter them." And Kearny observed, that he remembered the time when a man would not take a wife unless he got some fortune, however small, with her; "but now," said he, "it is no uncommon thing that a couple have not the amount of the clergyman's fees between them, and the bridegroom is often obliged to pass his note for that sum." It was remarked, that notwithstanding the increasing difficulty of finding the money, the sum now charged for performing the ceremony has risen considerably; and Crow, the old beggarman, said that he was married for 15 s. many years ago, while Murrogh stated that no labouring man would now be married under 1 l. 8 s. 6 d., and that he knew persons who had not worked out that debt incurred by passing a bill, and which is often paid in labour, for 12 months after marriage. He said that he was not acquainted with any labourer past the age of 40 who had remained a bachelor.

FROM November to March there will be scarcely anything to do for the labourer, except in January, when he will be employed for a short time in sowing wheat. At the end of March and the beginning of April potatoes will be set, and then he will have some little work. From May to September he will every now and then get some little employment, so as to enable him to earn a little. The new roads through this part of the country have been of some use; several persons have been engaged in them temporarily, who expressed themselves very thankful for the 7½ d. per day they were enabled to earn. In this parish, as well as in many adjoining ones, there are but few labourers solely depending on their daily hire; by far the most numerous portion have a little con-acre. In summer, however, they are in the habit of reducing their meals to two, whilst at other times they can barely afford themselves three.

The people in this district, though reduced to great distress at times, and particularly in 1822, were never known to commit an offence for the purpose of going to gaol. The system of discipline at the Ennis gaol is extremely perfect, and holds out no inducement to persons to get into it. All concur in saying, that since the Terry Alt system in 1830-31, comparatively few crimes have been perpetrated in this extensive county, which is now considered one of the most peaceful counties in Ireland.

The credit system does not prevail to any great extent in this parish. "When we get potatoes on trust, we work out the loan of them by labour with the farmers, who are very hard on us; they make us work like slaves, and this we must do to keep in favour with them."—(M'Mahon.)——M'Mahon further says, "It is always the poorest man marries first, because he knows he cannot be worse off by it; it is better for him to marry early than to seduce the girls, who are so poor and wretched that this would often happen. Besides, we poor people have a strange idea that it is a good thing to have children as soon as possible, in order to help and support us when we begin to grow old." In answer to the question whether labourers become old and disabled before other people, M'Mahon replied, "We are worked harder and worse treated than the slaves in the colonies; I understand they are taken care of by their masters when they are sick or old. When we are sick, we must die on the road, if the neighbours do not help us. When we are old, we must go out to beg, if the young ones cannot help us, and that will soon happen with us all. We are getting worse and worse every day, and the landlords are kicking us out of every little holding we have. This last May 28 families were put out, and next May I am sure there will be as many again within five miles of Kilkea; and if something is not done for those who are turned out upon the world without a rag on their backs, God knows what will happen in this country! When we suffer all these hardships, is it wonderful our spirits should be broken down; that we should grow grey, and give up the spark at 58 or 60? If we were kindly treated, there is not a man amongst us that could not work till he was 70 or 75, ages at which I see many of the farmers doing a good deal of work."

O'BRIEN says, "At all times of the year a large number of able-bodied men are out of work; but in summer there is the greatest scarcity of employment, the poor are then reduced to the greatest extremity, and are obliged to put up with just as much food as will keep body and soul together; many is the man who thinks himself well off at that time with one meal a day."

Mr. Parker says that the men about him would refuse any gratuitous relief, but that the women are not so particular; however, both sexes are annoyed at an inquiry into their distress, and think it an intrusion.

Mr. Martin, a magistrate: "Has not known any crimes to be committed for the purpose of going to gaol; but when persons have been sentenced at petty sessions to imprisonment, he has heard some of them exclaim, 'I do not mind that, there is good food and lodging there.' He thinks, however, that this was in bravado."

"Credit is what kills us," says M'Donnell: "I paid last July 17*s.* for one cwt. of meal, when the market price was 13*s.*, for two months and a half's credit. Mr. Purdon went security for us with a miller; he has our blessing, and peace be to his soul."

Pat Curtis, two years ago, gave 2*l.* a barrel for potatoes, and all the time they were only 22*s.* in hand in the market; he only got three months' credit; he was processed the very first sessions, and paid. The practice of lending on exorbitant interest is very prevalent, and the people think it an advantage. "What else would we do if we did not get credit? we would starve." Yet, though this practice does not make them reckless, they complain that they feel the debt like a weight round their necks.

The gentry or farmers do not employ more labourers than they require; but in 1830, a period of great distress, a small portion of the road was repaired, and paid for out of a subscription fund. The only labourers that can ever save are the farm servants; but when they marry, their condition soon becomes the same as that of the other labourers. The Assistant Commissioners directed their inquiries towards ascertaining whether the poverty of the people had not the effect of making them reckless; and when they considered the extreme misery of the people, they were only surprised at the peace and order which prevailed in the parish. Some years ago, the peasantry were driven to desperation by want; and never looking farther than to a supply of potatoes, they became impressed with the idea that their privations arose from the land being kept in pasture that ought to be let out to them in con-acre; many outrages ensued, and much grass land was broke up against the will of the proprietors; but after some time the pressure of destitution passed away, and the peasantry are again completely quiet. With regard to early marriage, the answers of the roman-catholic rector were not a little contrary to what has been generally stated elsewhere. He says, that early marriages are not confined to any class of the agricultural population, and that farmers in good circumstances are as prone to urge the early settlement of their children as labourers are to get matches for themselves.

Formerly abduction, if not common, was very much apprehended, and many plans were laid to get possession of a girl who had a fortune; through fear of this, a farmer was anxious to get his daughter married out of harm's way. "A labouring couple marries," says Mr. Vaughan, "that whatever they have may be kept together, and because they are tired of living on another man's floor." There were, however, many mechanics of the middle period of life who had remained single, and who say that they would be glad to marry if they could afford it. Mr. O'Brien remarks, "A man is considered stale at 30, and a woman at 20."

Archdean WHITTY, protestant rector, and justice of the peace.—Mechanics, labourers and others, besides the above, were examined by the Assistant Commissioners.

THERE is scarcely any employment for labourers from Christmas-day until St. Patrick's-day, the 17th of March; and then again in July they have nothing at all to do. When Higgins, a labourer, was asked what he generally eat during these months, he said, "I give you my word and honour, I was working the whole of this day upon a dry potato, which I had at 11 o'clock, and I had nothing more until I came home, when it was duskish." And upon Mr. Daly, his employer, being appealed to upon the truth of this man's statement, he exclaimed, "Nothing was ever more true than what he has said; and I can add, that I believe a great many labourers in the town of Ennistymon are just now living upon exactly the same scale." Lysaght, another labourer, said, "Frequently, during the summer, I can only afford two meals a day, and these scanty ones. During the hard long days of last summer, an odd day on and off, I was working for an estated man the whole day upon one pennyworth of bread without any kitchen, and at the end of the day I would get 10*d.* for my hire; potatoes were then 4*d.* a stone, and I had seven, besides myself, at home." There is no fund of any kind out of which the labourer might receive assistance during these periodical seasons of scarcity, and of want of employment.

The wives and children of those out of employment sometimes go away about the beginning of July, and remain out until the beginning of August; and this they must sometimes do, according to Higgins, or starve. When Finn was asked whether, under such circumstances, a certain portion of the population must not become habituated to mendicancy, he sharply replied, "Sure, you know she would never leave the little family; it would pinch her too much to the heart." There were no instances known there of women with families being abandoned by their husbands, nor of the young girls being driven to prostitution from want.

Lysaght said, when asked whether the poor were ever known to commit thefts in order to obtain the shelter of a gaol, "I know there are many who would stretch themselves down and die sooner than commit a shilling's worth of crime in order to get into prison;" and all the witnesses agreed that they had never known an individual who committed an offence for that purpose.

The system of obtaining provisions on credit is not so prevalent in that district as it used to be formerly, owing to the numerous cases of insolvency. Such is the distress of the labouring population in that of part of the country, that no labourer is ever allowed now to take his potato crop off the ground until the rent is paid, or good security given for it. He never would be permitted to do so on his own responsibility. This observation applies more to the ordinary class of labourers than to those who are in the employment of farmers and landholders; "and these," as Mr. Daly said, "are few indeed." According to Carrig also, the condition of the working and labouring population was so bad that worse it could not be; and he was afraid to say that they would hazard anything to better it, and of course they are always open to excitement and temptation.

There was no labour-rate ever heard of in that part of the country, nor was such a humane feeling ever known as to have the gentry or farmers employ more labourers than they actually required, from a desire to relieve distress. A man, in fact, is only employed there when he is absolutely wanted, and it was considered utterly impossible that labouring men could make any provision against a want of work, when the calls on them by their destitute friends were taken into consideration.

In answer to the question whether one class are inclined to marry earlier than another, Mr. James Keane, a farmer, said, "The women always want to get married because they are so poor, and they know they are open to temptation. I often hear the people say, we must get this poor girl married soon, to get her out of harm's way." It has also been invariably remarked there, that those who have a few comforts marry later in life than the generality of the poor people.

In illustration of the great anxiety of the labouring population in general to avail themselves of work whenever employment is to be had, Higgins, the labourer, mentioned an interesting fact to the Commissioners, which was allowed on all hands to be correct. "In the year 1822, (a period fresh in the recollections of the inhabitants of that country,) when they were making a road there, the overseer worked some of the best labourers too hard, and they were obliged to discontinue working for the day. No sooner, however, were they dismissed than another set of men, who had long been watching the work, offered themselves with the greatest joy, and willingly accepted so small a remuneration as 2*d.* for a quarter or half a day; and even had they been turned off, there were plenty more standing by quite ready to fall into the gang."

Mr. WALSH, roman-catholic rector.

FROM December to March the greater number of the labourers of this parish are without employment; a little work may sometimes be had at this period from a gentleman, and the mending and making of roads will occasionally afford a few days' employment to a small number of labourers, who are happy indeed to get 6 d. or 8 d., the usual remuneration on roads. It is in June or July that the labourer has to suffer most; then his condition is indeed deplorable; no work, and from the high price of food, he can scarcely keep body and soul together. "In July we must keep ourselves on dry potatoes, without any salt or milk, and divide the quantity we usually eat at one meal into two."—(Halloran.) —— There is no fund to assist the labourers when out of employment or when food is dear; his con-acre and the provisions he can get on credit are the only resources he has then to look to.

Mr. Fitzgerald could not possibly tell how labourers managed at those periods to keep their wives and children from begging; but true it is, that seldom or never are they known in this part of the country to become beggars during this period, neither do the wives or daughters become prostitutes, nor does want ever induce a man to leave his family and abscond.

The able-bodied in this parish have never been known to have committed any offence for the purpose of being sent to gaol.

The credit system is not so popular as it used to be formerly, when people were richer; they could always, when in want, procure potatoes on credit, by paying a little more than the market price, but now the agricultural classes are so distressed the farmers will not trust the labourers. Occasionally, when they think a man solvent, they give him credit, and charge him most exorbitant interest, frequently cent. per cent.

Neither gentlemen nor farmers are in the habit here of employing more labourers than they actually want. About five years ago, when great local distress was felt, a committee was formed to receive subscriptions, with a view to give employment: it was generally found that the residents came forward readily enough to assist this laudable object, but the non-residents not only refused, in one or two instances, but actually neglected to answer, when written to. It would not be possible for a labourer to lay by anything out of his wages to provide against non-employment; his wages are barely sufficient to support him. It is observed here, that the poorest class marry earliest; in short, the more wretched their condition, the more anxious they are to marry. This was attributed by witnesses to their anxiety to have children to support them in their old age.

THOSE who are not farm servants, or employed at gentlemen's places, will scarcely get an odd day's work from November to March; but Halpin observed, that it was in July that it went hardest with them: "Then, begad!" said he, "from the old potatoes being out, and the new ones not come in, we are put to it hard, and the work is not to be found. I know it is enough to drive us mad; the little creatures (the children) will lie down and cry, while the wife will hang down her head and keep sighing, and there is no help for them; one meal is as much as we can give, and we sometimes think the day too long to live for." There is no regular fund to afford them assistance.

The wife and children in this part of the country would sooner die than go out to beg at any time; the decent people will strive to do as well as they can, and stick to their walls to the last. "I have known one or two," said Carroll, "slink away to the kind neighbours, where they will be helped, and then they will only get as much as will keep the life in them."

them." The Rev. Mr. Coffey observed, "these are the periods of the year when one cannot but be struck by the advantages which the beggar enjoys over the more independent and half-starved labourer; while the one ekes out a miserable subsistence, the other will be found following his daily avocations, with a certainty of procuring as much as he may require for his own consumption, and a good chance of getting even a good deal more, which he can and does dispose of to that very class of people from whom he has probably received some share of the charity. It is this abuse, among many other things, which I do not approve of, which leads me to think that a stop should be altogether put to mendicancy, and relief afforded to those who are absolutely in a destitute condition."

The Rev. Mr. O'Brien said that though distress had sometimes been extreme in this parish, yet it has never been followed by one of the worst effects which have resulted from it elsewhere, that of driving the women to prostitution. He knew of no such consequence; but on applying to Sheils, the carpenter, on this point, who had been longer in the town than Mr. O'Brien, he said, that, in consequence of the eviction of tenants at Mahanish, which has been above alluded to, three girls of the name of Moran came to live in Newmarket; one of them was the woman who was afterwards suspected of infanticide, and the other two have been or are prostitutes.

Major Creagh observed, that he had no reason to suspect able-bodied men of committing offences for the purpose of being sent to gaol for support, nor has he known robberies committed from destitution either.

The baneful effect of borrowing food upon usurious interest is not to be observed in this quarter to the same extent that has been described at Killaloe. The potato crop is peculiarly abundant in this district, from causes depending on the fertility of the soil; and though the labourer may be often in summer obliged to buy potatoes, when he has not money in hand to pay for them, yet from there being more of the commodity in the market, he is less liable to be made pay an exorbitant price. The persons who actually take this unfair advantage of the poverty of the lower classes are farmers holding from 10 to 20 acres; and upon inquiry as to what had been the overcharge this year, the Assistant Commissioners could not discover that a greater advance had in any instance been demanded than about 1*s.* in the pound.

There is no instance of labourers being employed solely to alleviate their distress by those who farm, more expressly with a view to profit. Sir E. O'Brien, who has an extensive cottier tenantry, paying their rents by labour, sometimes employs more than his improvements require; and more particularly, he gives work to several old men, who may be considered in a great measure incapacitated by age. A labour-rate, in the true acceptation of the word, has never been in operation there.

The Rev. Mr. O'Brien thought it quite impossible for a man to save while his family was young, but when they grow up, and before they leave him or get married, he may perhaps do so to a small extent. In order to estimate the power of a labourer to lay by money, the Assistant Commissioners took the case of John Clancy, who may be considered rather a fortunate man, as he is employed for nine months in the year at a nursery. He has a family of five persons; he pays 2*l.* a year for a small cabin, without any ground whatever; he is obliged to take every year half an acre of con-acre potato ground, for which he pays at least 4*l.* His outgoings therefore for rent alone are 6*l.* To meet this, he has six months' employment at 8*d.* a day, equal to 6*l.* 1*s.* 4*d.*; three months at 6*d.* a day, equal to 2*l.* 5*s.* 7½*d.* It thus appears that he has but 2*l.* 6*s.* 11½*d.* remaining for the purchase of clothes, furniture and the repair of his house, which is never undertaken by the landlords. As for the potato ground, it is taken for a supply of food, and never with the intention of disposing of any part of the produce. The condition of this man is better than the average of labouring men, which required no further comment. In the opinion of Mr. Coffey, the lower and more destitute classes of labourers are the most prone to early marriages; but he assigns as a reason, the desire of the parents to put their daughters out of harm's way, and to secure them the protection of a husband in the event of their own deaths. But when we find that these early and improvident matches, by which an additional degree of wretchedness is entailed both on the husband and the wife, and on their offspring, are more especially peculiar to the indigent classes, it is permitted, without straining the premises, to conclude, that the destitution of these classes has in some manner rendered them reckless of the consequences of their precipitation.

THERE are almost always labourers out of employment, and there are a great many whose work is very uncertain, having employment one week and not the next, and consequently they are often in the greatest distress. Thus reduced, they send their different articles of clothing and furniture to the pawn-office, always hoping to be able to release them, until at last they strip themselves of every thing, and have no way left of getting a single meal but by the charity of others.

The following statement of two labourers, Jeremiah Lacy and Daniel Driscoll, referred to the state of labourers out of employment in every part of the city:

The highest rate of wages is from 6*s.* to 7*s.* per week; many labourers are working at 8*d.*

8 d. and 10 d. "They are obliged to work for that much by distress; if they did not take it, they would be idle."

Such labourers often send their families to be supported in the house of industry for a season. The same thing is also done by labourers out of employment. Driscoll says, "I know one labouring man who lived in the next house to me; afterwards, having nothing to do, and no way to earn, he was not able to pay his lodging, and I let him in along with myself. He sent his wife and four children to the house of industry. He did not let her go until he pledged and pawned every thing he had. She staid there for four months, and he got her home about a month ago. He is not a man given to drink at all; he would not take 6 d. out of his wages of a Saturday night for himself." Driscoll adds, "only for a job of work that Mr. Goold gives me through compassion, I should send my own family into the house of industry. I know another man, named Conolly. He has a wife and four children. He got no employment this week, except about two hours yesterday. The most he got for that was 3 d. His wife jobs for a few private houses, but earns very little, 1 s. one week, and 6 d. another. I know that that family lived on one meal a day during the last week. They would rather do that than have any of them go into the house of industry, though they would get more than one meal a day there; they like to keep together while they have anything to pawn."

There is very great objection to going into the house of industry, from its being too crowded. Driscoll says, "I was told by those that were there that they are a top of one another, there is so many of them. For all that, I would sooner let my children go in there than go beg; they would have better covering at night than they have at home; many a hard-working man has but poor bed covering." Being asked to explain what he would consider good bed covering, he said, "I call a quilt, blanket and sheet, and enough of straw, good covering; but many a one is lying on the bare boards, and that is where poverty kills us."

The price of potatoes varies from 3 d. per weight of 22 lbs., to 6 d. and 7 d. Driscoll's family, a wife and four young children, would require a weight for one meal. He says, "If I was to give them three good meals without milk, it would cost 9 d. for the cheapest kind of potatoes. I cannot do that though I have good wages, 1 s. a day. I pay 1 s. a week for two rooms, bed-room and kitchen, very small; the two together measure about 16 feet by 12. I pay 3 d. a peck for Newport coal, 28 lb. in the peck; and we want three pecks a week, going as close as we can; they cost 9 d. Then count 6 d. a day for potatoes, though it will not get near enough; and it leaves only 9 d. a week, if I had regular employment, to get clothes for us all, and a sup of milk." The calculation is as follows:

Lodging per week	1	–
3 pecks coal, at 3 d.	–	9
14 weights of potatoes at 3 d., being two weights or 44 lbs. per day	3	6

Wages per week	6	–
Deduct	5	3
Remains for clothes, milk and other expenses	–	9

Three pints of milk cost 2 d., considered better than one pint of porter, which would cost 2 d. His expression was, "I can work better upon a pint of milk with my potatoes, than upon a pint of porter."

In summer, Driscol said, he would not require three pecks of coal, but potatoes would be nearly double the price, and summer is consequently the season of greatest distress. He says, "When potatoes got up very high this summer, I was obliged to buy flour; half a quarter costs 3 d., and is as good as a weight of potatoes, only it requires more drink. I could not live on it in the evening without milk; it would kill an ostrich. When a man eats it hot, it soaks the blood; with enough of milk it would do, but it would want two pennyworth." The same witness says, "It is hard to tell the distress of labourers in Cork; there is oceans of them that cannot get employment; farmers turned out, and labourers that cannot get work in the country come in here, and they are dragging the bread out of one another's mouths. I was out of employment myself for two months since last Christmas. I had nothing laid by. A man that has anything of a family could not lay by out of 6 s. a week. During the two months I was putting what I had inside outside *, and often, God knows, not tasting more than one meal in the day."

Again he says, "We must buy a little of every thing at a time, and pay more for it; a halfpenny for a candle that you would get 14 of them for 6 d.; the less you take always, the dearer it is.

" Beggars, only for the shame of begging, are better off than labourers; they always get something to eat at gentlemen's houses, a bit of meat or cabbage. Most of them are widows and old people, who have no one to look after them; they would rather stay about the streets than go into the house of industry; they get outside all that they could get in, enough to eat, and a penny now and then besides to buy snuff or tobacco. A decent labourer would rather let his family go into the house of industry, then go beg; but he would rather suffer a great deal than do either; he would not like, if he got into good circumstances afterwards, that one could throw in his face that his family were beggars."

THE number of unemployed labourers has been increased by the practice of throwing small farms into large, by which several small farmers have been reduced to the rank of labourers. Mr. Field says, " I know 10 or 12 on one ploughland." I have known several unemployed persons obliged to live on one meal a day during part of the summer. Neal says, " There were a great many last summer that had not one meal of potatoes in the day, but were forced to go out and pick corn-kail and kedlock, and boil it in a neighbour's house." Mr. M'Carty and Mr. Field say, that many of them were obliged to use this miserable food.

The wives and children sometimes go among their neighbours and tell their distress, and they generally get some relief; but while they are not looked upon as regular beggars, there are many who would suffer great distress rather than do this. " I was often in great distress, but I had a shame to tell it to a neighbour; I think I would suffer anything rather than go beg."—(Neal.)

" Credit is dead; a man out of employment will not get any."—(Neal.)——" I can tell you that I went to my work in summer without eating the whole day until next morning, and it is not once or twice I did it, but often."—(Bellew.)——" You say you went to work; if you were at work, you got wages; and if you got wages, you could get potatoes; how was that? I will tell you how it was. I have seven in family besides myself, and I got 8*d.* wages, and that 8*d.* went to get a weight of potatoes for my family.—Did you ever live upon one meal a day for any time worth talking of? I did, often; there was one summer that I worked for a fortnight on one meal a day; I gave the wages I got every day for as much potatoes as gave one meal to us all.—(Bellew.)——And had you no more?—No; unless my wife would go out and pick a bit of corn-kail, to give it to the children to stop their mouths.—Is there any nourishment in that? There is not; but you know the hunger will eat anything.—(Bellew.)——Do not other poor people thus reduced go to beg?—Some of them do go; but there is more of them would rather die than do it; unless it may be that they would go to some one that knows them, and will never speak of it."—(Bellew.)——" I have known cases of labourers working in summer, and their families were living on one meal a day."—(Callaghan.)

Mr. Field observed, a labouring man must sometimes be able to lay by; he cannot go out to America without having collected a little money. " Lay by! I will tell you the way he has to lay by, and the way a man going out to America has to lay by; it is, to sell the pit of potatoes he has against the winter, and every tack of clothes he has in the world, but what is barely enough to cover him."—(Neal.)——This poor labourer proceeded, " I think people without families are sometimes as much distressed as those with them."—" Do you think, that when a man is in distress, he ever says to himself, 'I may as well have a wife to comfort me, it cannot make me worse?' Yes, sometimes. I knew a man that was very badly off, and he married just that way, and he is not a bit worse off now, though he is as bad.—Do you think a man ever marries because he says to himself, 'I may have a son to support me when I get old?' That would be a good reason."—(Neal.)

The witnesses concurred in the statement, that when young persons have any means, they are cautious and look out for suitable matches; but in proportion to their being destitute of means, they are regardless of the consequence of early and improvident marriages. It was also stated, that the clergy in general, unless where there are strong reasons to the contrary, encourage marriage, when previous connexion has taken place.

I have seen people lying on straw that was all broken into little bits, it was so long under them; and I recollect seeing one man and his wife lying on the bare floor, and their three or four children lying near them. I often knew labouring men to come in in wet clothes, and either sleep in them at night, or use them as bed covering.—(M'Carthy.)

I have often known cases where a poor man would go out in a cold morning without a shirt, and be obliged to leave off work and come home; and when asked why he did so, he would say, " I could not stand the cold any longer."—(Mr. Hurley.)

NEWMAN, rector of Kilbrogan.—ROBERT PHILIPS, weaver.—CORNELIUS QUILLINAN, labourer.—Mr. GEORGE STANLEY, farmer holding 175 acres.—Mr. THOMAS TANNER, farmer.—Mr. STEWART TRESSILIAN, churchwarden of the present year.

ACCORDING to the evidence of the Rev. W. Newman, emigration has taken place to a considerable extent from each of these parishes, and there are, in consequence, a much less number of distressed persons than there otherwise would be. Two hundred and thirty-two persons (not weavers) have gone to America from the parish of Kilbrogan this year; at least a third of these were of the poorest class, next to beggars. If passages were paid by Government, there would be four times as many.

The Rev. Mr. Knox states that about 100 have emigrated from the parish of Ballymoodan, of whom about half were of the labouring class; and that but for this emigration, and that of the weavers to England, they should have hundreds starving.

When labourers cannot get employment, their wives must sometimes go out and beg. John Linsday states that he knows several cases of their doing so now; the men themselves do not go out, because people take more compassion on women and children.

Cornelius Quillinan says, "I have eight in family to support, and I have not constant employment. About three years ago there were seven weeks in summer that we had only one meal a day to live on, and God knows we were ashamed to beg; there were others that were not ashamed, and they were a great deal better off."

Rev. Mr. Newman states, that there are many instances of men going to America in the hope of being able to earn enough there to send for their wives and children; and in almost every case that he has known, they have been sooner or later successful, and have sent home money for the purpose. Sometimes the woman suffers great distress before she hears any account: there is one woman near him at present whose husband is gone thither, and she is obliged to beg for support until she hears from him.

It was remarked of the weavers, that at the time so many hundreds of them were suffering such distress, there was no depredation committed by any of them.

Cornelius Quillinan says, that the town labourers, when out of employment, do not get credit, but that at Christmas they sell whatever little rag of decent clothes they and their wives have, or the little pig (most of them have pigs), and they get potatoes to put them through a piece of the winter, and that is the last shift they have until they can get employment. They scarcely ever have potato gardens of their own.

When asked whether the wages of weavers were sufficient to enable them to make some provision against a time of want of employment, Linsday, a weaver, answered, "Well now begging your pardon, I think that's a very foolish question; did you ever hear of a man with a wife and children (let alone other relations) putting by anything out of 5*d.* a day? When men are in such distress as the weavers were certainly, they would as soon be dead as alive. And I often heard them saying, that they wished, since the Government had taken away their trade by machinery, that they had also sent an army to destroy them."

Bandon suffered dreadfully by the decline of her manufactures, but there is much less distress at present than there was about three or four years age, in consequence of the immense numbers of weavers and their families who have emigrated to England; of this class upwards of 600 went off in 1830, upwards of 400 in 1831, great numbers in the following years, and 258 in the present year (1834).

THE beginning of the year, and the months of June and July, are the periods at which there is least employment for labourers; and at those seasons large numbers suffer the greatest distress. There is, however, no part of the year at which there are not many unemployed. One of the labourers present (Deasy) says, "There is seldom a day in the week that you do do not see near 100 of them waiting for employment; they come to the centre of the bridge, and there will not be perhaps 10 of them taken." When working people are unable to find employers, they are often obliged to put up with one meal in the day. This occurs more particularly in June and July, when potatoes have become dear, and the poor man's own stock has been exhausted. In such circumstances they have but few resources; a man considers himself fortunate if he have one or two sons of an age fit to labour. These leave him, and travel about the country in search of occupation. Many go in this manner to the eastern parts of the county Cork to dig potatoes in the season for that kind of work, and others even search the counties Tipperary and Kilkenny for the same purpose. Mr. Lucy states, that "he is acquainted with one townland (300 acres), for which at least 20 persons annually depart in this way." "The wife and children," observe some of the farmers, "are often obliged to beg. Sometimes a hard season comes, and many are driven to ask charity for a month or so, who will not have to do so again for, may be, seven years; at other times the wife goes out to friends in the country, and gets as much as will do her for a week."

A labourer sometimes gets potatoes on credit from a farmer, on the agreement that he is to pay for them the highest price to which the article may rise during the season. In this manner he may borrow, when potatoes are 4*d.* a weight, and ultimately have to pay 6½*d.* or 7*d.*

Labourers are in general very wretchedly off as to clothes. Their wages are hardly sufficient to purchase food for themselves and family, and they experience the greatest difficulty in putting together enough to enable them to buy clothes. It often happens that a labouring man cannot work in winter for want of proper clothing, and it is mentioned that there are even persons who cannot quit their houses from the same reason. "As to bed-clothes, in many houses the inmates have nothing to cover them at night beyond the garments which they have worn by day, and some of them must lie down in their day-clothes, although they should be dripping with wet."—(Messrs. Deasy and others.)——"I know," says Mr. Lucy, "one man with his family; and that all the bed-covering they have is one great coat, and whether that be wet or dry, they must use it."

* In this parish the Assistant Commissioners inquired into the condition of the agricultural labourers generally, and although much of the information collected does not come strictly under the head of "Able-bodied out of Employment," yet as it tends in a great degree to elucidate that subject, it is given in the following note:

First, It is necessary to make a few observations respecting the farmers. The total number of occupiers of land in the parish, exclusive of labourers, who hold single acres from farmers, is 121. Of these there are 10 who hold quantities not exceeding five acres; 18 exceeding five and not exceeding 10; 30 exceeding 10 and not exceeding 20; 48 exceeding 20 and not exceeding 50; seven exceeding 50 and not exceeding 80; eight exceeding 100.

Of the small holders, those who are able to have a cow are considered to be better off than labourers, because they have a supply of milk; but many of them are scarcely less distressed than if they were living entirely by their labour. The following instance may be considered a fair specimen of the latter description.

Anglum, a labourer, says, "There is Tom Welsh lives near me; he has five acres of poor ground; his crop is always half oats and half potatoes; he pays about 1 l. an acre rent; he pays some of it with work; he has two sons, one 15 years old and the other 13. I think he is as badly off as I am."

The larger holders are in almost all cases better off than labourers; but it is stated that they are suffering very great distress, and that the condition of the labourers is materially influenced thereby. They complain of very high rents and very low prices. It is stated that many owe long arrears to their landlord, which are increasing every year. Leahy, a farmer holding 12 acres, at 1 l. 14 s. 1½ d. per acre, says, "I did not and could not pay up any year for a long time, but it is hanging over me." Shea, a farmer, holding 27 acres, at 1 l. 10 s. per acre, says, "I am paying 1 l. an acre out of that; as long as things stay as they are, my landlord will not ask me for any more; but if the times were to mend, he would ask for the entire. My land is valued at 16 s. If I had it at that, I would be a different man. Fitzgerald, a farmer, says, "When we are so strained ourselves, we cannot be liberal with our labourers; unless the rents be reduced, there is no use in trying to better them."

The high rents which are paid cause the farmers in many cases to be unable, from want of capital, to conduct ordinary operations. Mr. Davis states, that they are frequently obliged to leave their potatoes undug for a long time, in consequence of being unable to pay their labourers.

the day. Mr. Grattan says, "Great numbers suffer from insufficient food; and from this cause, as well as from the badness of the food which they are generally obliged to use, much disease arises. They also suffer greatly from want of clothes. Begging is the only resource of many persons during the periods of distress; it is, however, the last resource to which they would willingly turn. Some would endure in preference anything short of absolute starvation. To a question on this point, a labourer replied, "If my wife was to die within the cabin, she would rather it than go out to ask charity."

No instances were known of persons committing offences to obtain the shelter and food of a prison. Anglum says, "I would sooner be walking about half-starving than go into gaol. I would not shame my friends and relations." If they had a difference with any one afterwards, it would be the first thing thrown in their face, that one belonging to them did not live honestly.

Mr. Sheahan mentions, that in times of scarcity labourers have worked in his employment for their diet; he believes, however, that if they had any food to live upon, they would prefer remaining idle to working for so little.

It is stated that farmers are sometimes obliged to go in debt for seed corn, and in such cases to pay 25 per cent. higher than the market price.

It is considered that the parish contains more than 450 agricultural labourers over 16 years of age. In 1831 it contained, according to the census, 383 over 20.

They may be divided into three classes; viz.,

1st. Those who are engaged by the year with farmers, and who get houses and gardens in return for their labour.

2d. Those who have employment throughout the year, and who are paid in money.

3d. Those who have only occasional employment.

1st. Labourers who are engaged by the year with farmers, and who get houses and gardens in return for their labour.

When a farmer holds so many as 40 acres of land, he is obliged to have at least one permanent labourer, unless he happens to have two or three grown up sons willing to work.

The agreement between farmer and labourer is very nearly alike in all cases. The farmer allows sometimes 6½*d.*, but generally 6*d.* a day for the labour. The labourer takes from him a cabin, for which he is to pay from 26*s.* to 30*s.* an acre, or an acre and quarter of manured ground, generally at 4*l.* an acre; and in most cases the grass of one sheep, for which he pays 10*s.* Two intelligent persons having been employed to ascertain the exact number of labourers regularly hired with farmers, stated that they could count up only 66, and they were perfectly certain that the number did not exceed 75. Labourers of this class are considered to be better off than any others; however, they are by no means exempt from scarcity and distress. Mr. Davis observes, "The bargain between a farmer and a labourer is generally a hard one on the latter; I have spoken to farmers on the point, and they say that the prices of every thing are so low, that they cannot give their labourers better terms; the labourer must accept those that are offered, he has no resource."

The following may be considered a fair example of the condition of the class:

Daniel Anglum, a labourer engaged with a farmer, supporting a wife and four children, the eldest about 13; he receives from the farmer,

A house, at	1	6	–
1¼ acres manured ground, at 4*l.* per acre	5	–	–
Grass of one sheep	–	10	–
	£. 6	16	–

No other advantages. He is not allowed a privilege, which is given in some other parishes, of gathering manure off the farmer's ground. He diets himself; he pays the above amount, 6*l.* 16*s.*, with his labour, at the rate of 6½*d.* a day; the amount is made up in 251 working days. He states, that after working out the amount last year, he worked for another, and earned about 9*s.* or 10*s.* He bought a sheep for 7*s.* 6*d.* last spring (twelvemonths); it will sell at from 14*s.* to 16*s.* next spring; it gave a lamb about March, which sold in six or seven weeks for 3*s.* Anglum got wool from the sheep twice; about a pound, a little after he bought it, and about three pounds the second time. He says, "My wife made stockings of it,

Mr. Sheahan states, that many persons, having nothing to look to but the possession of land for subsistence, are induced to bid inordinate rents, far beyond what they will ever be enabled to pay. The desperate competition makes men ready to grasp at farms on any terms, and landlords who are frequently in great want of money, are blinded to their own interests by the temptation of a large offer. This system is injurious to all parties. Adventurers take farms, and after a single season disappear without paying any rent; those who remain are driven into overcropping. They make every effort to obtain a sufficient return for the present season; permanent improvement is lost sight of; the land is insufficiently manured, and is every year deteriorated; hedges and fences are broken down, and houses suffered to fall into a state of dilapidation from an inability or an unwillingness to go to the expense of repairs.

The distress of landlords has another bad effect on the condition of the farmers, by causing rents to be demanded almost immediately after they fall due, which obliges the farmer to sell his corn at the beginning of the season, when prices are lowest, and when of course he must sell his produce on the most disadvantageous terms.

it, two or three pair for me, one pair for a little boy, and one pair for herself; she dyed and spun the wool, and knit the stockings herself."

He bought a pig at Christmas, on credit, for 9*s.*; he owes for it yet; he sold it in June for 15*s.* He says, "I did not pay the 9*s.* then, because I wanted to buy potatoes for my family. I went to the woman that I bought the pig from and offered her the money, but she would not take it because she knew that my family wanted it. Though I agreed to pay 9*s.*, I could get it for 5*s.* if I had ready money. I bought another pig in June, for 4*s.* cash; on credit I should pay 7*s.* or 8*s.*; I expect to sell it at Christmas. It would not be worth selling now, pigs are so cheap. I want the money, if I could get it, to pay that 9*s.* that I owe, to release some clothes that I pawned to buy potatoes, to put shoes on my feet, to put some clothes on the children, that are going almost stark naked about the country."

Being asked whether it would not be better to kill the pig and eat it, he smiled, and said, "I live with a farmer that holds 40 acres of land, and he did not kill a pig these three years."

The food of Anglum's family is potatoes, without milk; three meals a day, except when potatoes get scarce in summer; the ordinary quantity is a weight (21 pounds) at each meal, but in summer they are often obliged to be content with half that quantity, or a weight and a half for the whole family in the course of the day.

It is considered that when a labourer is living under a farmer that has good land, he has a certainty of having a sufficient supply of potatoes for the year; "but where there is poor ground, a labourer has not enough, and is always in want when summer comes round. Most of the farmers are on the poor side of the line, and not able to manure their ground."

Anglum says, "My potatoes were out this year long before the new ones came in. I pledged some of my clothes, sold the pig, and borrowed from my friends and cousins. Only that I have a strong back (a great number of friends), I would not be so well off as I am."

The anxiety of labourers to get ground, in order to grow a stock of potatoes for themselves, arises from the great variation in the price of potatoes which takes place during the year. If by any means they could be kept at a steady moderate price, it is probable that the practice of taking single acres, half acres, &c. would soon be given up. Butler, a labourer hired with a farmer, says, "If potatoes sold for 3*d.* a weight (23lbs.) all the year round, I would not set a garden, but receive my wages; if they were 4*d.* a weight, a garden would be better."

The next class of labourers consists of those who have employment throughout the year, and who are paid in money.

There are 125 labourers of this description in the parish, 80 of them are in the employment of Mr. Davis. In consequence of so many getting employment from him, the number of this class, in proportion to the whole number of labourers, is much greater than usual.

The following is a specimen of the condition of the hired labourer, without garden:

Michael Dooley: I have a wife and four children; the eldest girl is 14, the eldest boy is 12; I am hired regular with Mr. Neville, nearly three years, at 8*d.* a day, 4*s.* a week.

I pay 1*l.* 10*s.* rent for the house I have; it is a good one (meaning it is dry; does not let in the wet.)

Only for the master I have, I could not stand the house.

I was not able to pay up the rent last Lady-day; I owed 15*s.*; I am paying 8*d.* a week since to pay the rent and the arrears.

My daughter is about 10 weeks minding cattle, at a shilling a week; only for that help I could not keep the house.

We would want a barrel of potatoes in the week, nearly two weights a day; we never buy a barrel at a time, generally a firkin, two weights; sometimes a weight; potatoes are seldom less than 3½*d.* a firkin, generally 4*d.*; sufficient of potatoes would cost from 1*s.* 9*d.* to 2*s.* a week; last summer, part of the time, potatoes were 8*d.* a weight; it would take a whole day's wages to get half enough; I could not buy potatoes; I was obliged to get 1 cwt. of flour on credit, for 17*s.*; if I had money I could get it for 10*s.* (Mr. Shea thinks 9*s.*); my master was security, and gave the money; I am paying him at the rate of 2*s.* a week; I am clear with him to-morrow; it was to enable me to do it that he hired my little girl; I do not know whether he will keep her any longer.

"It is coal we use for firing; it costs from 10*d.* to 1*s.* a week. We buy by the stone; sometimes two stones, never a barrel; a stone 2*d.*, two stones 3½*d.* The children sometimes pick up a little firing, a brusna; not off Mr. Neville's grounds. My master gave me the last peggen of milk I drank.

"Last Lady-day I owed about 6*s.* for tobacco and salt and light; I owe 5*s.* now for the same things; I use a penn'worth of tobacco every day, 6*d.* a week.

"I walk six miles to and from my work almost every day; it is a mile away, and I go and come three times."

Being asked whether he would have his dinner sent to him? he says, "It would be too bad to eat cold potatoes in a wet ditch; my master would sooner that I be a half-hour late; he would sooner lose the time it would take me to go home, than let me do such a thing. He often called me in and gave me my dinner himself.

"My wife has two hens that lay eggs in summer, and Susan sometimes eats one. We have a pig three-quarters of a year old; she would sell for 1*l.* now; paid 14*s.* for her: my wife earned it from my master, making hay, selling milk; that is all her earnings for two years. It was her brother bought the pig; we paid him by degrees last summer. Bought half a hundred weight of bran for the pig for 2*s.*; did not pay for it since, nor not able: we gave her potato-skins, but the bran fattened her.

"Did not get a pair of stockings this year, nor shoes, nor a breeches; nor a shirt since Lady-Lady-day, when my sister gave me two: no assistance from any other relatives. A great many days last summer that I had only one meal, and the children only one. There were days that if I gave a shilling for a weight of potatoes in the town I could not get them: 12 or 13 days one meal, not two days together; except once, I was for two days one after another trusting to one meal in the day. Some days I was obliged to take two meals, when they took only one. I should , to keep me going at work; if I did not do that we should starve, or beg outright. I did not taste a drop of whiskey these 10 weeks; I did take a glass at my own expense, never two: two or three at other people's expense, this 10 weeks."

The third class of labourers consists of those who have only occasional employment: taking the number of the first class, or of those who are hired regularly with farmers, at 75; and of the second class, or of those who are hired regularly, but are paid in money, at 125; it will appear, that out of the 450 labourers, over 16, who are stated to be in the parish, 200 have constant employment. The remaining 250 have only occasional employment.

From some statements which were made by the farmers, a tolerably accurate notion may be formed of the total amount of occasional employment afforded in the course of the year.

Mr. Maurice Doyle, a farmer holding 266 acres, employed, in addition to his regular labourers,

2 men for one week - - - -
1 man for two weeks - - - - } digging potatoes.

The total amount of "occasional" employment afforded by him being equal to the labour of one man for four weeks.

Mr. Edmond Flinn, a farmer holding 187 acres, gave "occasional" employment, during the year, to 2 men for four weeks - - - digging potatoes.

2 men for four weeks - - - reaping.

Being equal to one man for 16 weeks.

Mr. William Mackay, a farmer holding 113 acres, gave "occasional" employment, during the year, to 1 man for twenty weeks - - - threshing.

12 men for three weeks - - - digging potatoes.
15 men for two weeks - - - reaping.

Being equal to one man for 86 weeks, or one man for a year, and one man for 34 weeks.

No other farmer afforded one quarter of the amount of "occasional" employment given by Mr. Mackay; he seems to have hired men for every agricultural operation which required labour, in addition to that of his regular workmen. The other farmers, in those cases, borrowed from each other a sufficient number of the regularly hired labourers. One borrowed the labourers of two or three neighbours for a week, and lent his own for an equal period to each of those who had obliged him. This proceeding was of course productive of much inconvenience; but the farmers stated that they were driven to it by high rents and low prices, which rendered them unable to pay the wages of a sufficient number of additional labourers. Mr. Mackay stated, that he could not again hire additional labourers as he had done during the past year, but must resort, like his neighbours, to the expedient of borrowing. From what has been said it will appear, that considering each of the eight farmers, holding over 100 acres, to give occasional employment equal to the labour of one man for a year, the amount will not be under estimated, and therefore the entire amount of such employment afforded by those farmers is not more than equal to the labour of eight men.

The smaller holders afford, of course, a less quantity of occasional employment: 55, holding from 20 to 80 acres, may be considered to give, at the utmost, occasional employment equal to the labour of 28 men (allowing each, on an average, to give equal to the labour of one man for six months).

Thirty farmers, holding from 10 to 20 acres, may be considered to give occasional employment equal to the labour of five men (allowing each, on an average, to give equal to the labour of one man for two months).

Farmers holding under 10 acres give no employment.

Calculating, then, that eight farmers, holding over 100 acres, give occasional employment equal to the labour of eight men; that 55, holding from 20 to 80, give equal to 28 men; and 30, holding from 10 to 20, give equal to five men; it will appear that the entire amount of occasional employment afforded by all the farmers in the parish is not more than equal to the labour of 41 men. It was considered further, that the entire amount of occasional employment afforded by persons not farmers, was not equal to the labour of 19 men. But setting it down at 19, it will appear, the entire amount of occasional employment afforded in the parish is not more than equal to the labour of 60 men. In other words, that the work of 60 men is divided amongst 250; or that each of the 250 occasional labourers has, on an average, less than three months' employment in the year.

All the elements of this calculation have been taken, with respect to the amount of employment afforded, at their maximum; the want of employment, therefore, is at the least as great as is here stated. Notwithstanding, however, that 250 men have distributed amongst amongst them employment equal to the yearly labour of only 60 men, it is not to be supposed that there is a clear surplus of 190 labourers; or that the agricultural business of the parishes could be conducted by a much less number of labourers than it contains at present. At certain seasons every labourer is employed; but during the winter months and midsummer, the whole class of occasional labourers is in a state of perfect idleness.

The following cases may be considered fair illustrations of the condition of occasional labourers:

Thomas Dooley, wife and two small children: "I had not four months' employment; I got four barrels of potatoes in July from Mr. Mackay, on time; I owe him only 2*s.* now. I am threshing about six weeks, earning 5*s.* a week the most part of the time, and 4*s.* the remainder; I have threshed 300 in a day. I was quarrying stones last summer, and had no more than one meal a day. (The other labourer testifies to the truth of this.) My bed is in pawn, worth 25*s.*; I owed 7*s.* 6*d.* on it; I paid 5*s.* 10½*d.* interest on it, already in three years, and I am afraid I will lose it. I owe a pound rent to my landlord; 2*s.* 6*d.* since last year, and 17*s.* 6*d.* since 29th September last, and he is threatening, if I do not pay it in a week, to cant my little furniture; I do not know how I will pay it."

Owen Bowler, wife and three children, eldest six; another family lives in the same house since Lady-day; Bowler pays for lodging 17*s.*; employment since that time:

From one person, William Riall,	4	weeks,	two potatoes.
From T. Seward - - -	2	–	potatoes.
From R. Momson - - -	3	–	one potato.
And at G. James's - -	1

In eight months 10 weeks employment.

Employed until last Lady-day, 25th March. Wife obliged to go beg; no garden; manured none myself; obliged to leave the manure to pay part of the rent of my house, 30*s.*; the manure was worth about 10*s.* I sold a pig in the middle of summer; I paid 5*s.* for her this time twelvemonth; I sold her for 10*s.* We would require a weight and a half of potatoes in the day at the least; we had two meals of a day, but sometimes we were obliged to make them out of a weight of potatoes. About Lady-day I got six barrels of potatoes, two of them on time, at 4*s.* 6*d.* a barrel; I owe for those two yet, 9*s.*; the wife got assistance from neighbours and strangers. Got one quarter of a hundred weight of flour, 4*s.* 3*d.*, paid for that, two stone; one quarter of a stone in one meal, for a man, wife and four children, the very least allowance; rather have potatoes; go much farther; easier to eat them dry.

Ordinary labourers hired with farmers receive 6*d.* or 6½*d.* per day; some get diet in addition during harvest. Labourers paid in money receive 8*d.* a day; occasional labourer 8*d.*, frequently 10*d.*, and in harvest 1*s.* a day. Boys of 15 get 4*d.* a day, and women 6*d.* during harvest. However the entire amount of employment for women and children is inconsiderable.

Wages are lower than formerly; the quantity of employment, compared with the population, is less; there is less demand for labour. Many farmers are driven by distress to work themselves, and make their sons work, who would formerly have employed labourers. Such persons often make their children work, who would otherwise be sent to school. If the price of produce got up, or rents were lowered, a greater number of labourers would be employed. The low price of produce, too, has caused some tillage lands to be converted into pasture, and has thereby diminished the demand for labour.

It sometimes happens that a poor farmer being turned out of his holding, and obliged to become a labourer, gets a good employer, and finds his condition improved by the change; but in general the condition of such a man is much worse as a labourer than before.

Very few labourers are able to have sufficient food in summer. When the insufficiency is great, it frequently happens that the labourer becomes a less efficient workman. "It is a common complaint of farmers that labourers idle during their absence. The labourers are frequently unable, for want of sufficient food, to work properly. It often happens that a labourer, who has no dinner to go home to, conceals himself in the fields while his fellows go home, wishing to prevent them from knowing his distress. Many are not able, from want of food, to do the work of men."—(Rev. Mr. Sheahan.)

Combinations amongst labourers have not existed in this parish, nor have any violences taken place towards strange labourers.

"I have observed that when a labourer, having a small family, obtains a regular employment, with a fixed amount of wages, his family exhibit increased cleanliness and respectability. As his family grows larger, without being yet able to assist him, he finds it more difficult to live."—(Mr. Sheahan.)

"The present low rate of wages is caused by the great competition of labourers. The supply of labourers being greater than the demand for labour, the labourer is forced to work for the smallest amount of wages on which he can possibly subsist. He knows that if he declines working for wages which will give the humblest subsistence to his family, he will not better himself, because some one will be always found eager to accept what he refuses."—(Mr. Sheahan.)

It was agreed by all that if a labourer could claim public work at 5*s.* a week, he would not compete for or accept wages from farmers below that sum. It was thought, however, that a public provision in a workhouse, bringing with it confinement and separation of families, would not have the same effect.

It is difficult to say what would be the effect of withdrawing a portion of the labourers.

Ultimately it would raise wages. Before that effect could be brought about, some farmers would be ruined, and some lands thrown out of cultivation.

At present it is common for labourers to marry at from 22 to 25. A labouring man, having a tolerable prospect of employment, considers it quite sufficient to justify him in marrying, and incurring the increased expense of a family. With some a state of destitution is a temptation to marriage, inasmuch as no change can make them worse. Frequently, however, a labourer has some provision, either in furniture or money, or gets some with his wife. A dresser, a bedstead, or a pig, is not uncommonly a marriage portion.

A man who is disposed to marry is seldom prevented from doing so by the poverty of his circumstances, unless where he is unable to make up the marriage-money.

Butler, a labourer, says, "A man that is poor marries soonest. A man that has something has the least liking to put it in danger. A man that has money does not wish to marry a girl that has her hands empty."

The marriage-money or fee to the clergyman for performing the ceremony is stated to be generally 25*s.* or 30*s.*, and never less than 20*s.* Several marriages are delayed from the inability of the parties to "make up the marriage-money." If there was no fee paid on marriage, it is thought that the number of early marriages would greatly increase. Butler says, "Half the country would run to get married if there was no marriage-money."

Poor people generally give something to the priest when extreme unction is administered.

Anglum gives the following account of the expenses attending the funeral and wake of a poor farmer, with whom he was a hired labourer. It was he who purchased the things.

During the wake the house was crowded with people, and the house alongside it also crowded. They got no whiskey or porter; most of them staid up the whole night; they generally begin to go away towards morning. Some think the custom of smoking at wakes leads a great many into it who would not otherwise have commenced it. One reason for this custom of using tobacco and snuff at wakes is to keep the people from falling asleep during the night.

A system of hiring land exists here equivalent to what is called "con-acre" in other parts of the country. A labourer who is regularly hired with a farmer receives from him an acre or an acre and a quarter of ground, manured and fit for having potatoes sown in it. For this he pays, in general, at the rate of 4*l.* per acre, as has been already stated, by means of his labour. He seldom gets the same piece of ground for two years successively, the farmer generally sowing corn where potatoes were grown in the previous year. This mode of hiring land has been already spoken of in the statements relative to labourers regularly hired with farmers.

Another mode of hiring small quantities of land for a year is common to labourers of every description. It is made use of to a greater or less extent in every part of the country, and arises from the difficulty which farmers find in procuring a sufficient quantity of manure. When a labourer's family is able to collect a heap of manure, any farmer will "turn it out" upon as much of his land as it will cover, and permit the labourer to take from it a crop of potatoes. The farmer always spreads the manure very thickly. The quantities of land manured in this way by labourers vary from less than one-eighth to three-eighths of an acre, scarcely scarcely any labourer being able to manure half an acre. It does not appear that this system is in any way productive of crime; it operates however, in addition to various other causes, in keeping wages at the lowest possible point. The labourer having this resource, can work at a lower rate than he could without it.

From the mode of letting larger quantities of land which is practised, it would appear that the worst effects follow to farmers and labourers, and in many instances to the landlords. The number of competitors for every farm makes it easy for a landlord to obtain a rent much higher than the value of the land. In some cases the landlord suffers by an adventurer disappearing after a year, without paying anything. An honest man who has to pay too high a rent must, besides contenting himself with the smallest profit, procure labour at the least possible expense, and often perform operations by himself or his children which, if he was under a moderate rent, would have been performed by hired labour. The great competition among labourers for employment, reduces the price of labour to the lowest possible limit; and hence it appears, of the three portions into which the produce of land is always divided, the profits of the farmer and the wages of the labourer are each at the minimum, while the rent of the landlord is at the maximum; and as the portion which goes to the farmer is composed of the profits of his capital, and the wages of the labour which he himself or his family performs, it appears that he takes to himself as much as he can of that portion which would naturally go to the labourer, in order that he may be enabled to increase to the utmost that part which goes to the landlord. Mr. Fitzgerald, farmer, says, "If we had not to make up so much rent, or if we had better prices, I and my son would not be working from the dawn of day, as we do, but we would hire others."

"Some labourers' wives are able to keep two or three hens, but the most they can make is the price of a pennyworth of tobacco or soap, or salt or candles, or a handkerchief."—(Butler.)

A labourer sometimes eats an egg himself in summer. Butler says, "It is a great strengthening when we have hard work before us, and not enough of potatoes."

Anglum has often sent out eggs to be sold, and bought a halfpenny-worth of potatoes; because if he "eat the egg, it would be all to himself, but a halfpenny-worth of potatoes could be divided."

No labourer's wife could earn enough, by the management of fowls, to clothe her family.

Bees are scarcely ever kept; in most cases it would be impossible, because the labourers so frequently change their residences.

It would be impossible to ascertain, without a very long investigation, whether rearing a pig is profitable to a labourer, and if it be, to ascertain the amount of profit. In many cases it certainly appears that the price for which the labourer sells his pig is not enough to cover the original cost and the cost of rearing.

It is common for the wives of labourers to spin worsted and knit stockings for their own families, but it seldom happens that they can earn anything by spinning or knitting.

Generally speaking, no portion of the misery and destitution of labourers is attributable to the indolence or improvidence of their wives.

An ordinary cabin is about 20 feet long and 12 broad. The walls are built of stone or of mud. It is sometimes divided by a thin partition into two apartments of unequal size; it never contains a second story; it is covered or thatched with straw; there is no cieling or plaster, the rafters on the inside being seldom covered with anything but soot.

In many instances the condition of the thatch is so bad that the rain comes through. When the house belongs to a hired labourer, the farmer from whom he holds it ought, by the agreement, to keep it in repair; but if he omits to perform his duty, a labourer does not like to attempt forcing him, lest he should lose his situation. Anglum says, "The rain often comes down into my bed, but I expect my master will repair the thatch."

The floor is simply the ground upon which the cabin is built, made tolerably level, and left uncovered; it is frequently very damp in wet seasons, and where the cabin has been built in a low situation, it is often covered with water after heavy rains.

Every cabin has a chimney; it is made generally of mud, a frame of wicker-work being erected from the hearth to the aperture in the roof. When the smoke does not escape easily, it is felt to be very unpleasant, and very unhealthy. Anglum, whose cabin is a little smoky, says, "I would pay another crown a year to have the smoke away."

Many of the cabins have a pane or two of glass, to let in light; some have only a small square aperture, which at night, or in cold weather, is stuffed with straw. The door is hung on iron hinges, and fastened with a wooden latch.

Almost every cabin has a pig-sty, but very few have a shed for fuel.

The cost of erecting a cabin is variously estimated. A mud cabin, which could let for 25 s. a year, might be erected for 6 l. or 7 l. A stone cabin, which would let for the same sum, might be built for 10 l. or 11 l.

An ordinary rent is 25 s.; in many instances, however, 30 s. are paid.

Mr. Green Davis says, "Residences for the poor are the greatest want in this country. Any man who has a room or cabin to let, which is tolerably dry, may get almost any rent he pleases for it. The huts that labouring people live in are often such that they have scarcely a place to lie in, on account of the wet."

Turf, which is the usual fuel in most parts of the country, being very scarce and dear here, a considerable quantity of coal is used. Much privation and misery arises from the scarcity of fuel, no labourer's family being able to burn a greater quantity of fuel than is absolutely necessary to boil their potatoes, and many being unable to procure a sufficient quantity even for that purpose.

The price of coal in Killeagh may be stated at from 3 s. 6 d. to 4 s. in summer, and from 4 s. 6 d. to 5 s. in winter, per barrel of five cwt. William Walsh, who burns coal, states, that half a barrel, or 2 ½ cwt., for which he pays 2 s. or 2 s. 6 d., lasts his family for a fortnight in winter, when it is burned on a hearth. He thinks the same quantity would be sufficient for three weeks if it was burned in a grate; he says, it would be a great saving, but he is not able to purchase a grate.

It was considered that on an average it must cost a labourer's family 9 d. per week throughout the year, to procure a sufficient quantity of firing for preparing their food.

In point of clothing, the state of a great portion of the labouring class is very wretched. The clothes, or rather rags, of many labourers are utterly insufficient to protect them from the cold. The strongest desire is felt by all to appear in decent clothing at the chapel on Sunday, and hence many, from not having proper clothes, stay at home from mass on Sunday, notwithstanding that the obligation to attend is believed to be most solemn.

Nothing shows more clearly the poverty of the labouring class than their inability to provide proper clothing for their children. Many are unable, from this cause, to send their children to school, though very anxious to do so. Anglum's children, living only half a mile from the school-house, cannot go for want of clothing. Butler cannot send his children for the same reason. Butler, speaking of the dress of children generally, said, "They are all in rags; they have so many wings and flutters about them, that if they go out on a windy day, a smart blast would hoice (twist) them over the ditch."

It is impossible to ascertain accurately the amount of the yearly expenditure of a labourer's family on clothes. The following is a statement of the cost of each article of dress used by a labourer:

Pair of breeches	–	5	6
Coat	–	9	–
Hat	–	2	6
A pair of shoes	–	3	–
Worsted and dye-stuff for three pair of stockings	–	4	6
Three shirts	–	6	–
Waistcoat	–	3	6
£.	1	14	–

No labourer is able to expend so much as 1 l. 14 s. on clothes in the course of a year; he buys a hat in one year, a coat in the next, and pair of breeches in the next. "I did not buy a hat these 12 years."—(Butler.)——"I am wearing the same hat these six years."—(Walsh.)

It is thought that the use of shoes and stockings is increasing.

Half of the labourers have no bedsteads, but lie on straw spread out on the ground. Higgens, a labourer, says, "I have no bedstead; myself and wife and four children sleep together on one bundle of straw." Other labourers state that this is common.

Many have no blankets, but make use of the clothes which they wear during the day for night-covering. The usual furniture of a cabin consists of a dresser or large wooden frame, containing three or four shelves; three or four chairs, entirely wooden, or with straw seats; a table, one or two metal pots, a trencher, and two or three piggens, (small wooden vessels) and two or three spoons; sometimes, in addition, three or four dishes and a few plates for ornament, on the dresser.

The principal food of the peasantry is potatoes; meat is never eaten, except perhaps on Christmas-day. Fish or eggs are very little used. When a labourer has a sufficient stock of potatoes, his family eat three meals a day. During the scarce season, however, or when a labourer is out of employment, it is very common for labourers' families to live on two small meals.

It was considered that a weight and half or 34 ½ lbs. of potatoes in a day are the smallest quantity upon which a man, wife, and three children could subsist. White, or horse potatoes are commonly used, they are the worst sort, being soft and spongy and frequently wet; they are grown by labourers because they require less manure than any other description. The potato continues, in general, to be fit for food until the new crop comes in. New potatoes are fit for consumption in the beginning of September. A great portion of the crop, however, is dug much earlier, from the distress of the people; the stock laid up from the previous year being exhausted with many families, they are frequently obliged to dig the potatoes in July; they are at that time small and wet. The loss of digging them too soon is very great. In some instances ridges of potatoes have been dug, which, if permitted to remain for two months longer, would have produced four times the quantity.

If an abundant crop of potatoes were to arise in any one year, there is no method known by which the surplus could be preserved until the ensuing year. The potato being the principal food of the peasantry, the food in each year is entirely dependant on the production of that year. If ever, therefore, the crop of one year fails, great destitution is the inevitable result. Wheat, barley or oats may be kept for several years. The surplus of an abundant harvest of corn may of course be very easily kept over, so as to supply the deficiencies of a bad year. If a substitution of corn for potato food were possible, the chances of starvation or disease now occasionally arising from the deficiency or unsound state of the potato crop, would be greatly lessened, if not altogether removed.

Corn, from being so much more portable, might be conveyed with much less expense from one place to another. From the expense and difficulty attendant on the carriage of potatoes, it has frequently happened that they have been scarce and dear in one parish, while while they have been abundant and cheap not more than 20 miles distant. It was stated, that a man near the sea-side, having no potatoes of his own last year, went to a parish where they were to be sold, and bought a load; after keeping some for himself, he went to another parish where they were dearer than in his own, and sold them; he bought them for 7 d. and sold them for 9 d.

Potatoes, notwithstanding the expense of carriage, would be often brought from parishes where they are abundant and cheap, to parishes where they are very dear, but for a dread that they would be stopped in some intermediate parish and forcibly compelled to be sold; the price of potatoes being high in such a place, but not sufficiently so to remunerate after the expense of carriage. Potatoes were stopped in this way at Castlemartyr a short time ago; some people staid up all night for the purpose.

During the summer many labourers, having neither potatoes nor money, are obliged to use flour, which may sometimes be got on credit. Many also, who are receiving regular wages, are obliged to use flour, from the impossibility of procuring a small quantity of potatoes at that season. The peasantry would prefer corn food to potatoes, if they could have a sufficient quantity of milk. However, as they are generally obliged to do without any milk, they prefer living on potatoes. Mr. Shea, farmer, says, "Last summer I could not get potatoes for six weeks; I was obliged to get flour. I would sooner have potatoes that were boiled for a week." Dooley, a labourer, says, "Last summer I was obliged to use flour. I took it three times a day, but not half enough of it, nor any one in my house; we were obliged to spare it, to prolong it. We had sometimes a little potatoes along with it. We bought them from beggars. We would rather have potatoes, on account of not having milk."

The peasantry are driven to live on the cheapest and worst food, by the intense competition for employment which forces them to accept the smallest wages on which it is possible to subsist; and as long as this unlimited competition remains, it is impossible that corn food can be introduced.

Extensive emigration has taken place here; but it has not been sufficient to check the competition for labour or land, so as to raise wages or lower rents.

From the statements already made, a notion may be formed of the number which it would be necessary to withdraw from the competition, in order to effect either of these points. The nearest sea-port (Youghal), is only seven miles distant. If a free passage to America were offered, great numbers would accept of it.

Almost every labourer uses a considerable quantity of tobacco. Anglum uses two pennyworth in the week. Butler uses four pennyworth, and has never been three weeks without it for 10 or 12 years; he says, "I could not do without it; I would be content to live for two days in a week on one meal a day, in order to get tobacco."

"Why is it so necessary?"

"Because the only pleasure I have in the world, is just to take a smoke. I would rather have a pennyworth of tobacco than three eggs."

Other labourers stated that they used three pennyworth in the week. Anglum says, "It is very useful; some have hard work, some have the colic; it serves the lungs; some days we do lie cold and shivering, and we get a whiff of tobacco." Butler says, "It is the poor man's luxury."

Anglum: "I got a great many glasses of whiskey since Lady-day; some at my own expense, some at others. If I was travelling, it would keep up my courage against the road; if I was going to a race, or a funeral, or in company; I would not care about it if I was out in company. I would go to a race to divert myself. I went to 20 funerals since Lady-day, some of them on Sunday. Often when I would come down to Killeagh, I would go in with a boy, or ask another to come in along with me. It would be better to keep the money for a time that it would be wanting; but if a person does not think of that?"

E. Wells says, "If you had three or four glasses in, you would rather give money for three or four more, than do anything else with it; you would think nobody poor belonging to you. There was no fighting last fair-day, or the fair-day before the last; a fight about 12 months ago between two factions, the Colberts and the Mountains, they are fighting these 20 years; no man ever killed; they stopped for some time, collected again last August twelvemonth, and had a fight; they were collecting again for another fight, when the priest excommunicated any who should attempt it, and it was put a stop to."

ACCORDING to the census of 1831, the number of labourers in the parish of Liscarrol was 316; all these were employed in agriculture or in farming operations of some kind, and it may be assumed that their numbers have not declined since. Mr. Sullivan and Mr. Hartstonge, who are well acquainted with the parish, could not count more than 40 who had had permanent engagements with farmers.* They are quite certain that the number of those who have yearly engagements does not exceed 50; and they think that the number of those who are regularly employed by gentlemen, is considerably under 26. To prevent a possibility of error, they suppose that number, and they set down the number of the regularly employed at 76 altogether. The remaining 240 get work only from time to time. Mr. Hartstonge, who is a more extensive employer of labourers than the generality of farmers, gave to the Assistant Commissioners the following estimate of the amount of occasional labour paid for by him in the course of the year :—

* The hired labourer gets from the farmer a cabin and half an acre of ground manured for potatoes; for this he pays by his labour; he receives no wages, but at the end of the year a balance is struck, and he very often finds himself in debt to his employer. Many labourers of this description suffer in summer almost as much distress as the man who is only employed occasionally. If their stock of potatoes be exhausted before the new crop comes in, they must take potatoes on credit, at a very high price, from some farmer. In this case again, the only mode of payment is by labour. When the labourer's turf is fit to be drawn home, he gets the use of a car and horse from his employer, for one day, and for this he must give the work of five or six days. Every labourer rears a pig, and the wives of many keep two or three hens. The profits made in this manner afford the only opportunity of purchasing anything. It is stated by the witnesses, that two articles of dress are very seldom purchased in the same year; a hat is bought one year, and a pair of shoes the next, a coat the next, and so on. A peasant's coat or hat is usually made to last for several years. Women sometimes are able to earn a little by carrying turf on their backs from the bog; much turf is also saved by women, and brought into town by girls of 13 or 14. One of the witnesses remarks, "A woman will walk three miles to the bog, and bring a heavy basket of turf three miles into town, to earn 3 d.; and she could not make more than two such journies in the day." Few of the poorer classes use candles; whenever the wife can procure a little lard at the farmers' houses, they have recourse, as a substitute, to rushlights; but in general they are obliged to make use of the light afforded by a scanty fire.

Some labourers were questioned as to the reason why their cabins were not kept in neater order, and why the dung-heaps were in some instances spread over the entire space before the door, instead of being collected into one spot. They explained, 1st, that the manure which a poor man could collect was one of his greatest resources, and that many were of opinion that it was increased and enriched by being spread out before the door; and 2d, that as a labourer has no certainty of holding his cabin beyond a single year, he does not take any trouble to make improvements, of which another might enjoy the benefit. Fox, on being asked whether the latter cause operated extensively, replied, "Yes, I know two or three that are tolerably certain of holding their houses, and you may easily see they keep them differently from others. One of them has whitewashed and put a window in it, and has a clean dry floor, and has besides planted some young trees round it for ornament and shelter, and where his wife can spread her clothes to dry. There are many that would be like him if they had a hold of their houses." Much anxiety is displayed on the part of the people to obtain education for their children, but they are in many instances prevented from sending them to school by the want of sufficient clothing. Flinn says that he knew a child of eight years old who lived near the school; for two months he had nothing to cover him but an old petticoat of his mother's, and during that time he never went to school; at last the father got some little clothes for the boy, and since that he has gone regularly. With respect to the general condition of the peasantry as to bed clothing, Smith, a policeman, says, "I have frequently been in cabins at night, and have found five or six persons lying on the floor without any other covering than their day clothes." It was stated that when there were bed-clothes, they were generally in a most filthy state; and when it was observed that "they might easily be washed," it was answered, they would not bear washing, they were so tattered; and another reason was, it would take a long time to dry a sheet or blanket, and having no change, they might be obliged to do without them for a night or two." Many of the cabins which were visited afforded but very imperfect shelter, and admitted rain freely through the roof. Smith says, that "he has known families to be obliged to crouch under the hob to escape the rain which poured in upon them through the roof." Solemn as the obligation of hearing mass on Sunday is considered, it is believed that many are obliged to absent themselves from it from a want of decent clothing. "There was one man," observes Fox, "stayed away last Sunday for no other reason than that he had not a pair of shoes to his feet." Mr. Brown, a farmer, mentions that men at work for himself have been obliged to go home for want of clothes in cold weather, and that children are frequently prevented from going to school by the same cause.

Comparing the present times with the past, it is the opinion of all the witnesses that there is now less employment in Liscarrol than formerly, when much land was under tillage, which is now devoted to pasturage. In the neighbouring parish of Knockatemple, on the contrary, it is considered that the demand for labour has increased. This increase is referred to the opening of roads, which have afforded facilities for the drawing of manure to lands which had previously been uncultivated, and for the carrying the produce of such fertilized lands to markets. The sowing and the spinning of flax used once to occupy a large number of females; it does so no longer. Fox thinks that he sees a greater number of people wearing shoes and stockings than he used, but he knows people coming to mass now in a coat that they would have been ashamed to appear in four years ago. Mr. Freeman says, that within his recollection, the condition of all classes has improved except that of the labourers; their condition is certainly not better than it was formerly. "I know," observes Fox, "many people that were comfortably situated 10 years ago; they are now reduced to poverty, after pawning everything that they had."

being altogether equal to one man for 50 weeks, or less than one year. Admitting, then, that each of the 22 farmers who employ regular labourers, also give occasional employment to the amount of one man throughout the year, and that the remainder of the occasional employment which is offered in the parish is as much as the yearly labour of 48 men (which is the highest computation), it appears that occasional employment equal to the yearly labour of 70 men, is divided among 240, or, in other words, that each of the 240 has on an average less than four months' employment in the year. The farmers expressed great surprise at this result of their own calculations. They examined them, and ultimately declared that both calculations and conclusions were perfectly correct. They were asked how occasional labourers contrived to exist with so small an amount of employment; when Mr. Sullivan exclaimed, "I declare to God, I do not know how they manage to live throughout the country." The periods of least employment are the winter months, from the beginning of December to March; and again from the middle of June to the middle of August. During the former period almost every family is supplied with potatoes, but during the second interval the scarcity of that article is generally so great, that those who have not friends to relieve them, find themselves compelled either to quit their homes and go beg, or else to take potatoes on credit at a ruinous high rate. Connor, a weaver, says that he took a barrel in May, when potatoes were at 13 s., and that he had to pay 1 l. 5 s. for it in September. Several others state similar facts. Mr. Sullivan observes, "It may be considered as a general rule, that if potatoes are 1 l. a barrel in May, those who take them on credit must pay 1 l. 10 s. or 1 l. 15 s." The labourers were asked why they consented to take them at that price? "We must," said Leary, "either beg or starve, or give whatever they choose to ask us." To a question as to the state of the labourers who were thus spoken of, Fox replied, that they were "in great distress." He was asked what he understood by "great distress?" he said, "I call it great distress for a family to be obliged to leave their house after 24 hours' fasting, and to have to ask a bit to eat from strangers." He adds, that he knows that many people in the village lived on one meal a day during the last summer; many, however, have their feelings saved from the pain of being obliged to ask assistance. "For," continues Fox, "one neighbour goes about and tells another that there is distress in such a house, and there is no man that will not give a share of his dinner to relieve it." He was asked how the distress became known to a man's neighbour? "Neighbours," said he, "are often in each other's houses, and can see how things are going on, and sometimes they see the man stay abroad in his garden at meal time, which is very often the case."

A desperate resource with some poor people, is to dig their potatoes before they are ripe. It is stated that many are annually driven to this step; and that the loss sustained from the immaturity of the roots is very great. Mr. Browne, a farmer, knew a case where, when the roots had been found to be very small, the stalks had been separated, and potatoes grew upon them a second time. Duggan mentions an instance, where a ridge of late-set potatoes was dug about the 15th of August, and produced two bushels; a corresponding ridge was dug about three weeks later, and produced eight bushels; showing that the anticipation, through impending starvation, of the proper period of digging, had caused a loss of three-fourths in the first ridge.

Of labour required in the parish, a good deal is performed by men who come in large numbers from Kerry, more particularly during the season for digging potatoes.

As evidence of the anxiety of the peasantry to obtain employment, cases were quoted to the Assistant Commissioners, of men going four miles in the morning to their work for 8 d. a day, and having their dinner of potatoes (necessarily, from the distance, cold,) brought to them by their children; of women going two miles to earn 3 d. a day, and having their dinner brought to them in the same way. It was said, that they would go to any distance to get employment, particularly if it were constant.

MR. HODGES EYRE says, "The wages I give are 10 d. a day, paid daily, and I always find enough of labourers. If a labourer has a wife and four or five children, 11 d. a day is very poor provision for them."

When a labourer is out of employment, the wife is generally obliged to beg; but that is a poor resource; many, after begging for some time, discontinue the practice. Sweeny, a labourer, whose wife does not beg at present, but did so formerly, gives the following evidence: "I am a lime labourer; I was brought up so; I can get very little employment that way; I got only three weeks' employment since last Christmas; I am earning 10 s. this week; I was up last night, and the night before, and will be to-night and to-morrow night.

night. I may have employment at it next week, but I will not the week after. At other times I work as a common labourer. My wife did not beg this year, but she was obliged to do it last year; she never went out while I could keep her at home; she got very little while she was begging, she made no money of it; she's better off now; she has 14*s.* worth of dung, which herself and the children picked up. We were very much distressed this year. I owed Mr. Reardon in this town 13*s.*, and I was working it out with him as a labourer, attending a mason, at 8*d.* a day; while I was doing that my wife pawned her clothes, and bought a crib of turf and sold it in Kishawns, by which she made something: she is buying and selling the turf since; sometimes she makes the price of a weight of potatoes in the day, sometimes the price of half a weight; sometimes she makes only what little turf she burns herself."

One resource for the able-bodied out of employment is, to go to the counties of Limerick and Tipperary, and the northern parts of the county of Cork; in the harvest and potato-digging seasons great numbers go in this way, particularly of young unmarried men. A few are able to make something by the expedition, but many can do no more than support themselves while they continue out.

Daniel Keeffe, a labourer, says, "My brother went out this season to the country about Kanturk; he staid away about a fortnight, and brought home 6*s.*" Rev. Mr. Murray says, "Labourers seldom stay out so short a time as a fortnight, many stay away three months. I knew a case last year where a man brought home 25*s.* Sometimes they go so far as Clonmel and Kilkenny, and bring home nothing. I know the country about Charleville, which is a place of great resort for these people; sometimes there is good employment there, sometimes it is very difficult to get any; I have known labourers there, when the demand was slack, work for 1*d.* a day and their diet, sooner than return home."

Labourers, going in this way, are sometimes attacked and severely beaten by the resident labourers; cases of this sort occurred lately. Robberies or thefts, in consequence of distress, are very seldom committed. Mr. Walsh, Mr. Smith (chief constable of police) and the other witnesses, agreed that, considering the population and the distress which prevails, the cases of thefts are surprisingly few.

Labourers sometimes get credit for potatoes from the farmers, on condition of paying for them a sum considerably higher than the market price. Collins says, "They buy little pigs, too, on time, to rear, for double the value." Being asked why this was so, he says, "If you have not a shilling to buy the bonnuff*, you would promise them twice the value of it, to have something to depend on for the rent of the cabin or garden." The same witness says, "The times are getting harder every day; people will not trust one as they used to do; a man likes to keep a sure grip of what he has, and to get the most he can. The landlords screw the farmers; they would sooner burn themselves than reduce their rents, that cannot be paid. Many of them owe more than ever they will pay; I know one who owes his landlord over 30*l.*, and all he has outside his skin would not pay 10*l.*; as for the farmers, may be they squeeze the labourers more than the landlords squeeze them."

The following case illustrates one mode in which distressed labourers get credit: Thomas Barry is a labourer, having a wife and three children, the eldest son seven years old; states that his agreement with his employer was as follows: He was to work every day the farmer would give him employment, for 4*d.* a day and his diet (two meals); he was not to charge anything additional in the mowing season; the year is counted from the 25th of March to the 25th of March; he worked 195 days, 21 of these days he was mowing; he had a cabin from the farmer, for which he was to pay 30*s.*; the farmer to give him, in addition, the use of two horses for one day to draw home his turf from the bog. He took a quarter of an acre of manured land, for which he was to pay 1*l.* 15*s.*, being at the rate of 7*l.* per acre. He took half an acre, which he covered with the manure he had collected himself; for this he was to pay 10*s.*, being at the rate of 1*l.* per acre. When the potatoes of the previous year ran out, he took half a barrel on time, that is, on credit, for which he was to pay 10*s.*, at the rate of 1*l.* per barrel. He took also 7*s.* worth of milk, at a fair price. On the 25th of March last, the end of the year, his account stood thus:

Labourer:—Dr.		Cr.
Rent of cabin	£. 1 10 –	By wages, 195 days, at 4*d.* per,	£. 3 5 –
Rent of ½ acre of manured land	1 15 –
Ditto ½ acre unmanured	– 10 –
Half barrel potatoes	– 10 –
Milk	– 7 –
	£. 4 12 –
Deduct wages	3 5 –
Due to Farmer	£. 1 7 –

He says, "I owed him 1*l.* 7*s.*; I am trying to work that off; I did not take any manured land this year; for that reason I will be obliged to take twice, three times as much potatoes on time next year. I do not know how I will be able to pay for them, unless I get away from from the master I have now to one who will be more kind and give me indulgence." Mr. Hogan thinks Barry's case a hard one, and that farmers in general do not press their labourers so tightly.

Thomas Taylor, labourer, gives the following evidence: "I have to support a wife and six children; none of them is earning anything; the eldest is only 15. Two years ago I took three acres of rough mountain ground from a gentleman for two years, which never was tilled since the creation. I was to have the two crops; he was to give me 20 barrels of lime an acre for the last crop, and to plough it; he did not do either; I had no written agreement; I did not go to law with him; when a poor man gets tangled in a gentleman's agreement, he would rather loose 1 l. than stand up about it. First of all, I was to ditch it, 60 perches of ditch; a perch of ditch a day is hard work; then I had to graff it; it took 20 days to the acre; graffing is the hardest work a man can be at; while I was at it I drank but three gallons of milk; I should take it at that work; as for the family they would not touch it, or ask it. I spent the most of my time at that ground. I got 12 barrels of potatoes last year; they were wet, and so light, that if there was a wind they would fly to the other side of the road: if potatoes were 4*d.* a weight, I should get 1½*d.* for them; we eat them ourselves. I am getting nine barrels out of it this year, but the potatoes are better; they would be very good if I got the lime that I was promised." The witness being desired to describe how he lived during the present year, says, "Last 25th of March I took a corner, three or four ropes,* from a man that had an acre; I wanted to build a cabin on it; I was obliged to go to the gentlemen about to get sticks to roof it; I was only able to finish it about a month ago; while I was at it, myself and family lived in a neighbour's house; it is covered with sods; if I thatched it, it would cost me another 1 l.; though I have the use of it only so long, I must pay 1 l. for it next Lady-day. We lived this year on them bad potatoes I told you of, and on some I had out of a quarter and a half of ground I manured myself; part of my time that I was not working on the land or building the little house I went gathering furze blossoms; I spent about 15 days at it; I sold 20 quarts at 6*d.* a quart, that was 10*s.*; our potatoes were out the 24th of June; I got half a barrel on time; I was to pay 1 l.; 15*s.* would buy them in the market; after that I got half a bag of wheat at 12*s.* I commenced digging potatoes about the 20th July; they were not ripe, but I should root them out if I could get anything, for I had no more credit. I have two little pigs I bought six months ago, on time; I am to pay 16*s.* for the two; with money I could get them for half that; I think I may be able to sell them, next 25th March, for 12*s.* or 13*s.* each. I do not know how I shall be able to pay all I owe; I took so much on me because I thought I should get the lime for the ground I graffed, and be able to sell from one to two barrels of potatoes out of it, and I thought there would be a better price for the pigs."

The wages of a labourer would not be more than sufficient for his support, even if he had regular employment; where he has not, it is the utmost he can do to exist. Daly says, "I know a labourer that lodges in the same house with me; he is not long married; he has one child; he is very willing to work if he could get it, but he is often without it; he is in debt 7*s.* for rent; he did not borrow money, because he had no credit to get it. Milk is very cheap now; you would get four quarts for 1*d.*, but I know that man and his wife not to taste a drop these three weeks, because they had not 1*d.* to get it."

Early marriages are more common among farmers' sons, and more particularly farmers' daughters, than in the poorer classes. It arises from their having more means, and in case of the daughters, from the fathers being anxious to settle them in the world, to put them out of danger, and to ensure them protection. Mr. Hedges Eyre says, "I believe early marriages among the peasantry to be a great evil. I do not know the cause, but I have heard some of themselves saying that their riches were their children." Collins, a tradesman, says, "I often and often heard labouring boys say, 'A wife will not make me worse than I am, and if I have children, they will, may be, be a help to me in my old days;' but I never knew any one to marry just for that reason."

THE months of January, February and July are the periods of the year at which the greater number of the labouring population of this parish are usually unable to find employment; but, even during the remainder of the year, the proportion of the employed to the unemployed is, at all times, very inconsiderable.

Many persons have recently emigrated from this parish, and many others have only been prevented from following the same course by the want of means. In the dearth of occupation at home a part of the labourers have recourse to the expedient of going to the north of the country to look for work at the season for digging potatoes, viz. at the latter end of autumn; and it was stated by the witnesses, that at least 100 individuals had left Ross for this purpose during the season that had just elapsed. It would not be easy to exaggerate the distress which is endured by the families of unemployed labourers. During many months of the year they are obliged to subsist on a quantity of food wholly insufficient for the maintenance of a state of health, and their clothing is in general of the most wretched description. Thomas Fitzgerald, who may be considered to represent the condition of his class, says, "I am walking up and down these six weeks without doing anything; I am able and willing to work, but I cannot get employment; I will not allow my wife to beg, for we will sooner suffer anything than that; we would rather live on one meal surely, and many is the day I have worked hard upon one meal." After this man had spoken, the Rev. Mr. Wood observed, "I have known his family, while he was perfectly willing to work, to be in a most frightful state of destitution, his wife lying sick, with scarcely enough to cover her, at a time that everything that could be sent out had been either sold or pawned. Their whole house," adds the Rev. Mr. Wood, "presented a picture of the most heart-rending wretchedness." Mr. Callinan mentioned the case of a man who had come to him one summer after having pawned his own, his wife's and his children's clothes, and, in a state bordering on starvation, prayed to be employed; Mr. Callinan did employ him; potatoes happened to be very dear at that time, and his wages barely sufficed to give himself and his children one meal a day. He nevertheless continued to work on that scanty sustenance, sometimes receiving his supper in addition from his employer.

Mention has been already made of the condition in which the great majority of the labourers are with respect to clothing. The Rev. Mr. Wood alluded to the subject again, and observed, that labourers are often prevented from prosecuting their work in cold weather by the insufficiency of their covering. Thomas Fitzgerald says, that he has worked for Mr. Wood of a winter's day in trowsers and shirt, having nothing else to put on him. A want of decent raiment, in many cases, withholds working men from attending public worship at mass on Sundays.

Early and improvident matches are extremely prevalent in this district. Mr. Hungerford states, "that it would be easy to point out several instances where individuals have married, who between them scarcely possessed the marriage-money or the ordinary fees that are given to the clergyman for performing the ceremony." The same witness remarks, that premature and imprudent matches are a great, and, in his opinion, an increasing evil. They take place to a very great extent among farmers' servants, who form connexions with young women domesticated in the same house as their fellow-servants. Many such unions are also contracted at fairs, where young people of both sexes are brought together and drink, and then in the heat of the moment, without any deliberation, they are too apt to contract hasty and injudicious engagements.

Mr. Galway is inclined to think that rule of the Roman-catholic Church which interdicts the celebration of the marriage ceremony during the period of Lent, is the indirect cause that a great many unions are formed which would not otherwise have taken place. "If a couple," explains Mr. Galway, "be not married before Shrove-Tuesday, they know that they shall have to await the expiration of seven or eight weeks. The effect of this is, that the necessity of deciding before the arrival of a particular period, induces the formation of many precipitate decisions, which, if there had been time for pause, might not have been adopted at all." Mr. Galway states, as corroborating his view of the matter, that "nearly three-fourths of all the marriages which take place in the year, occur during the weeks immediately preceding Shrovetide."

"The reason," says Mr. Mahony, "that girls are so often married young is, that when a man and his wife have nothing to leave their daughter, they are glad to have an opportunity of giving her to some one that will protect and support her, and prevent her bringing shame on herself and friends, for want of some one to look after her. I have," continues Mr. Mahony, "heard both men and women say, that a stale old bachelor that has no one but himself to support, is just as badly off as people that have a house full of children; but I do not mean to assert that such considerations are thought of when young people are going to get married."

Note.—When the names "Mahony" and "Sullivan" occur, the persons meant are "James Mahony" and "Daniel Sullivan."

FROM the latter end of May to the beginning of August, half the labourers are unemployed. In the months of December, January and February, there is very little employment. Many have been heard to say, it would be better to be in gaol than in their condition when out of employment; but there have been no cases known of persons committing crimes for the purpose of being sent there. There are no instances of labourers being able to save money.

Many of the labourers of this parish who are out of work, go to the northern parts of the county, and to the counties of Limerick and Tipperary to procure employment in getting in the harvest and digging potatoes; some are able to bring home money, and some return without money, being able to do no more than subsist while out. Regan, a labourer, says, "I was out last year, near Doneraile, cutting the harvest; I went out in August, and staid 13 weeks. I brought home 34 s.; I did not drink a pint of whiskey while I was out. On a Sunday, when I was not getting my diet from a farmer, I might take a pint of porter, and 1 d. or 2 d. worth of bread. I did not spend it on myself, because it was for my little family I went out to earn it. I did not go out this season, because I expected to get employment at the mine." Sullivan says, "I went out last season, too, and staid away nine weeks; I brought home 19 s."

Mr. Barry thinks there are about 160 men who leave this parish to look for employment in the potato-digging season. Many were kept at home this season by the hope of getting employment at the mines. I could get 100 men in the turn of a hand to work for 8 d. a day without diet. Donovan says, "I know a man living near me, that is looking for employment in the mine; his name is on the list, and he is going every day to see if he will be taken; there are a great many others applying for employment there just as bad."

Labourers go to England also from this parish sometimes. Cornelius Mahony says, "There was a brother of mine went to England last May; he owed some money for potatoes he took on time, and he went to see if he could earn enough to pay it; if he can make up enough to pay, he will come home before Christmas; but if not, he will stay. I am afraid we will not see him at Christmas." Sullivan says, "Two neighbours of mine went off to England last May; one of them, Daniel Duggane, has an old man, a father, a sister, and a brother; he left them a little garden, set, and went to try, would he get as much as would release it; he did not bring home 5 s. The other man, Harvey, has a father and mother and sister; he came back about three weeks ago, and brought a sovereign; both of the men had enough to take them to England, but I am in dread it was low enough there with them; they would be ashamed to tell the way they were in."

Being asked how they got home, the witness says, "They had to pay for the steam to Waterford, and they came from that here, much the same as begging; they would go into a farmer's house and ask lodging, and it would not be refused." Mahony says, "I was in England twice, once about eight years ago, and I got nothing by it but what brought me home to Cork; another man, a comrade I had, gave me what brought me from Cork here. I went to England again, about three years ago, and before I came home I sent over 1 l. to free a little garden I had." Barry asked the reason why the second trip turned out so differently from the first. The witness says, "I was married, and had a young family the second time. When I had no one but myself, I would spend freer; but when I had them to look to, I would be content to want it in many ways myself, that they might have it." The number who go to England is less than it was formerly. Early marriages are very common in this parish. Mr. Barry says, "I have married boys of 16, and girls of 14 or 15, and many from 16 to 20; it arises in part from the facility of setting up an establishment, and in part from the wretchedness of their condition. Where a poor servant-boy is with a farmer, he says, "I have no one to wash for me or do anything; I may as well have a wife to keep house; we will be able to make out life some way or other, and I do no more now." The following cases mentioned by the labourers illustrate this remark: John Baskum, a servant-boy about 16, married a girl about 17; "he had scarcely as much as could cover his skin; they had scarcely bed-clothes to cover them; he is as badly off now; he could not be worse." Daly, about 17, married a girl about 16 years; they were servants, but not in the same house; "he was not 6 d. above a beggar." Mr. Barry says, "I have been in his cabin, and he had not 4*d.* worth of anything like furniture in it." James Helen, about 17, married a girl about 17; they were servants in the same house; you may almost take the description of Daly's case for his, he was hardly able to cover himself. Fitzgerald, about 17, married a girl about 17; he was a poor servant-boy; she was very poor too; they are as badly off; they cannot be worse. Sullivan says, "When Fitzgerald came to be married last Shrovetide, Mr. Barry wanted to persuade him against it, but he would not listen to anything; he said he could not be worse than he was." Murphy says, "It is the man that is worst off that marries soonest here; the man that has something is not in such a hurry." Mr. Barry says, "I have frequently entreated young persons who came to me to be married, to desist, and not to bring upon themselves the weight of a family, with so little preparation; but I have scarcely ever been able to prevail."

Mr. Swanton mentions a case which occurred about five or six years ago in the west, and which shows the distress which is sometimes produced by want of fuel: two families who lived near each other, were obliged to burn their chairs and bedsteads to boil their potatoes. When everything consumable was gone, they were obliged to live together in one house, in order to burn the thatch and rafters of the other.

In many cabins the water soaks in through the walls and through the thatch, whenever it rains. Mr. Swanton says, "About a twelvemonth ago I found a labourer's family in a most distressing condition; it consisted of a man, his wife and child, his wife's father and two young lads, in all six persons; the rain was pouring in through the roof, and I saw them all gathered close together in a corner, where the thatch was more sound; they had what clothes they had over them; during the whole night they could not lie down."

Rev. John Barry says, "I had to attend the widow Mahony about four months ago; she was ill. I observed some of the children literally naked, and some of them little better."

"THE greatest dependence of the poor is on each other, and those immediately above them. Poor people often give their meal and part of a single room. Many persons relieved by the society were found lying on bare floors, and in such places that it was impossible to see them without a candle.

The wives and children of unemployed labourers are obliged to beg; the children are frequently initiated in thieving, and the inevitable result is to rear up a body of mendicants, distinct from the rest of the community.

No instances occur of their committing trivial offences to be sent to gaol for subsistence, but they sometimes commit crimes to be transported.

The labourer sometimes gets credit, but not to any great amount; the huckster will not let him run too much in his debt.

Labourers brought up in a city in general marry early. The confined manner of living in cities; the practice of many people, of different sexes, living and sleeping in the same room, are the causes of many early marriages.

The habits are as follow: two or three families occupy one room; we have found four families in a room, in one corner a woman who had just been delivered, lying on a little straw, no other straw in the place.

The family of the tradesman is often more wretched than that of the labourer; tradesmen drink so much. Inspecting the houses, we found the most squalid misery in the house of a tradesman earning 3*s.* 6*d.* a day."

IN this parish there are seldom more than half the labourers employed; how then is the family to live? when a poor man has but two days' work in the week, what can he do? Looking at bare walls, and having nothing to eat, his wife or daughter goes out to get what she can, often striving not to be known by the neighbours to do it; even instances have been known of the daughters of decent fathers driven to street prostitution by poverty.

No cases have come within the knowledge of witnesses, of persons committing trifling offences for the purpose of being sent to prison to obtain food and shelter, but some have committed offences to be transported, in order to go to their friends, not from extreme destitution. Yet there are instances of stealing in order to get something for relief; sometimes times you see the children of the poor stealing hay and straw from the carts on the quay, and thus grow up to be thieves and pickpockets.

It is usual with labourers out of work to obtain provisions on credit; many small shopkeepers, grocers and hucksters give a great deal of credit. It is often a benefit to them, and they generally charge a fair price; many, however, who give credit suffer by it; persons contract small debts with them, and then take the benefit of the Insolvent Act; in fact, things of this sort must take place, it being impossible to lay by for the time when there is no work.

Early marriages were stated to be very numerous among tradesmen and labourers, the men generally marrying from 20 to 25 years of age, and the women from 18 to 22. There are many houses about the city where the lower classes meet to drink and dance, and this produces early marriages, and connexions of an improper kind too frequently."

IN the winter season many are out employment, and very few have regular employment throughout the year. When out of work, they are reduced to few and very scanty meals for their subsistence. On this subject the Rev. J. F. M'Namara, parish priest, says, "But few have regular employment, while there are few who have not some employment occasionally; the consequence is, that though there are not many destitute in the strict sense of the word, there is an immense number in a most wretched condition; they have food, but of a bad kind and quite insufficient in quantity; many of them are reduced to a single meal in the day. The labouring classes (particularly in the country) are often obliged to eat a sort of potatoes which I verily believe would be rank poison if their constitutions were not accustomed to it. I am sure that if a body of English peasants were obliged to use such food for four months, nine out of ten would not survive at the end of that period."

There is sometimes the greatest reluctance amongst the labouring classes to acknowledge the degree of distress to which they are reduced; they pledge the commonest necessary articles of dress, and stint themselves in their meals, rather than make their misery known.

About four months ago there was an attack of cholera here. It was found that some of those who had been attacked were without clothing, and in particular that some women who died were without chemises.

Inquiries were immediately made at the cabins of the different poor, in order to supply a chemise to any who wanted one; not one would admit that she did, and yet in a short time afterward some of them died, and were found to be without.

Hucksters sometimes give the labourers credit, but to a very small extent; they are not charged more than about a fair price, and the small extent of the credit prevents them from being in debt.

The labourers are not rendered reckless by the constant recurrence of destitution; they have a great deal of resignation, attributing their condition to the decrees of Providence.

The opinion of the two roman-catholic clergyman of the parish is, that there is a great tendency on the part of the working classes to contract early marriages, but that it does not arise from recklessness. They say, "We have frequently reasoned with them, and showed them that they are bringing on themselves the burden of a family without any preparation. When they persist, and are bent on marriage, of course we cannot refuse to perform the ceremony; we must preserve them as much from vice as possible, at all events."

Rev. J. F. M'Namara, in continuation, "Commonly a whole family, sometimes two or three families, live in one room. I have found eight persons, unconnected with each other, living in a single room, more than once. Three beggars sometimes join and pay 2 d. or 2 ½ d. a week to have a room among them; six to a room is about the average number.

"Poor people who do not beg, as well as those who do, sometimes get a corner for charity from those that have but one room.

"At this moment there is a poor old woman employed to keep the chapel clean, at 1 s. 6 d. a week, and she has very little else to live upon. She has given lodging to a poor boy who is nearly blind, and who has had no friends to assist him for the last nine or ten weeks, and she occasionally gives him food besides."

The same witness says, "I have frequently found a room inhabited where the rain came in through the walls and broken roof. There are a great many without bed-clothes; they are obliged to lie down in the clothes they have worn all day, and these are often wet. There is seldom any regular bedding, they do not think of providing such a thing; they lie on a little straw, which is rarely changed; I have sometimes seen it so broken into pieces by repeated shiftings as to be almost powder."

With poor people, in general, it requires such a struggle to obtain a bare sufficiency of food, that they are delighted when they can accomplish this point, and very often do not provide for anything further. On this account, they are often in a most miserable state for want of clothes; the children of tradesmen are often without shoes; "I have known cases" continues the parish priest, "of men being unable to get work; of women being unable to get places as servants; and of children (particularly those of widows) being unable to go to school for want of clothes."

Sometimes women in the country, who are better off than these, are unable to go to mass for the same reasons; I have known a case where there was but one cloak between four or five females; and one would walk off a distance of three or four miles to first mass, and walk back to give her cloak to another to go to the second.

Fishermen.

IN the Hooker-Fishing there are about 300 men employed. Although their weekly earnings vary greatly throughout the year, they are always employed, from the nature of the agreement between them and the boat-owners. The boat-owners supply the boats and agree with the fishermen by the year. They go out every day, unless the weather is very bad; on an average they would be able to go out five days in the week. Of the fish brought in, a certain proportional part (varying at different seasons of the year,) is given to the boat-owners, the remainder is the property of the men. Very few weeks occur in the year, during which the earnings of the fishermen are not more than 2*s.*; and very few also occur in which they amount to 25*s.* or 26*s.*, 10, 11, 12.

On an average more than three-fourths of the fishermen earn 8*s.* a week; 10 between 7*s.* and 8*s.* a week; 11 between 8*s.* and 9*s.* a week. "I kept an account of the earnings of my men, and taking the whole year round, and dividing by 12, I found it was between 8*s.* and 9*s.*"

The remainder of the fishers, who go out in inferior boats, earn, on an average, from 4*s.* to 5*s.*

A few of the fishers are exceedingly decent and comfortable, but by far the greater number of them lead wretched lives. When they get a large payment, they go at once to the whiskey shop; and when fish is scarce, and their weekly income little, they are sometimes almost starving, pawning their very jackets to get food. Their earnings, at the very lowest average, are 7*s.* 6*d.* a week; and out of that, they could very easily provide, not only for scarce seasons, but also for their widows and orphans; but they make no provision for anything. Their infatuation, in getting drunk, prevents them from earning near so much as they might.

"The earnings of each man of the crew of one of my boats (the William the Fourth) for the fortnight before Monday last, amount to 55*s.*, 50*s.* in actual money and about 5*s.* worth of fish." That is, each man earned 27*s.* 6*d.* a week. They were to sail again on Monday; the boat was ready, but the master and two of the men were absent; they went off to some dancing house in Kinsale, and got drunk; I was obliged to get strange men; they went out and brought in 3 l. worth of fish in the morning."

There is a custom of giving a bottle of spirits, or the price of one, with the money, for every batch of fish that is bought; of course it is in reality part of the price of the fish; this produces a great deal of drunkenness.

At present there is not one of them out of employment, that I am aware of.

The Seiners are another description of fishermen; there are about 120; they fish in the harbour, and the season lasts from June till about Christmas or January. They earn 4*s.* or 5*s.* a week, and have almost all of them potato gardens; many of them work as labourers, during the early part of the year, and their wives go out to the country with pins and needles, tobacco, and other little things, and get more than their value in potatoes, in exchange.

The Drift-Net fishing employs about an equal number, and the men resemble the Seiners very much in their condition and habits.

Immediately before the fishing season commences, the Seiners are often in great distress; their potatoes are out, and their wives and children obliged to go out to the country to beg; but they suffer any privation, rather than beg; they go to the country with tobacco, and get potatoes in return, and though the potatoes are often given from charity, they are not regular beggars, so long as they give in exchange.

DURING the first six months of the year there are a great many of the labourers who have only partial employment. About 30 labourers go to England in May, and there remain at least 120, who have not regular employment; these in summer, just before the potatoes are out, or when they are exhausted, are obliged to do with fewer meals, generally two; sometimes one; there are at least 40 families so reduced every summer.

Crowley says, "I have been obliged to do with one meal myself during the summer, when I was out of work; not for a whole week together; I could not do that; but for two and sometimes sometimes three days at a time." There is no regular fund to meet this distress, but there was 1,000*l.* left about a year ago to the poor of the barony by Mr. Rochfort. It has been nearly all distributed.

They stick to their houses as long as they can, and pawn their clothes to buy potatoes; when they are obliged to ask for charity they do not go round as common beggars, but to the houses of the farmers, with perhaps a little tobacco, or something of the kind, and get three or four times its value in potatoes.

They sometimes joke about the superiority of the condition of prisoners to their own, but no one of them would ever think of committing a crime to be sent to gaol. They have a spirit of decency which prevents them from this: not long ago, there was a man sent to the tread-mill for three or four months; he went in thin and miserable, and came out fat and well-looking, the change was universally remarked, and caused much merriment, but no one was induced to get himself sent to the tread-mill in consequence.

Mr. Cotter states, "I am living here nearly 11 years, and I never knew so honest a people; firing is exceedingly scarce in this district. I have had some furze cut, lying out in a sort of thoroughfare, and forgotten for nearly a month, not a single bundle was stolen." And Mr. Gibbons corroborates the statement. "I frequently," said he, "have furze out all night, I scatter it over a large space of ground, and none of it is ever stolen; I think any one of them would rather go supperless to bed than steal it to boil their potatoes."

Some persons give credit to their labourers when they are out of work, and it is often very injurious to those who take it; there are some persons in the barony, though not in this parish, who will give credit for 10*s.* or 15*s.* worth, and force nearly double the value of that in labour in return; in such cases the exertions of the labourer are paralyzed, and he cannot make a sufficient provision for winter. For a labourer who is regularly employed by a farmer through the whole year, and has a potato garden and a pig, and whose wife and children occasionally get something to do, it may be possible to make provision against contingencies; but for more than one-half of the labourers, it is impossible. It is not possible to ascertain the precise nature of the feeling which is created in their minds by this unfortunate destitution; but they often say, 'Happen what may, we cannot be worse off.'"

Farmers sons in general marry earlier than labourers; but of the labourers themselves, those who are best off are certainly most cautious in contracting marriages; when a labourer is comfortable, he looks about for a little money before he settles himself; the poorer labourers generally marry young, from 20 to 25, and women of the same class, from 19 to 22 or 23; the improvidence of some of them in contracting marriages, is most deplorable. Mr. Cotter says, "In visiting the cabins, to find out the fittest objects for the Rochfort Charity, I found two or three young couples, not four months married, who had no bed-clothes; yet I do not think, that in contracting improvident marriages, the labourer is influenced by the feeling that he cannot be worse off than he is; he looks rather to the society and positive pleasure of a family, and it should be recollected that these are often the only comforts of the poor labourer during his life."

Mr. Rochfort's bequest of 1,000*l.* for charitable purposes, was about a year ago, when, in order to distribute it, we visited the cabins of the poor to ascertain their actual state; we found numbers lying on a little straw on the floor of their cabin, we then gave out about 700 bedsteads and 300 pair of blankets, since that time they are of course much better off. "I feel the greatest reluctance (says Dr. Wood,) in ordering medicine which requires patients to be warm, they have no means against the cold."

The following Statement is from Mr. Cotter:

IT has been lately said that, in the prosecution of public works, the chief difficulty was to obtain a sufficient supply of labourers. From this many would think that there were no labourers wanting employment. It is probable that this is not the case; if the labourers in that district are situated as they are here, the difficulty is easily explained. They have generally to walk a great distance from home to their work in making roads, and they have no way of getting their meals but having their potatoes sent to them. This is often very difficult, and when it is done occupies their children entirely, and they get the potatoes cold. The wages are so small for all this hard work and privation, that any sort of existence near home is preferable, and they have often told me so; they have said that the wages would scarcely pay for the wear and tear of their shoes and their children's shoes.

When I came from Dublin, about the middle of last June, I heard that there was a great deal of distress in the parish; I got oatmeal boiled into porridge, and commenced giving out portions of it, once a day, to any who would come for it (about a pint to each). It was of such a description that no one would come for it, unless reduced to the greatest distress.

There were about 400 persons who took this relief, able-bodied as well as infirm men, women and children. There were probably 50 able-bodied men; many of these poor people told me that they had nothing else to depend upon.

I am satisfied that many of the labouring class suffer permanently in health, from insufficient food and want of necessary accommodation; I have often observed smart and healthy looking young women becoming pale and languid and old looking, within three or four years after getting married, and I think it is owing to damp cabins and insufficient protection against cold; their clothing is very bad, and firing is scarce.

WHILE they can, they get in a stone of potatoes to serve them when they are out of employment; when they see the potatoes nearly at an end, they reduce the quantity and number of their meals, to make the provision hold out, and in this way are often forced to live on a single meal. Labourers in employment take three meals regularly; even now (September) there are some labourers in the parish living on their potatoes and without work.

Begging is their last expedient, but they are sometimes driven to it.

Labourers used to get credit from the farmers; but they do not now, because many of them endeavoured to avoid the payment of their debts.

The desire to relieve distress does not induce the gentlemen or farmers in the parish to employ more labourers than they want; and, under all the circumstances of labourers, it would be utterly impossible for them to lay by, in working season, for the time of non-employment. Marriage, among labourers, takes place at about 25 in men, and 22 or 23 in women.

Hitherto the country has been most quiet; but there will be more labourers out of employment shortly; some farmers are turning from tillage to feeding, and it is doubtful how long the quietness may continue.

The following account was given by two farmers examined, of the accommodation of the poor in the parish generally.

Men and women are sometimes obliged to stay within for want of sufficient clothes to appear in; poor people are generally obliged to lie in the clothes they wear during the day. When their houses were visited, at the time of the cholera, many were found without bed-clothes. Blankets were given to about 100 of the most distressed families, that is, a single blanket to a family; numbers of them are obliged to lie with only a sheet to cover them, and in their wet clothes, that they have worn during the day. They get clean straw about once a year.

DURING a considerable portion of the summer months, the greater part of the labourers are unable to procure any employment; and at this period, when wages are not to be had, it usually happens that potatoes have reached their highest price; with both these circumstances against him, there is no source whence the labourer can draw any assistance; he becomes entirely dependent for his daily subsistence on the small savings which he may have made from his earnings during the latter months of the year, when he had the produce of his potato crop to maintain him and his family. An able-bodied man is never to be seen begging; he will endure the greatest privations before he permits his wife or children to have recourse to mendicancy, which is at all times the last resource of the distressed peasantry.

Thefts committed by persons in a state of destitution are rarely if ever heard of; "There may be," says the Rev. Mr. Sullivan, "one instance of it in 5,000, and not more."

In the months of June and July the poor in the country parts of the parish are compelled, by immediate and pressing necessity, to take provisions on credit, as there is then no work excepting occasionally at making fences. "At this period," observes Mr. Hoare, "the poor of the town, though equally in want, cannot procure themselves the questionable advantage of obtaining food on trust; but still they suffer an immensity before they will go out to beg." Early marriages are universal; the usual age for contracting matrimony being about 20 on the part of the man, and from 16 to 20 on that of the woman, but more frequently 17. With respect to the effects of destitution in leading to improvident and premature unions, it has been remarked that the greater number of such connexions take place, not so much among the extremely poor as amongst those who are a little further removed from want.

They live on potatoes and the price of the pig, and sometimes get con-acre for 25*s.* a quarter, which they manure themselves. Fish is also much eaten by the peasantry in this neighbourhood; and some of them go out to to sea and fish themselves, while others purchase it at a low rate; 2 d. would in general buy a "hake" (a fish larger than a haddock), which is generally enough to make a meal for three men, with potatoes; sometimes it is dearer, and sometimes cheaper. The labourers out of work are forced to beg in the summer. Mr. Goodman stated that pilfering was not considered as a general resource for poor labourers in a hard summer. They are forced to steal a sheep from the mountain sometimes, but what is called pilfering is very rare in that quarter.

With regard to the system of credit, the labourers who are without work or provisions, frequently do resort to it, and pay sometimes in work, or pass their notes for what they receive, or borrow some potatoes in the presence of a witness. It was the general opinion however that a saving's bank would be of no use in that quarter, as the farmers would be afraid to put deposits into it for fear the landlords would find it out. Potatoes obtained on credit in this manner, are always procured upon much higher terms than in the market. It was the general opinion of those present that labourers when in employment endeavour to save as much as they possibly can.

Mr. Sullivan remarked with regard to early marriages, that all the peasantry in general marry very young. The labourers however earliest of any. The servant boys do so in order to have a person to attend them, and to wash their clothes, &c.; and the servant girls in order to have a provision for their old age. These marriages are not in general the result of inclination, but rather prudential arrangements between the parties.

IN the interval between December and March there is very little employment for the able-bodied labourer. In the summer months also, a large number of working men are unable to find profitable occupation on shore; and consider themselves fortunate if they can procure themselves a subsistence by fishing. The condition however of the peasantry, on the whole, may be considered as having improved; the men now never go barefooted; whereas, formerly five out of six had neither shoes nor stockings.

At one period of the year many entire families leave the country for the sole purpose of begging, and of others, the husbands alone remain, either to attend to his own garden, or to work for his immediate landlord, who is generally some small farmer, the number of days which it has been stipulated that he shall be allowed to count as part payment of his rent. In this case the eldest daughter sometimes stays with her father.

Petty thefts are not uncommon in this neighbourhood, and in times of scarcity they increase perceptibly in frequency. Pits of potatoes are then often fraudulently opened, and their contents removed; gardens are plundered of fruit and vegetables; fish are stolen from the shore, and even sheep have been taken from the mountains.

Some poor people who have no other means of existence, get potatoes on credit, on which they endeavour to subsist until the time arrives when they are accustomed to leave their homes on their annual tour of mendicancy; an exorbitant rate of interest is generally exacted for an accommodation of this kind; a few months are "indulged" to the debtor, at the expiration of which, he is compelled to pay for what he has borrowed, in most cases at double the price at which the article was to be had in the market at the time of contracting the debt.

The labouring classes marry very early in these parishes, females on an average at 16 or 17, and males at from 21 to 22. "I have married girls of 12 and 13," observes the Rev. Mr. Fitzmaurice, "and at this moment there is a married woman in Templenoe, who has had a child at the age of 14: the child is still alive, and is well formed." It has not been observed that any particular class of the inhabitants are more prone to premature unions than another. The witnesses state, all are nearly of the same class, and that a common motive of matrimony is, that the parties may have children before they grow old, amongst whom they may divide their means, if they have any; many are also anxious to settle their children while young, in order to withdraw them from the danger of immorality.

Emigration to some extent has recently taken place from Kenmare; 30 or 40 labourers and tradesmen, of a class somewhat above the lowest, have gone to the colonies. Many others declare that want of means alone prevents them from following their example.

At no period of the year, not even in harvest, are all the labourers of the parish employed. But in December and January, and still more so during a part of the summer, a large proportion of the labouring men are completely without work. The witnesses state that, on an average, a man, not permanently engaged in the service of some individual, is not employed for more than half the number of days in the year. In general, however, a working man does not depend on hire for his subsistence, his con-acre potatoes last him until about April or May, when those are exhausted and employment is not to be had, many labourers after having pledged their clothes to procure food, leave the parish and go elsewhere in search of work. Their wives and children remain behind, and either apply privately for aid to those farmers near whom they live, and to whom they are known, or else beg openly about the neighbourhood. In some cases a disposition to beg seems to be inherited.

THE Rev. Mr. Fitzmaurice has heard it said of families in the south: "No wonder the daughter begs, the mother was a great beggar before her." He adds, however, that even of these, poverty was the original cause of mendicancy.

The system of giving provisions to the unemployed poor on credit, and exacting a high rate of interest for the accommodation, has never become common in this parish. Sometimes a person that has not ready money is obliged to promise too high a price for a cow, or a pig, or for seed oats, but this is only to farmers, and never to gentlemen.

The ordinary wages of the place are 8*d.* a day, without diet; in harvest something more. Those who have constant employment at 10*d.* or 1*s.* a day are considered much better off than any mechanics.

Marriages take place at a very early age among the labouring population, and amongst the smaller description of farmers. Many girls are married at 15, and there is at present in the parish a woman who was the mother of a second son before she had arrived at that age. The witnesses state that parents, who have a grown-up family, and who have but small means to support them, are in favour of these premature matches, in order that as many of their children as possible may be thrown upon their own resources, and in the case of daughters that their virtue may not be endangered, and that the burden of their fortunes may be distributed over the wider surface. A woman in the poorest class is always ready to marry; "It takes her," as she would say, "out of the people's mouths;" and when advanced in years she has one motive, in addition to those which actuated her at an earlier period of life, she wishes to have children to support her in her old age. "In fact," observes one of the witnesses, "poverty is not only the consequence of early marriages, but still more frequently the cause of them; and it has occurred in one instance, that a woman had an illegitimate child with a view (as she herself stated) of having somebody to look after her when she was too old to take care of herself."

THE remuneration for the able-bodied labourer is very inadequate, consisting only of from 6*d.* to 8*d.* a day; they will, however, work for anything sooner than be idle. It is very bad policy to give low wages, because they drag out the labour, and do as little as possible; the heart does not go with the hand.

This want of employment is owing entirely to the want of smart farmers; the majority of the landholders do only what they cannot avoid. The labourer gets, on an average, about 150 days' work in the course of the year; the worst periods for them are during the winter and summer quarters. During the winter three months, they live upon the produce of their potato ground; more of them have quarter ground than gardens; and, in general, in the quarter ground they have two crops. The rent varies from 5*l.* an acre downwards. They manure and till the ground themselves.

In the months of May, June and July, many buy potatoes from the persons for whom they work, and at whatever time they get them they pay the summer price for them. Some of the farmers do this, but it could not be said exactly that any of the gentry do it. They repay them in work sometimes, and sometimes in money.

The labourer is always very averse to beg, nor will his wife and children beg unless times are very bad.

There are not many from that parish who are in the habit of going eastward in search of work, and those who do go, in general, do not take families with them, but either leave provisions with them at home, or send remittances to them. When they do take their families, which is but very seldom, they shut up their cabins after them.

There were no robberies in that parish, nor had there been a house forcibly entered for upwards of six years. The only crimes were a little potato pilfering in times of great distress.

Mr. Brady stated, "That the gentry were, in general, very hostile to ameliorating the condition of the poor at their own expense. They generally say that 'the poor are damn'd well off.'"

All these classes marry young; the poor labourers even as early as any others. As to the subdivision of farms among the children, that system is very nearly put an end to in that parish; and, in general, farmers provide for their children now without dividing the land, as they used to do formerly. Some of them are bound to trades, but invariably the children of farmers become worse off than the father; they descend to the class of labourers. In very many cases the desire of avoiding destitution in old age is an inducement to marriage.

The Rev. Mr. Mahony observed, on this subject, that he has heard the observation made, that single women somewhat advanced in life, and without hope of marriage, will have illegitimate children, in order to support them in their old age. There are a good many unmarried persons above 30 years of age among the labouring classes. The difficulty of getting land at present discourages marriage; there is, however, a great facility of building cabins near the towns.

Mr. Church, apothecary and postmaster of Listowell, states, "There was a great many vagrants in that town, who were able to work, but preferred going about begging; this arose, in a great degree, from the bad habits in which they were reared. Vagrancy, however, is not increasing, and is greatest during the months of May, June and July; it is not so great however in winter." There were many cases there of persons who go about in search of work, and take their families along with them. There was a great number of resident beggars, some of whom were the wives of labourers whose husbands were absent working; others of them have their husbands at home.

The men seldom beg in this neighbourhood, though able-bodied strangers occasionally do; but they are generally single men, representing themselves to be poor tradesmen. A few of this class are impostors, who, the moment they get a few halfpence, go and drink it; they always wish to get money, yet still they never refuse provisions; they generally ask for money to pay for their lodgings. Those who have gardens do not generally beg, at least in the neighbourhood, and the tradespeople of the town, though very poor, are not given to begging.

There are no public works, no road-making going on in this neighbourhood, at present.

Strange beggars mostly come from the west, and some from the county of Limerick. Many confirmed beggars, reared from their infancy to it, beg from mere indolence; they might make about 4*d.* a day on an average. The shopkeepers do not give much to the common mendicants, but they are very charitable to the poor room-keepers; they give money to these, but only common potatoes to the others; they give about as much as 10*s.* or 12*s.* each in the year to poor pensioners of this class.

The beggars in this quarter rarely resort to any deception; they may say that they are ill when they are really not so, but they are sometimes abusive when refused, and often utter a curse, but none but the most ignorant are afraid of it.

Strolling beggars are not in the habit of committing depredations.

Those who give relief, in general know nothing of the characters of those to whom they give it. The worst description of beggars are the strangers who flock to the fairs; some farmers relieve as many as 20 or 30 persons in the course of the day with provisions. They generally proportion the quantity given, to the number of the family, and the extent of distress. Even the poor labourers give whatever they can afford, and none give less than half-a-dozen of potatoes at a time, sometimes a night's lodging also. He thought that the shopkeepers were even more annoyed than the farmers were, and he would willingly give an annual sum to get rid of the beggars; alms-giving, in his opinion, was always from a charitable or a religious motive, but never from fear; sometimes it might be from importunity.

The principal beggars about the town were old and impotent, and generally reduced from sickness; an able-bodied man would not get relief there; there were many old persons who lived with their families or relatives, and begged besides; these were persons whose relatives were in general very poor. It was considered a disgrace to beg, and "beggar" was a term of reproach.

There was no employment open to widows with young children, they must either live with their relations, or be reduced to beggary. The poor labourers often give a day's work to this class; generally on a Sunday or holiday; they seldom beg openly, but go about among their friends. It is utterly impossible for a father to provide enough by his labour for a widow and family.

There is no fund for the sick poor, and what chiefly retards their recovery is, that they cannot provide for themselves; some of the gentry, and others in the neighbourhood, employ from charity, those who are badly able to work. Those who are out of work sometimes live on one meal a day, and often go to bed supperless. Mendicants frequently spread disease, and particularly fever.

THE periods of the year at which there is least employment, are from the 1st of June to about the 15th of August, and from the 1st of December to the 1st of March. The number of labourers in constant employment is not considerable, including those who are employed in the corn stores and on the roads, &c.; many of them near the town get as much as 200 days' work, sometimes in the course of the year, but there is less employment further farther off in the country. Since tillage had increased, and consequently pasturage diminished, in consequence of the greater demand for corn, there had been a great subdivision of land, which had increased the demand for labour considerably; during the idle times of the year the labourers depend on their stock of potatoes, or on the price of their pigs, and if these resources do not suffice, their wives are forced to beg, or to pawn their clothes for subsistence; they also get potatoes on credit, and pay for them afterwards by labour; if they have no resources, in summer particularly, they are in the constant habit of shutting up their houses and going begging. There is very little pilfering or stealing in the neighbourhood.

It was the general opinion of those present, that the ordinary extent of employment would not support a labourer, even on potatoes, if he had a family to provide for. It was also remarked by Mr. M'Ennery, that the poorer the individuals were, the more anxious they were to marry. He had observed the same disposition in France, and in other countries. This chiefly arose from the anxiety to have children to support them in their old age; and he often heard them express these very sentiments; women despairing of being married often get bastard children, with the very same view. It was his opinion that early marriages were the very strongest proof of the poverty of the country. They were as early too, among the farmers, as among the labourers, and the poorer the parties were, the less were their parents consulted on these occasions; more remain unmarried among the labourers than among the farmers, for the labourers often do so, to support their parents if alive, rather than undergo the care and responsibility of a wife and children, others of them think that the expense of children when young will be repaid them, when they advance to manhood, for the more grown their children are, the more independent the fathers become. A farmer also sometimes marries his son early in order to give him a portion of his farm, and in order to enable him to get himself through his difficulties, when he expects not to be able to pay his own rent.

THE people are well off, as compared with the rest of the community; the Knight of Kerry employs many at the slate quarry; in harvest, it is difficult to get labourers, they generally have ground of their own; there is but little score-ground; I have let con-acre at 2*l.* 10*s.* an acre, finding sand and sea-weed; the former is delivered on the ground, the sea-weed is cut and carried by themselves; they have the potato crop for two years. The manure costs me the rent I receive; there is little work from 1st November to 1st March, wages are then 6*d.* without diet; for the other months 8*d.* Their stock of potatoes is generally exhausted about May; the quarry-men buy potatoes, and others get employment in spring; in June and July, those who do not work in the quarry, fish; the quarry-men are able to earn 10*d.* or 1*s.* a day.

THERE is now more employment in this parish than there used to be, in consequence of surplus hands being taken away by emigration; there is employment at most times of the year, except during the winter, for those without land.

Several of the families of labourers in this village are in the habit of begging. In general, the gentlemen are anxious to give employment, provided they do not lose by it.

All marry young; the labourers the youngest, as the farmers look more before them.

It is rare to find an old maid or a bachelor among labourers, but it is very common among farmers, especially of the more comfortable description. The farmer wishing to dispose of his daughters first, keeps his sons to help him. The farmers marriages are marriages of interest, arranged by the parents, but among the labourers they choose their own wives.

IN the winter season there is little employment. The labourers are never dependant on their daily hire, but trust to their potatoes.

June, July and winter are the periods during which the labourers are without work; in harvest all are employed in digging potatoes. The majority of fair labourers get employment about half the year, and many are in constant employment. Their food at times, when not employed, is very scanty; so much so that it is often amazing how they live the year through, and how they get fuel, &c.

Begging is the last shift, and is very seldom resorted to; and not more than a few instances have been known for five or six years.

There is not much pilfering; in great scarcity potatoes will be taken, but this occurs very rarely. There is a good deal of pilfering of potatoes out of the pits, and pilfering of turf and wood is always going on, but it does not increase in times of distress. At such times the gentlemen subscribe.

The farmers or gentry do not employ more labourers than they actually require.

Mr. Morris's opinion is corroborative of the foregoing statement.

The poorer classes marry earliest. It is a frequent practice for a man to elope with a farmer's daughter, and not to marry her until he forces her parents to give a larger fortune than their means would justify, in order to save her character.

The labouring classes marry earliest. Marriages have often taken place when the parties had nothing more than a guinea to give the priest. They say they marry in order to have a place of their own, instead of working for another.

THE times in which there is least employment are Christmas and Midsummer; when the potatoes are dearest, then there is least employment. An average labourer in casual employment can get work at least two-thirds of the year, if he is willing to work and does not absent himself for tilling his potatoes; there is a great deal for county works, which is so managed as to give work at all times; there is sufficient employment for all the natives, but the strangers come and settle here, and they generally loose their obnoxiousness if they take lodgings, and are not "spalpeens." There is not permanent employment, however, for the entire population, and when out of employ they have only to live on their potatoes; what has been done in that neighbourhood is an effort.

This class do not often beg, but they ask relief privately. The wives and children sometimes beg about the neighbourhood, but the men themselves never do.

Labourers occasionally, when out of employ, borrow from one another; sometimes their employers make an advance to them.

The farmers, in letting land to labourers (for which the rent is paid in labour), set the highest possible value on the land, and the lowest possible value on the work.

Lord Devon employs a great many poor labourers there.

THERE are particular periods of the year at which a portion of the labourers are without work, and there is no fund out of which they receive assistance.

There are at least 200 families in this town without straw to lie on, and without any potato ground, and as they get little employment except in harvest, it is a miracle how they live. These do not go round, they go only to a few neighbours whom they know, and nothing but the greatest necessity compels them to beg; sometimes they will almost starve before they communicate their want. In the scarcity of 1822, 5,000 persons were relieved in the Union of Rathkeal, being nearly one-half of the population.

There has been no case in this parish of able-bodied persons and their families committing trifling offences for the purpose of being sent to prison, in order that they might obtain food and shelter. Pilfering of hay, potatoes, &c., is always going on, and increases in times of distress.

Potatoes are given in advance by those who employ the men, and they afterwards work off the score. Mr. Smith states, "I have known gentlemen in three or four instances give potatoes to labourers on tick, and not name the price till July, when potatoes are at the highest, these gentlemen are not in very necessitous circumstances; the general opinion of the class of gentlemen in this part of the country would condemn their conduct."

Sometimes employment is given in order to relieve the labourers; this is generally done by residents, but no labour-rate is known. Considering the calls upon them from destitute friends and relations, a labourer could not save sufficient to make a provision against want of work.

Early marriages are most common among the lowest, who have no ground; marriages are settled between the parties often at fairs, but amongst those who have land, they are arranged by the parents. The farmers marry their children very young, in order to get rid of them; the daughters are married youngest.

DURING December and January there is little employment. "Two men who are constantly employed by me through the year, are more comfortable than those in casual employment."

There is but one case in this place of constant begging, in a labourer's children whose wife is dead; and except in seasons of scarcity, occasional begging among labourers' wives is of rare occurrence.

Robberies by persons with a view to relieve themselves from a state of destitution, do not happen; there is not much pilfering, and it does not increase in times of distress.

The labourers who are without work do not obtain provisions on credit until they are again in work, as no credit would be given them.

The gentlemen or farmers do not employ more labourers than they require, from a desire to relieve distress in this neighbourhood.

It is the very poorest classes who marry youngest; they think they will be of assistance to each other; the girls also wish to be married, so as to have their characters out of harm's way. The farmers' children marry older, but even they are married very young; yet they do not marry with the same avidity as the poorer sort, for among farmers the marriages are arranged by their parents, while among the labourers they originate with the parties themselves.

THERE is not much work for the labouring classes from May to August; in winter there is ploughing. They suffer a great deal in summer, when there is no work; their stock of potatoes is then exhausted, and provisions are high. The men are at that time ready to work for their diet; the wives and children spread over the land and beg; and begging is then a bad profession, as the people have little to give. At this time labourers and even tradesmen can scarcely get one full meal in the 24 hours. It often happens that a labourer then goes to bed supperless. Besides this, they will often collect the cornkail and rape and nettles, and eat them; the latter only happens in a dear summer, such as this year (1834).

It corrupts the children to send them about begging; they meet with every sort of bad character and vice, if the parents do not keep them under their correction. They separate in order to get more alms, and thus the children are removed from the control of the parents. In reference to whether persons in distress relieve themselves by pilfering, it was stated that petty thefts increase in summer, as of fowl, potatoes, bundles of grass, &c. Turnips and carrots and other vegetables are also stolen out of gentlemen's demesnes at this time.

Labourers often get meal on credit, by paying double for it; and whoever they are working for will go bail for them; they are seldom in debt, as they cannot get credit.

Several gentlemen in this neighbourhood employ more than a sufficient number of labourers in times of scarcity, in order to assist the working classes in their distress.

The labourers cannot save anything out of their best wages, if they have families; single men who come from a distance may put something by.

The working classes marry at a very early age, the men generally about 20, and the females at about 17; the parish priest knows of no instance of a person marrying at 16.

Labourers marry earlier than farmers. John Walsh, tradesman, says, "The poorer they are the earlier they marry;" but the parish priest denies this. Others say that early marriages are discountenanced by the general feeling; "under 20 is a wonder." There are few applications to the parish priest. The early marriages are to gratify passion and to serve themselves, and enable them to live better, as they think there will be more compassion for them if they are married.

Michael Mullins says, "He knows men of 60 who never married, and they are not a halfpennyworth better off than those who have families. If that a man is sick, who will attend to him without payment, or who will wash or cook for him?"

Idleness (that is want of labour,) is the cause of early marriages. "If a man had employment to keep the devil out of his mind, he would not be talking to women in the town."

Mr. ALLOWNEY, actuary for the savings' bank.—Mr. THOMAS CROTTY, woollen-manfacturer.—Dr. DELANY, M. D.—Rev. Mr. HIGGIN, rector of Roscrea.—SAMUEL H. LAWSON, esq., chief constable of police.—Rev. Mr. O'SHAUGHNESSEY, parish priest.—Hon. Mr. PRETTY, J.P.

THE great majority of labourers are not employed constantly; during the winter, and again in summer, before harvest work begins, they are in general quite idle; at these periods, they subsist on potatoes which they have themselves sown, and for the ground necessary to produce which, they have paid an acreable rent. There is no want of industry on their part to avail themselves of any employment which may offer, and many who possess asses or horses, are enabled to earn 8 d. or 10 d. a day, by drawing manure or turf-mould, when other kinds of labour are suspended. Those to whom this or some other resource is not open, endure great privations, and are reduced to very scanty food in seasons of extreme distress, which are stated to occur at intervals of two or three years, and whose appearance is not looked upon as anything extraordinary, or out of the common course of events: the poor have been known to live on "prassagh," (a yellow weed), or on unripe cabbages or potatoes; even in ordinary seasons no small number of labouring men are compelled to allow their wives and children to have recourse to begging; these solicit alms, not in their own neighbourhood, but at a distance from their homes; they provide themselves with bags to carry the potatoes which they receive from the farmers, and as they never remain absent longer than a day, they do not always take their children. The stuff-weavers, for the last four or five years, have been altogether out of employment. Many have gone to England, but several have remained and are in great want, as there is not any agricultural occupation for them. On the point of the decay of manufactures in Roscrea, Mr. Crotty said, "The making of serges, stuffs, and coarse flannels, has declined since the protecting duty was removed. Six years ago 1,000 persons, of whom 600 or 700 were women, were employed by me in Roscrea, or its immediate neighbourhood. The females spun the worsted, and men combed and wove the wool; the latter earned 1 s. 8 d. a day at combing, and about 1 s. 4 d. at weaving. The women could not make more than 1 ½ d. a day; but even this small sum being well applied, and for the most part to their own clothing, had a marked effect on their appearance in general; all are completely destitute, and the husbands are wandering about looking for work, but being men of 40 years and upwards they cannot compete with young labourers."

There were about 300 weavers employed in Roscrea and its neighbourhood six years ago; since trade has fallen off, nearly a third of them have gone to Leeds and Bradford, and none of them have returned. They have in many instances written to their friends, expressing themselves contented with the change they had made, and some have sent remittances of money. There are still remaining in Roscrea about 200 weavers, who are nearly all in a state of destitution; even for these there is but little employment at their trade, and they are only wanted in the fields at hay-making. They are as correct a body of men as can be met; I use some authority over them, and they are chiefly my tenants, but recently they have held their houses rent-free, they stand higher than the labouring classes, and though many of them are forced to go out begging, or to send their wives and children, yet their pride always makes them go to a distance of at least three or four miles from town.

The practice of committing offences for the purpose of getting into gaol may be said to be unknown.

Mr. Lawson, catholic clergyman, was unable to mention more than one positive instance of it: "A man was taken up for breaking the windows of a public-house, and attempting to take a bottle from it; on being questioned, he said he was a tailor, that he had gone from Cork to Dublin, and had come from Dublin to Roscrea, that he was unable to get work, was starving, and was only anxious to get into gaol."

The Rev. Mr. Higgin states, that there is a good deal of pilfering and petty thieving in the neigbourhood of the town, such as the cutting of grass and milking cows. These offences, however, are not committed so much by persons in distress as by idle young men, who go prowling about the country, who spend their time in debauchery, sleep during the day and awake for mischief in the evening. When potatoes are scarce, in the commencement of the season, they are often secretly dug up at night before they are ripe; and in winter the pits in which they are stored are not unfrequently opened and plundered. Under the pressure of urgent and present necessity, it has been known that individuals of the labouring classes have sent their children into the street, and have instructed them to purloin potatoes, or if these were not to be had, anything that could be converted into food.

The difficulties under which labourers are placed, when not employed, are momentarily alleviated by the system of credit through which they obtain provisions from the small traders, to be paid for at some future period, but with an exorbitant rate of interest. Some landlords are in the habit of becoming surety to a miller for their tenants, who are thus supplied with meal on trust.

There are few landlords who, in permitting their tenants to work out the rent of their holdings, allow them to do so only at the rate of 4 d. a day in winter, and 6 d. in summer; these, however, are the lowest rates, and not very common.

Marriages are universally contracted at a very early age among the peasantry; the usual period for men being at 21, and for women at 19; but both sexes frequently seek partners two or three years sooner. It has been observed that the most numerous families are to be found, first, with the lower order of farmers, and next with persons who are mere labourers.

In order to give an idea of how destitute the condition of a labourer must be who is in a state of want, the following sketch was given of the income and expenditure of a working man, depending on occasional employment, but whose lot is not, under ordinary circumstances, to be considered unfavourable. In a majority of instances he has a wife and children, but their earnings, if any, are so insignificant that they are not taken into account.

Income:
Three days' employment in the week, at 10 d.	6	10	–
Profit of a pig, bought at 10 s., sold at 1 l. 10 s.	1	–	–
Total Annual Income £.	7	10	–
Expenditure:
Rent of a cabin	1	10	–
Leaving to be expended on himself and family in clothes and food	6	–	–
£.	7	10	–

It is to be observed, that the rent is generally paid out of wages, and very often in part worked out. The profits derived from the sale of the pig is more especially appropriated to the purchase of clothes. What remains of both wages and profit is set apart to buy potatoes, and if it be not enough, the wife must make it up by begging.

Mr. Allowney remarks, that several labourers with gardens of two or three acres, and a considerable number of farmers holding from 10 to 40 acres, were among the depositors. There are 10 cottiers for one farmer, but the former must be in constant employment to enable them to lay by. Tradesmen are few, in comparison with the other classes, and in general the country people seem to value the advantages of the savings' bank more than those who reside in the town. Deposits are usually made after the crops have been reaped, and are most frequent between September and Christmas, when the corn has been sold. Depositors generally draw once a year, for the most part about the time when their rents fall due. They have been regularly increasing in number since the establishment of the institution. It is a practice with small farmers to deposit the marriage portion of their daughters, amounting to from 20 l. to 30 l., and this sum is not withdrawn until the daughter has been married.

Mr. STEVENSON, protestant clergyman.—THOMAS WALSH, labourer.—And many others present at different times.

TOWN labourers are chiefly attendants on slaters, masons, &c. They have not 3 s. a week; 2 s. on an average from November to April; they suffer privations at such times. Sheahan says, he has often known his comrade spend the whole day without work, and go to bed without supper, and get work the next day and work till two o'clock before he could get 6 d. to buy food. It is very common to have one meal a day; when everything is pledged, sometimes they borrow articles from friends, in order to pledge them. John White, a pensioner and dealer, says he has lost many things in that way. When they have not work, they live regularly on one meal a day. Only now and then it happens that a person passes an entire day without eating.

A policeman present says that a labourer told him last summer, he passed 24 hours without eating. Half of the labourers in town have no potatoes; the country labourers generally have some potatoes, and are much better off than the town labourers.

The wives and children go round in the unemployed months.

Meagher saw a discharged soldier break a window, in order to get into gaol for something to eat. About two years ago many persons committed felonies in order to be transported. They wish for emigration.

Persons in great want often steal provisions, but never without great necessity. A person stated that he knew a man last August to steal potatoes for his family, who were in want.

When the provisions are out in the country, the richer farmers join the labourers in an I. O. U., and this enables them to get meal and potatoes at a high price, 6 s. or 7 s. a cwt. more than the price.

Sheahan says, if a labourer can get credit, he is never out of debt. It is only those with ground who can find any one to go bail for them. A man without ground can only live by begging, till he gets employment again; some steal, being ashamed to beg; they would do neither if they could get employment.

A loan fund that existed was given up because the bails were so often called upon to pay the money; the want of punctuality, or of means, was the cause of its failure.

It very seldom happens that the land-owners employ more labourers than they require; if they give employment under such circumstances, the wages are lower. Farmers' sons now work who did not formerly; they cannot afford to pay labourers, the price of corn is so low. They assist one another, "I work for you to-day, if you work for me to-morrow." It is impossible for a labourer to lay by; he cannot count a single farthing his own at night; what can he save out of a shilling? If he had a little clothes he may pawn them; this is the only provision he can make.

A man mostly marries from 20 to 22 years of age, women from 18 to 20; sometimes under 17, very seldom under 16. Nobody present had heard of a girl of 13 being married. Farmers wish to get off their daughters as fast as they can, to preserve their purity; farmers' sons marry earliest, and girls, who marry at 16, usually have fortunes. The parents make up the match, in order to prevent them from running away.

Farmers' boys and servant girls sometimes marry early, but not so often as those who are more comfortable; 30 or 40 years ago no man married till about 28 or 30, and the woman 23 or 24, now they marry thinking to better themselves; the one will help the other; they never think of having children; it steals on them at last. People sometimes look forward to having children to support them in their old age. Young boys mostly make the worst marriages. The labourers marry much earlier than the mechanics; the apprenticeship of the mechanics lasts till they are 20, and then they do not marry immediately.

A PORTION of the labourers are without work in winter, and necessarily reduced to few meals in the day; there is no fund for their assistance; still the wife and children seldom beg, or are abandoned by the husband. No destitute poor have ever been known here to steal, in order to relieve their necessities.

Among the farmers, credit is generally given to those who are without work, and the credit price is not much higher than the money price.

The gentry and farmers do not employ more labourers than they require, for the sake of affording work in times of scarcity. A labour-rate has never been in operation here.

The poor of every class marry earlier than those who are better off. In cases of previous connexion, the clergy generally encourage the parties to make reparation by marriage.

LABOURERS are not so often without employment here as in other places, but it occurs, to a certain extent, in winter; women are very often without employment, and their wages are as low as 4*d*. per day. When without work they are not known to be reduced to fewer meals in the day than when at work. They do not beg, but they receive some relief from the Mendicity.

There are very few women with families here, abandoned by their husbands.

No instances were known of persons committing crimes, for the purpose of being sent to prison and obtaining support there; nor have any been known either to steal or commit personal outrage for the purpose of relieving distress. Provisions are not so generally given on credit to labourers out of work as formerly; the farmers still give credit to those whom they know, and do not charge materially above the ready-money market price. The hucksters also give credit, but charge much more than the market price.

No gentry or farmers ever employ labourers, when they might have avoided the expense, for the purpose of relieving the distress occasioned by a want of work.

In some cases a saving might be made by labourers against a scarcity of employment; but the surplus of their wages, after supporting the family, is generally spent in a public-house, to which improvidence there is a great temptation by there being so many in the town. The labouring classes are frequently rendered reckless by want of employment, and are then improvident in contracting marriage, and are remarkable for marrying at an earlier period of life than other classes; while the sons of farmers, and persons who are in a more comfortable condition in life, do not marry so young, and are much more cautious. The clergy are not observed to be particular in dissuading from early marriages.

DURING the winter a large portion of the labourers is without work; most of them have a patch of potato ground, on the produce of which they live when unemployed. There is no regular fund for their relief. Their wives and children very rarely beg. There is no instance known of a labourer either stealing to relieve himself and family from a state of destitution, or committing crime for the purpose of being sent to prison and there supported.

They procure provisions on credit from the hucksters and farmers; little or no difference is made between the price demanded for provision, taken on credit, and those for which ready money is given.

There is no instance known of the gentry or farmers giving employment merely for the purpose of relieving distress.

The wages of an ordinary labourer would not admit of his laying by a sufficient provision out of his wages to maintain him in the winter season, when there is a want of work. The constant recurrence of destitution produces recklessness among the poor.

The unanimous opinion was, that the most destitute poor married the earliest.

THERE are no periods of the year at which a portion of the labourers are out of work here.

In the beginning of the summer provisions increase in price, and then the farmers and hucksters sell food on credit, at a price about one-third above the money price: a witness called this a "grinding system."

The poorest people are always remarked as marrying earliest, and those who have never been in want are less prone to it than the destitute and wretched.

A PORTION of the labourers are unemployed in winter and during the changes of the crops. Dr. Forsyth mentioned the case of a poor man who asked him for the loan of some money, and promised to pay it in work. Perceiving during the whole of the next day (which was Sunday) that the cabin of this poor man was blocked up, he was induced to make inquiry, and found that the man had not risen from his bed during the day, having nothing to eat. Next morning Dr. Forsyth offered him some money, and the following morning gave him some work out of charity. There is no fund out of which the class of poor under consideration might receive assistance; their wives and children sometimes beg, but not until the greatest privations have been endured. There are no instances known of women being driven to prostitution by the want produced by scarcity of employment. No thefts are known to have been committed for the purpose of relieving destitution. When out of work labourers sometimes obtain provisions on credit, for which they pay usuriously. In the country parts provisions or fodder is often obtained on a cow, the cow being a surety for the payment of the debt. It would appear that taking provisions on credit must necessarily cause much embarrassment to the labourer, as many processes are instituted for such debts at the quarter sessions. The gentlemen or farmers are not in the habit of employing more labourers than they require, through a desire to relieve distress. A labour rate is altogether unknown.

The number of unlicensed dram-shops is a great temptation to the labourer to spend any surplus which might otherwise be saved from his wages, after supporting his family; licenses are thought to be too low in price. The poorest of all classes marry earliest; the greater their wretchedness the greater is their inclination to early marriage, and the more comforts they possess the less prone they are to marry young.

LABOURERS are without work in winter and very severe days, or wet harvest days. When unemployed they are necessarily reduced to few and scanty meals. There is no fund from which they can receive assistance when not employed. Their wives and families do not beg.

Many are then supplied with potatoes, &c. by the farmers, the price of which is to be repaid in work. Credit is not so generally given by shopkeepers as it formerly was, but some labourers of good character get credit from them, sometimes to the amount of 2*l.* The shopkeepers expect a considerable advance in the price of goods given on credit, but the farmers do not. By this system the labourer is sometimes so deeply involved in debt that he has no hope of extricating himself, and becomes reckless. No gentry or farmers employ men for the purpose of relieving their distress. All the labourers live up to, and some of them beyond their means. Recklessness is often caused by the frequent recurrence of destitution.

Labourers marry earlier than any other class; the more wretched their circumstances are the earlier they marry.

Decent farmers and mechanics are far more cautious in contracting marriage.

ABOUT Lammas and the middle of summer, the labourers are without work, and some are reduced to beg, as there is no regular fund out of which they receive assistance.

No cases have been known of able-bodied persons, or their families, committing trifling offences for the purpose of being sent to prison that they might there receive food and shelter.

No instances have occurred of persons being guilty of petty robberies with a view to relieving themselves from a state of destitution.

Some few obtain provisions on credit, but credit is not often given. Shopkeepers exact a price for goods purchased on credit materially above their market price.

The gentlemen, as farmers, do not employ with a view to relieve distress, more labourers than they actually require, nor has there been any labour-rate in operation here.

The wages of the labouring population, considering the calls upon them by their destitute friends and relations, render it impossible for them to make a provision against a want of work. They are not rendered reckless by the constant recurrence of destitution through the want of employment, or the high prices of provisions.

The lower orders marry earlier than any other, but those who have been always well off, and have known comfort, are less prone to marriage than those who have never known anything but extreme wretchedness. The clergy do not encourage or dissuade from early marriages; but in case of the seduction of a female of previous good character, the man is in general advised to make reparation by marriage.

The general rate of wages for labourers in this parish is about 1*s.* per day without diet, with diet about 7*d.* or 8*d.*; and for mechanics 2*s.* 6*d.* without, and 1*s.* 6*d.* or 1*s.* 8*d.* with diet.

LABOURERS have no employment in winter, during which period the generality of them subsist on the produce of a small plot of potato ground, obtained from some farmer without lease or the payment of rent, as a return for collecting manure for the farmer's use. There is no regular fund from which relief might be afforded them, and whatever clothes they have are generally pawned in winter when they are most needed.

The greater part have potatoes sufficient to subsist them during that time, but those who have not are obliged to solicit alms, or ask relief from the Mendicity. There have been no instances known of women or girls having been driven to prostitution in consequence of the family being unemployed, nor is there any instance known of a man forsaking his wife and family.

When without work, labourers obtain provisions on credit from farmers, and occasionally also from hucksters. Half as much again is the average difference of price between provisions got on credit and provisions bought in the market, but the charge varies with the necessities of the individual who asks the loan, thence in general it increases in proportion to his distress and inability to repay. Labouring people employed on the roads have been often processed at the assistant barrister's court, for debts due for provisions got on credit. The effect produced by processing for such debts in the minds of the poor people is uniformly bad; the man processed becomes reckless and desperate, and if committed to prison is thoroughly corrupted.

Gentlemen or farmers are never known to employ more labourers than they actually require, with the design of relieving distress. The wages of the labourer, considering the many calls he has upon him, do not admit of his making a provision against a want of work.

It is remarked, that the poorest are always the more ready to marry.

When out of work and food, their wives and children beg about the neighbourhood, and thus habituate the rising population to mendicancy. There are no instances of women having families, being abandoned by their husbands.

Hucksters give credit to those who are without work; and farmers advance food to able-bodied men, on promise of receiving labour at a future occasion; but the payment promised promised is materially above the ready-money price at the time of the credit being taken. The labourer is thus kept constantly in debt, without any hope of being able to extricate himself, and necessarily becomes reckless.

None of the gentlemen or farmers are known to employ more labourers during these periods than they actually require. The wages of the labourer are not sufficient to allow of his making provision against a want of work.

DURING part of the winter, many of the labourers are without work; and at these periods are reduced to fewer meals during the day, and those more scanty; there is no fund out of which they can receive assistance.

When out of work and without food, the wife and children, in many instances, beg about the neighbourhood; still the rising population is not by this means habituated to mendicancy, nor do the women or girls frequently resort to prostitution; this crime is not common in this town. It is very rare for women, having families, to be abandoned by their husbands.

No persons have ever been known here to commit offences for the purpose of being sent to prison, where they might obtain food and shelter, and thereby leaving their children liable to mix with the worst characters in society, by which means they would become demoralized. Nor have any been known to have been guilty of robberies with a view to relieve themselves from destitution.

Credit may be procured by individuals of good character, but it is not so generally given as formerly, either in town or country.

There is generally an increased price on provisions got on credit. The system, as far as followed here, of keeping the labourer constantly in debt without hope of extricating himself, does not necessarily render him reckless.

The Marquis of Hertford (an absentee,) and the Marquis of Downshire, both employ great numbers of poor in winter, at works undertaken expressly for their relief.

There has never been a labour-rate in operation except as above. The labourer might make a provision against want of work in some instances, as in case of a small family; but it is not generally done, and there is no observable difference in the dispositions to economy among the poor, when wages are high or low.

The lower classes marry much earlier, they usually marry at from 17 to 25 years of age; farmers' sons are not so likely to marry early as those reared in indigent circumstances; the clergy do not encourage or discourage marriage, if the consent of the parents be obtained; but if the female is pregnant, the young man is advised to make reparation by marrying her.

MANY labourers are without work during the three winter months, and till the end of April. The poor are stated in general to be worse off on a rich, than a poor soil, like that of the neighbourhood of Ballycastle. On the latter, labour is constantly required, and this contributes greatly to their independence of character and industrious habits.

When the husband is out of work and food, the wife and children beg in the neighbourhood, the rising population is in this way so much habituated to mendicancy, that when the husband obtains work, the practice is often continued.

Those who are without work obtain credit both in town and country from farmers and hucksters, the credit price being at least a third more than the actual value of the article. The labourer is thus constantly involved in the miseries of debt.

His wages could not possibly enable him to provide against a want of work, and he is consequently rendered reckless by the hopelessness of his destitution.

The very poorest class marry the earliest, being more careless and improvident than those who are acquainted in some degree with comfort, the latter are more cautious.

DURING two months in winter many of the labourers are without sufficient employment; and notwithstanding the small store of potatoes, which is usually planted on some half acre or so of land, rented of a farmer, and generally paid for in labour, many suffer great privations in winter, or seek for credit at advanced prices. There is no fund out of which relief can be obtained. Credit is given to a considerable amount by the farmers, some say, at 25 per cent. others say 50 per cent. above the ready money price. This system involves the labourer in debt, and leaves him very little hope of extricating himself, which renders him reckless.

Decrees with costs are constantly obtained against labourers and cottiers, for such debts, at the quarter sessions and manor courts. Gentlemen or farmers are never known to employ more workmen than they require, through a desire to afford relief to those who are distressed through want of employment, and a labour-rate is unknown.

Unemployed labourers' wives do not beg, nor are labourers known to steal for the purpose of relieving themselves from destitution. The witnesses were divided in their opinion, whether an ordinary labourer could save from the wages earned in summer, a provision against the want of employment in winter.

The poorer classes always marry earlier than the others, and their inclination to early marriages increases in proportion to their wretchedness, and decreases in proportion to their knowledge of comforts. No general practice of dissuading from early marriages exists among the clergy.

THERE is no complaint here of want of employment; the construction of the new coast-road to the Giant's Causeway, employs labourers all the year round, and in winter time barn work can be procured.

Credit is often given to the labourer by farmers, and sometimes by hucksters. The interest demanded is extremely variable, and depends on the covetousness of the lender, and the necessities of the borrower. The huckster has little hold over the borrower, as he wants no work to be done, and yet he is in general less exorbitant in the price he requires for provisions given on credit, than the farmer is, who, notwithstanding that he has better security, as he is always in want of a workman, yet he is the less lenient of the two.

The wages paid to a labourer are not sufficiently large to enable him to make a provision against a want of employment.

The most destitute marry earliest, and according as destitution increases, so does the desire to marry early increase. The clergy, of all persuasions, discourage early marriage, except in cases of pregnancy; but pregnancy before marriage is by no means uncommon.

IN the summer months, June, July and August, employment is most scarce. In December it gets scarce again, and continues so till past March. In winter, food is generally plentiful, but the poor are always pinched in the summer time. The fishing classes have many resources; they are much better off than the other labourers.

When out of work, frequent cases occur of the labourers obtaining food on credit, until they get into work again, in fact it is their only resource against begging; even the farmers do it; they sell their corn cheap at one season of the year, and buy it dear at another. This occurs to labourers in towns, as well as in the country. Daniel O'Donnell, labourer, says, "I was obliged to do it last year; I bought half a hundred of meal, and the price was 6*s.* for money at the time; I got four months' credit, and had to pay 8*s.*" And William Logan states, that he promises to pay in six months 15*s.* for what he might have got for 10*s.*, ready money.

Francis M'Guirly, labourer, gives the following case: "I wanted meal last July; I went to a meal-man, the price of the day was 12*s.* a hundred weight; he said he would only sell on credit; I desired him to weigh out half a hundred weight, he did so, saying the price would be 16*s.* the hundred weight; I put down 6*s.*, took up the meal, and took it forcibly away."

Mr. Coll says, "I have, in a rising market, known 20*s.* to be charged for that, of which the market price was 10*s.*, but the usual charge is 4*s.* on 12*s.* for six months' credit.

THERE are seasons, when work is not to be had for all the labourers, June, July and August, and after the harvest; they are then reduced to fewer and scantier meals in the day, and there is no fund to afford them assistance.

The wife and children of labourers out of work form the largest portion of the beggars; the rising population is thus habituated to mendicancy, but neither the women or girls become prostitutes; the husbands very rarely desert their families; a few, however, have done so, and have emigrated.

None have been known to steal, or commit any other offence in order to be sent to prison.

Very few are guilty of thefts or robberies, to relieve themselves, and never are of outrages on persons. Society certainly suffers more by the demoralization caused by destitution, than it would by giving these individuals a subsistence.

Credit is very commonly given, both in towns, and by the farmers in the country, to those who are out of work; the most enormous interest is charged, and the labourer is thus very much depressed; many have been utterly ruined by such causes, and some have been thrown into gaol.

The resident gentry and farmers often, in times of scarcity, employ more labourers than they require, but the absentees never do. A labour-rate has never been in operation. The wages of the labouring population could not possibly enable them to provide against a want of work. Even under their present privations, they are admitted to be extremely honest and well conducted. The poorest invariably marry earliest, from the recklessness produced by a total absence of comfort; those who are better off are more cautious. In cases of previous connexion between the parties, it is the practice of the clergy to recommend marriages, unless there is some objection, from the character of the party, or other causes.

THERE are periods of the year, viz. between spring and harvest, and in the depth of winter, when many labourers are out of employment. The last witness (George Strainer) states, "That his son has been dependent for his support, at different times, on the wages of two days in the week. In truth, he is often glad of a few potatoes, which I gather for him, from the neighbours, and but for them, may be the children sometimes would go to bed with hungry bellies." There is no regular fund for the relief of unemployed labourers. Their wives are often, through want of work, obliged to have recourse to mendicancy.

Right Rev. Dr. M'Gittigan, and the Rev. Mr. M'Guirly, stated, that no practice was more common, in all parts of the county, than for the labouring classes, both in town and country, when out of work, to take provisions on credit, till they get employment again.

Lady Styles, gave one year 150*l.* in small loans, for food and seed-corn, every penny of which was repaid. A loan-fund would be highly valuable. As a proof of the extent to which the credit system is carried, Dr. M'Gittigan states, "A man buys two hundred weight of meal on the 1st of June, the market price being 1*s.* per stone; he passes a note, payable at Christmas, for 1*s.* 6*d.* per stone, being an interest of 100 per cent. per annum. The clergy are frequently obliged to interfere to prevent those usurious practices, and wherever I go I protest against it." The system is terrible, and involves the creatures in distress for life, generates litigation, and is the cause of two-thirds of the processes at quarter sessions.

Mr. Samuel Hall states, that he knows the barrister is in the habit of examining closely into such cases, and of reducing the claim of the party.

Mr. Mansfield says, he has known but very few instances of more than the requisite number of labourers being employed during times of great distress, on the absentee estates. The Right Rev. Dr. M'Gittigan states, that there is no such thing known.

If the ordinary wages given could be constantly had, (which is very rarely the case,) a provident labourer may be enabled to lay by something for a time of distress. The constant recurrence of destitution sometimes renders the labourers reckless; for, although they are not, by any means, so badly off here as in other parts of Ireland, yet in and near towns, they are frequently so badly off, that they care not what they do.

Right Rev. Dr. M'Gittigan states, that the labourers and farm servants, male and female, marry much earlier than the farmers; and that his clergymen marry five of the former for one of the latter. When asked, why they marry while so poor, they generally say "they cannot be worse off than they are, and that they may help each other." The more comfortable take care, however, to look before them, when they are well off, and in this diocese are generally the last in marrying. The Roman-catholic clergy recommend marriage as the only way of doing justice to the female in cases of illegitimate offspring, particularly where it occurs between persons of nearly the same rank, and when the previous character of the female has been unexceptionable. W. Wray, Esq. J. P. says, that the clergy of the Established Church recommend marriage, but do not enforce it, as the Roman-catholics do. W. A. Stewart, Esq., of Ards, is of opinion, that increasing the comforts of the people would be one of the most effectual restraints upon population, and that other circumstances besides mere destitution, operate to increase it. The ministers of some religious sects, indeed of all but the Established Church, draw their chief maintenance from the numbers of their congregations. He also thinks the great abundance of fuel which exists in this country, and the facility of raising potatoes, which form the chief food, calculated to increase the population.

MR. I have a large tract of waste land, which I have lately divided into allotments; I commenced by making the size of each farm 40 acres, but I find lots of 20 acres much better. I provide timber for roofing the houses, and 40*s.* towards the expense of building each. I find the people who have undertaken the improvement of those lands most industrious and indefatigable, and they are even beginning to be prosperous; their condition is far superior to that of labourers."

The tranquillity of the country has never been interrupted, notwithstanding all the privations and distress of the poor.

Mr. Brooke's opinion on the credit system was as follows: "It is, in times of distress, the great resource of the poor, and the practice has indeed prevailed to a most mischievous extent. The most cruel system of usury is practised; it has been very much checked by the assistant barrister lately, and by the Roman-catholic clergy, but there are persons still who disregard the one and evade the other." It was the general opinion of those present that this system was no doubt a grievous curse in the country, but if it did not exist there would be no resource for a poor person in a moment of distress but mendicancy: and although the evils of the system were acknowledged, yet until it is superseded by the establishment of some well-regulated system of loan fund, it is very questionable how far it may be desirable to see it altogether suppressed.

On being asked whether the employment of labourers out of work was adopted by the gentry as a means of relieving distress, Mr. Brooke said, he remembered when on an occasion of great distress, they all subscribed, undertaking, at the same time, that each person should expend in labour the amount of his subscription, and they found it a most excellent plan.

It was observed by M'Diarmid, that the men who are employed have not so much time on their hands to mix in the company and make acquaintances of females. In the more northern part of Ireland the people who live there are more constantly employed, and have more work, and it was thought that they do not marry near so young as in this part of the country.

THE Rev. Mr. Maginn says, "The credit system (though much discouraged by the Roman-catholic clergymen) prevails to a considerable extent in this district. In general 33 per cent. is demanded and got from the poor labourers, when out of employment, for six months' credit; very often as much as 50 per cent. has been made by the farmers who carry on this system, which nothing would tend so much to undermine as well-regulated loan societies.

The wages of the labouring classes are so extremely low, as to render it quite impossible for them to lay by anything as a provision for a time of want; and in addition to the low rate of wages, their great disposition to support their destitute relatives, and to assist the beggars who come to their doors, prevents them from being able to lay by any provision for a time of want or sickness.

The poorer classes are invariably found more anxious to marry early than the more comfortable classes: the farmers, and those who are better off, do not marry until they have some little subsistence; those, however, who are very poor, are frequently heard to say, "We cannot be worse off than we are, and probably our children will be a great support to us."

It depends entirely on the character of the individuals, whether the clergy dissuade from early marriages. If a woman has what is termed a misfortune, and is induced, under peculiar circumstances, to yield to her seducer, marriage would generally be recommended as a reparation for the injury done her character amongst equals.

WITH the exception of the scarcity in 1817, the labourers have generally been enabled to allow themselves the usual three meals; there is no regular fund of any kind, out of which they could receive assistance.

The wives and children of the labourers out of work seldom resort to begging about the neighbourhood, unless when the men go to the low countries in search of work.

There are very few who can support themselves without getting provisions on credit. Mr. Early said he knew instances of persons anxious to raise money on the spur of the moment, buying, for example, a pig at 2 l. and selling it sometime afterwards for 1 l. When meal was sold at 12 s. the cwt. I have often known a third more than the price to be given for it, to persons very little removed above those who bought it, in consideration of obtaining six months' credit. Hill said, that under these circumstances the labourer is kept in debt, with little hopes of relieving himself. He imagines that some day or other, when his little family grow up, they will be able to extricate him from his difficulties; he was of opinion that being constantly in debt rendered them less industrious. "It is hard," says a cottier tenant, "for a man who is over head and ears in debt to be industrious, he knows not what to look to."

In the year 1831, Lord Conyngham and Mr. Orr gave work to their own tenants, in making drains on their estates, but the cottiers were not so employed. The Rev. Mr. Early thought that if the labouring population could get regular employment at 10*d.* a day, the rate of wages in that country, they would certainly make a provision against a want of employment. He even thought that at 8*d.* a day and constant work, they could live in a comparative state of independence. So far from their being rendered reckless by a want of employment, or other causes, they are, notwithstanding all their privations, contented and peaceable. On the subject of marriages, the Rev. Mr. Early states, that they are all on an equal footing in this part of the country, and marry young; you seldom see a woman of 24, or a man at 30, unmarried, except those who have misconducted themselves. He also says, that if there was no disparity in their state of life, he would, unless there was something against the woman's character, advise marriage, in case of previous connexion.

Mr. Russell remarked, with regard to the system of credit, that it had materially diminished since the abolition of manor courts. The juries usually summoned in these courts were persons generally interested in keeping up the system. The difficulties thrown in its way by the assistant barrister, who invariably inquires the market price of each article at the time of the contract, and the rule he has laid down of striking off all but the legal interest, has tended much to lessen the practice. When meal is selling at 12*s.* the cwt., the general interest is frequently still one-third more than the actual price. He has known a countryman buy a cow for 6*l.* on credit one day, and sell it back the next day to the same person for 4*l.* cash; and a cwt. of meal to be taken at six months' credit, the purchaser stipulating to give from a barrel and half to two barrels, at the expiration of the term, the price of which would be about 24*s.*, that is 100 per cent.

MR. KERRIGAN said, upon this subject, "I farm a good deal, and when I want labourers, I find that I can get five for every one that I have business for. I have land, it is true, but the present prices of produce will not enable me to pay for working it, and the evil must increase to the poor labourers if those times continue, no man can pay wages, and the land must lie waste or be turned to pasture."

The Rev. Mr. Tredennick stated, that cases of the commission of theft or other trifling offences, for the purpose of being sent to prison, were never known; the poor bear their privations with unexampled patience. "My income," said he, "as the rector of Kilbarrow is drawn, chiefly, from the value of a large glebe; I live constantly on it, and am surrounded by a very dense population, exclusively Roman-catholics; I have not a single Protestant on the glebe; I find them quite peaceable and amenable; they submit all their little differences to my adjustment, and rarely resort to petty sessions, and thus I find, that, without the authority of a magistrate, (for I do not hold the commission of the peace,) I can effect much more, in the preservation of order and the prevention of litigation, than if I were a magistrate. They have, it is true, their prejudices and their old notions, and it is not easy to force them out of the usual course of injudicious and bad farming, and it is particularly difficult to effect what I am trying to do, the residence of each holder on his own cut; but upon the whole, I am quite sure I could succeed materially in improving their condition, if the nature of my tenure did not render it imprudent for me to expend the property of my family on a life estate. I assure you, that so perfectly tranquil and free from crime do I consider the neighbourhood where I live, that I scarcely think it necessary to lock or bolt my doors."

The custom of giving credit does prevail, but it has been much checked by the interference of the Roman-catholic clergy, and of the assistant barrister for the county. The Rev. Mr. M'Donnell stated, with regard to this subject, that the labourers and small farmers resort to it in times of distress, either when their stock is exhausted, or when the farmers want the ready money to meet their engagements, such as rent or county cess. It will sometimes happen, that in order to evade the laws against usury, a farmer will first sell for money to supply his present wants, and afterwards purchase from the same person, for the sustenance of his family, the very same article, on long credit of six months, at an extravagant price, never having parted with the possession of the goods all the time. Mr. Irwin observed, that the poorest class generally marry first; they feel that their situation cannot be worse, and they are reckless, but on this account they are also remarkably virtuous, and when unrestrained by the considerations of prudence, a word quite unintelligible to the pauper, they take the first opportunity to marry, if they can raise the marriage money and food enough for a season. The comfortable farmer will, on the contrary, either look for some fortune for himself, or take care that the fortune, which he can give to his daughter or sister, shall not be given to any but a man of substance.

EMPLOYMENT is most scarce in the winter season, and between spring and autumn, except when the fishing happens to set in; it is then abundant, and all hands are at work, but it cannot be counted on. Except in seasons of great scarcity, few persons in this parish go without regular meals, such as they are, poor enough, no doubt, sometimes as low as dry potatoes.

The Rev. Mr. Drummond stated, that they struggle hard to avoid begging. Many a time do they live on shell-fish, or on weeds, in seasons of scarcity, until human nature can no longer bear what they suffer, and they are in the end driven to mendicancy. No doubt the feeling of aversion to this resource is strongest in the commencement, and once broken down, it soon vanishes altogether. Worse habits cannot possibly be generated than habits of idleness.

There have been no outrages on persons known to be committed by these poor people.

Obtaining provisions on credit did prevail much more in this parish than it does; the clergy opposed the system, and so did the assistant barrister, both in town and country. The price of a hundred weight of meal has been often charged, for six months' credit, at 12*s.*, 15*s.* and 16*s.*; and Mr. M'Briarty said, that though some families have been ruined by it, yet others have been saved from starvation. The labouring population can do little more than provide for the present day.

The poorest persons are generally more regardless of prudence with respect to early marriages, than those who have acquired some means of subsistence. Those who are most comfortable generally look before them. The Rev. Mr. Drummond said, that the clergy generally encouraged marriages "inter pares," where any intimacy or connexion has taken place between the parties.

DURING the winter months no labourer excepting those constantly employed by gentlemen can count upon more than three days work in the week; this is the period when they generally subsist on their own stocks of potatoes; when those are consumed, the wife and children are driven to begging as their only resource; no case has occurred of females, even of the poorest classes, being driven to prostitution when work fails the family. The husbands often emigrate, and leave their children and wives no resource but mendicancy till they are able to send them some relief, which they always do, when they can.

They never commit offences here, for the purpose of being supported in gaol, neither have they been guilty of outrages to avoid starvation.

The practice of obtaining provisions on credit very generally prevails, and has given rise to great extortion, on the part of farmers, and others, who avail themselves of the distresses of the poor labourers; this is the case, both in town and country, but the exertions of the clergy have lately produced a great alteration for the better; 3*s.* is charged for a credit of three months, on 14*s.* worth of meal, and sometimes 6*s.* exclusive of the market price; this this produces direful consequences, distress, ruin and litigation, and keeps the labourer constantly in debt.

When distress prevailed, and provisions were high, Lord Caledon and Sir A. Chichester, with a view to relieve the labourers, frequently employed more hands than they required; but this relief has been generally confined to their own tenantry. A labour-rate has never been in operation; those who have constant employment may, by extreme frugality, make some provision against want of work, but there are very few cases indeed, of a labourer who has been able to save even a trifle; the most destitute are invariably the most improvident and most disposed to early marriages. The greatest number of early marriages is among servant boys and maids; those who are comfortable look before them, and the more substantial farmers do not allow their children to marry, without considering their future prospects. The clergy invariably advise marriage, in cases of previous connexion, unless where there is some reasonable obstacle, such as impropriety of conduct on the part of the female, or great inequality of rank in life, or canonical impediments.

FROM June to August there is the greatest want of employment and the greatest pressure on the labourer, in consequence of the scarcity of food. In the winter months, employment is also slack, but at that time they have their little stock of provisions; during scarce summers they are reduced to fewer and more scanty meals in the day. There is no regular fund to assist them.

When out of work, the wife and children beg about the neighbourhood; this is the first stage of mendicancy, but there are no cases known where the want of employment has driven the women or girls to prostitution. Rev. Mr. Doherty, in his memory, has known 9 or 10 families deserted by their husbands, who afterwards married in strange places.

There are no cases known of able-bodied persons having committed trifling offences to be supported in gaol.

Mr. Stewart has heard no instance of theft, in order to relieve themselves, amongst them. The destitute through their necessities have never been guilty of outrages on persons here.

Obtaining provisions on credit is a very common practice; it is the only resource, except mendicancy, of the destitute in town and country at particular seasons of distress; when meal is sold at 11 s. 6 d. or 12 s. per cwt. there are instances known, where on a note payable in six months, 1 l. was given, and there are many cases where the debt having been 3 l. an additional sum of 1 l. was paid, on process being served, for a further extension of time to the next sessions.

It has been the practice with some very few gentlemen, particularly with Mr. Stewart of Tyrcallen, to employ more labourers than they required in times of distress. Considering the wages of the labourer, it may be said to be impossible for him to make any provision against want of work.

Rev. Mr. Doherty said, the poorest class were invariably the first to marry; the most wretched are most regardless of prudence in making early and improvident marriages. Mr. Stewart's father has been in the habit of immediately discharging any of his labourers' sons who got married; this restraint has operated very favourably, having generated provident habits, stimulated industry, and has never been the cause of licentious habits. Rev. Mr. Doherty said, that in cases of previous connexion, it was invariably the practice among persons of every religious persuasion to recommend marriage when the parties were of equal rank, and when there was no particular objection, such as bad character, on either side.

THOMAS M'CLEAN (a labourer) said, "Work is scarce from November to February, and most plenty from May to August: wages are generally 1*s.* a day, but if a man was employed all the year round, he would only get 8*d.* or 9*d.* In the slack time I get about three days work in the week, and at other times I get as many as six days. From November to February I would be glad to take 6*d.* a day and my diet for constant employment. I have supported eight children and my wife, and would have been glad of 8*d.* a day and my diet, from the time I first began to work; I would have saved at least 10*l.* by this time. I never saved more than three guineas, and that was when I was a bleacher at 28*s.* a month. There is no broken time with a bleacher, he is always employed. I never was reduced so low as two meals in the day; if I had been, I would have got assistance from my neighbours." "I never knew a labourer," said Moon, "to be reduced to two meals in the day; the labourers in Aughadowey are better off, and have more employment than the generality." "There is no fund to assist those who are out of work," said M'Clean, "but the savings' bank, and I never put any money in there."

"I never heard of a labourer in the parish begging, except from laziness. My children earned enough by spinning and labour in the fields to clothe themselves. I always planted potatoes against a slack of work, or the wet season. Labourers get from the farmer a small piece of bog or poor soil to plant potatoes in, on condition of manuring it." One labourer, who has not more than half a rood of ground, grows potatoes in it sufficient for a family of five when he is out of work, and often sells potatoes in the dear months of May and June. Another labourer was mentioned, who after having got regular work for three years, at 9*d.* a day, (wet days only being excluded) lent between 1*l.* and 2*l.* to another labourer. Moon said, "I never saw the day when a man who could work would not get it." Employment is so general in this parish, principally owing to the number of bleach greens, that no labourer can be reduced from necessity to mendicancy, nor have the women or girls ever been known to become prostitutes. One labourer only had deserted his wife and children, but domestic discord, not destitution, was the cause. No one had ever been known commit any offence in order to be sent to gaol, nor will they steal in seasons of scarcity. "I had potatoes in the pits," said Moon, "during the scarce time of 1817, and none of them were touched or disturbed." Mr. Browne said, "I have seen England and Ireland, and think both property and life as safe in one country as in the other."

The farmers generally give credit to the labourers when out of work; the hucksters are too poor to do so; the latter take yarn and clothes as pledges for tea and whiskey." M'Clean said, "I never paid above the market-price, and never was more than three months in debt." Mr. Orr said, "I know that a considerable difference is often made in the price, and it is considered a very fair bargain to pay the highest price between the time of borrowing and that of paying; 15*s.* is often charged for meal, which is worth only 10*s.* It is common too, to pay 13*d.* for the loan of a guinea for a month." John Bishop said, "Many farmers charge above the market price only half the difference between the price of the meal, at the time when it is borrowed, and the highest price it reaches before it is paid for. Very few processes are brought, both farmers and hucksters are paid in general what they have lent. Moon said, "I have sold many a peck of flax to the farmers and labourers, and was always paid within six months."

Employment is at all times very general in this parish. No labour-rate has ever been in operation. During harvest, labourers come down from the mountains, and return as soon as the harvest has been got in.

Moon thought, "That a labourer, with constant employment, at 5*s.* a week, might lay by something at the end of the year; but a person must always," said he, "ask his wife whether he is going to do well or not. She ought to spin for him four hanks a week, and get 3*d.* a hank, 1*d.* more than they get in Derry, for they spin finer here. No labourer here who was willing to work has ever suffered from want of employment." The poorest invariably marry earliest, having nothing to lose; the farmers are more prudent, and all agreed that in proportion as a man was comfortably circumstanced, he was more cautious in forming such an engagement.

FROM June to August, and the depth of winter, are the periods of the year at which a portion of the labourers are out of work; most of them live on potatoes which they have planted on some small plot of ground which they rent.

If the family do not rent a plot of ground, the wife and children beg about the neighbourhood; and a large portion of the rising population is habituated to mendicancy by such means. No instances were known of the women and girls being driven to prostitution when work fails the family.

No cases have been ever known of able-bodied persons or their families committing trifling offences for the purpose of being sent to prison, and there obtaining food and shelter.

To steal potatoes is a common practice.

Those out of work obtain provisions on credit, from farmers principally; and in such cases the price is considerably above the money price at the time of credit being taken. Few have been processed at sessions, the credit is generally repaid in the course of a few months. No instance is known of a labourer becoming reckless by reason of debts of this kind.

The wages of the labourer are 8 d. with diet, and 10 d. or 1 s. without. The providence of the labouring classes is destroyed by the constant occurrence of destitution. The poorest marry earliest. Those who have little knowledge of comfort are so reckless as to contract improvident marriages; but those who have always been well off, and who know some comfort, are less prone to marriage, and are far more cautious.

FROM November to March none but those hired as farm servants get employment. Not more than three days' work in the week is obtained on an average during the year. "I worked" said Mullen, "from November to March for 6 d. a day, and had only two meals in the day." Many of the farmers said that work was slack in the spring months, not because there was nothing to be done, but because the farmers could not afford to pay their labourers, and had bad leases, and no inducement to improve. During the spring months, therefore, the labourers are frequently reduced both in the number and (if it is possible) in the quality of their meals. The labourer usually holds from a quarter of an acre to an acre of ground, in which he plants potatoes, in order to maintain him during the winter months. His crop generally fails in summer or spring months, and then, unless in constant employment, he is reduced to the greatest distress, having no resource from which he can hope for assistance.

Every labourer endeavours to hold a small patch of land, to maintain himself by when out of employment. If unable to accomplish this, he either gets credit, and is thus involved deeply in debt, or is reduced to beg, and even then he returns to work when he can get it. The females are never driven by distress to prostitution, nor were any instances known where husbands had, for this reason, deserted their family.

Potatoes have sometimes been stolen in hard times, to relieve immediate destitution, but very few offences of this nature have been committed. Millar, however, said, "I have heard a man declare, when he was in great distress, that he wished he was in gaol, for then he would be fed, at least." But no instance was known where persons had endeavoured for this reason to be sent to gaol. Very few thefts, and no outrages, have been committed owing to destitution.

Labourers, when out of work, get credit in the country from the farmers, and in town from the hucksters; 2 s. on a cwt. of meal is the least advance that is paid, and 50 per per cent. is frequently given. A large advance on the price is charged, whatever security may be given. "I offered the other day" said a labourer, "a decent man's line to a huckster, and he charged me 3*s*. above the market price for the meal." The usual bargain is, the highest market price between the time of borrowing and that of repaying. Very high interest is always charged for the loan of money. "I have known" said Morrison, "24*s*. given for the loan of 20*s*. for a month." "There is a power of processes for these bargains," said Mullen, "at quarter sessions; the huckster and farmer almost always recover what they lend; they never lend without good security, and the farmer can pay himself by labour; so, between them, the poor man is kept constantly in debt."

In one or two instances gentlemen have employed, in hard times, more labourers than they require; farmers had never done so.

"A labourer," said Morrison, "cannot lay by anything; he can hardly make the two ends meet in the year, when he has full employment."

The poorest marry the earliest, frequently from the hope of having children to assist them in their old age. "I have often heard men say, that he who grew old without marrying, would rue it in the end; and it is a common remark, that they are better off who have children to maintain them.—(M'Ivor.)——"The poor think," said Morrison, "that any change must be for the better." Those who are better off, look for a fortune, and the farmers' sons always marry later than the labourer, and are more cautious. Millar, a beggar, said, "A poor man ought to marry young, that his weans may be able to assist him when he grows old."

FROM June to August a great portion of the labourers are out of work, and afterwards in winter; but then they have plenty of potatoes, generally three meals of them, with salt or sometimes a herring. From June to August they have but one meal of potatoes, which, if the family be large, is often very scanty. There is no regular fund for relieving them.

When out of work the labourer shuts up his cottage and sends his family to beg, sometimes accompanying them, and sometimes not; they thus become habituated to mendicancy, and sometimes beg even at home. The women and girls are never driven to prostitution, though in the country many "tramping" women have children by different parents. Some of them have had four by different fathers, but chiefly beggars. Few parents or husbands intend to desert their families, but many, especially of late, have left them to go in search of work, and never returned; they sometimes send for their families. Henry Greer knew two cases of total desertion in two years.

No distress causes them to commit offences to be sent to gaol. Henry Greer knew one man who was driven, through destitution, to steal some potatoes for his wife and family; he was sent to gaol, but is now an industrious man, caretaker to a gentleman near this, and his wife and children bear an excellent character. No misery, in 99 cases out of 100, leads them to commit offences.

They rarely, if ever, steal, and then only sufficient of potatoes to prevent starvation. They have never been guilty of outrages upon person. The witnesses all agreed that a provision for the poor would be productive of much good, by preventing the evils resulting from vagrancy.

The labourers out of work obtain credit from the farmers, but not from the hucksters; the usual agreement is, that they should pay the highest intermediate price between the period of obtaining and paying for the provisions; the usual difference is 3*d*. a bushel, value 1*s*. Greer, however, when out of work, had obtained credit from many gentlemen round, without any advance of price, but this is attributable to the excellence of his character. The labourer is, in general, kept much in debt, and rendered reckless.

No labour-rate has ever been in operation; two cases only were known where persons had employed a greater number of labourers than was necessary; many even in times of scarcity turn them off when the immediate necessity for their labour is over; they never on absentee estates employ more than are absolutely necessary.

One or two cases only were known where labourers had saved. Mr. O'Hagan knew one man, with a large grown-up family, and in constant employment, who had saved about 12*l*., but this was a very rare case. Greer never knew an instance of a labourer saving, though he thought they would if possible. Mr. Forrest said, "If I were to fetch in a mechanic having 10*d*., and another having 2*s*. per day, the former, though not perhaps so well fed, would have as good a coat on his back as the latter." All the witnesses agreed that mechanics were more improvident and drunken than labourers; the latter are not improvident, but cannot save.

Those who saved anything are always more cautious and later in marrying. The most destitute marry earliest, as they cannot be worse off. The young labourer of 19 is induced to marry, because he thinks himself able to maintain a wife, and has no apprenticeship to go through like a mechanic. A saving man is always most cautious.

An experiment was tried in the neighbouring parish of Tamlaght Finlagan, where for three years a voluntary contribution for the relief of the poor was made. The number of landholders in the parish was about 800; the number of subscribers about 340. A majority of the subscribers, assembled in vestry, agreed to assess themselves by annual payments; after succeeding very well for two years, and declining during the third, the experiment utterly failed. This was attributed by the generality of the witnesses to the refusal of some of the wealthier farmers to contribute, there being no power to compel them; by others to their still being unwilling to refuse relief to strange beggars; and by some few to favouritism in the distribution of the money, and the small amount of the subscriptions of the gentry compared to their means. The first years' subscription was 175 l.; that of the second 242 l.; in the third year it failed. There are about 12 mendicants in the parish at present, for every one seen there during its continuance.

N. B. —The small farmers in this district all labour occasionally for others, and combine the wants and feelings of both classes.

IN winter, from November to March, three-fourths of the labourers are unemployed, and during the three summer months at least half are out of work; during this period they are frequently reduced to two and sometimes to one scanty meal a day. A working man ought to have four pounds of potatoes three times a day, viz. 12 pounds a day, or three pounds of meal, but he is frequently reduced to one meal of three pounds of potatoes or one pound of meal; he could not, on this, get through a good day's work. When he is thus reduced, he has no fund from which he can obtain any assistance.

Their wives and children are frequently compelled to beg, and in that case go to a distan parish, from feelings of shame. Still they would half starve before they would become mendicants, and frequently bring on illness by their abstinence before they will go out and ask relief. If they have an opportunity of giving up mendicancy they do, "but before they betake themselves to it they have lost their little holdings, and can never make head again." —(M'Closkey.)

The husbands very rarely, if ever, desert them intentionally, but often go to England for work, and cannot return for a long time.

"They would rather half starve themselves than beg, and any begging is better than stealing."—(Irwin.)

Of the few who have been sent to gaol for trifling offences caused by destitution, almost all become again industrious. "They will do all but starve, and that is as much as any man can require."—(Irwin.)

Few or no instances are known of their stealing. Potato pits constantly in their power are untouched, except in very rare instances. The most destitute have never been known to commit outrage on persons for the purpose of preventing starvation; no degree of distress is found much to demoralize the poor.

The labourers, when out of work, obtain credit from both farmers and shopkeepers, generally from those farmers who are in the habit of employing them. When meal is 10*s.* a hundred, the labourer is frequently obliged to pay 15*s.*, and in some cases, from fear of being prosecuted for usury, the farmers first nominally sell it to the labourers, and then buy it back from them at half price. The labourer is thus kept constantly in debt, and when he does make a little money is obliged to expend it in paying off arrears, and can never be comfortable.

Some one or two persons near this parish, in times of scarcity, have employed more labourers than they at the time required, for the sake of affording relief; but the custom is very far from being general, and is never known on absentee estates.

None could lay by a provision against the time of want, even when without destitute relatives, unless there were in the family two or three grown-up children, who, as well as the father, were in constant employment. A single man perhaps, in constant employment at 5*s.* a week, might lay by a little. A family would pay 8*d.* or 10*d.* a week for their lodging, and 1*s.* for a load of turf; potatoes might average from 2*d.* to 3*d.* a stone; and, if casualties be added to their necessary expenses, &c., they could not, except in the above-mentioned instance, lay by anything.

The poorest marry the earliest; but latterly not so early in life as they once did, having been taught wisdom by experience. Exactly in proportion to a man's having laid up any property, is his caution about marriage, and his care "to whom he will trust it."

N.B.—The small farmers in this district all labour occasionally for others, and combine the wants and feelings of both classes.

DURING the months of June, July and August work is very scarce, and in winter from the end of November to the middle of March. In June there is a little employment at cutting, drying, and stacking turf. In July and August there is no work, many then go over to England or Scotland, where the harvest is early, and return here for their own harvest time. All agreed that there was not more than two days' employment in each week at agriculture; during the remainder of the week they weave, "but this," said Mr. Holmes, "is a bad combination, they frequently say to me when they return to their loom, that their "hand is put out for weaving." In winter they have more food than in summer, generally their own potatoes, with a salt herring or some leeks, but no milk.—(Bradley.)

They usually have a little patch of land, or the use of it for manure. "If thrown on the market," said Mr. Holmes, "they could not live at all. In summer they have but little potatoes, but some milk; they then get meal and give their labour for it afterwards, (the highest intermediate price between the time of getting credit and the time of paying being the usual bargain.)"

"Last summer," said Bradley, "when potatoes were 1*s.* 6*d.* a bushel, they would have been glad to have got two meals a day of them."

In July the potatoes are generally 10*d.* a bushel, three bushels a week, which is a small allowance for a family, would be 2*s.* 6*d.* a week; there is no fund that affords them any assistance. When heads of families are out of work it is very common for the wives and children to beg, not however in the immediate neighbourhood.

Mr. Holmes had little doubt that many of the cottiers when out of work went begging.

"I have met them myself," said he, "going to Port Stewart, and I knew they were begging; one man here holds three acres, and pays his rent very badly; he is believed to beg and to steal, but the children do not beg."

All agreed that the practice tended greatly to increase mendicancy.

"Begging," said Mr. M'Cammon, "is decidedly the best business. I have known them able to sell by it, every night, five pounds of meal, and heard a man in the county of Down, say he was worth 18*s.* a week by begging."

"Oh! sir," said Bradley, "the beggars had a monopoly of it then, but there is plenty of opposition in the trade now."

All agreed that the girls were often driven by distress to prostitution. "In fact," said Mr. M'Cammon, "there are but very few of them who are not prostitutes."

And destitution was believed by all to be the most common cause of this.

Bradley says, "the poor would all but starve; they would live on half a meal a day before they beg, much less before they would steal."

Potato pits have been occasionally, in scarce times, opened by destitute persons, but not since Mr. Holmes came, he had found frequently his potato pits broken open, but generally traced it to thieving rather than to want.

When out of work the labourers usually get credit, 4*s.* interest in the 1*l.* is frequently given, and often 15*s.* is given for meal when the market price is only 10*s.*, and the credit six months, 2*s.* in the cwt. of meal is generally allowed. The dealers purchase it in November for 10*s.*, when the small farmer sells it to make up his rent, and sell it in June and August for 12*s.*, giving credit until the November following." "Character," said Bradley, "determines the price; an honest man gets it at 12*s.*, others have to pay more. A labourer gets another man better off to get it for him."

Mr. M'Cammon says, "The labourer, cottier or small farmer, is very seldom indeed out of debt, they frequently get their seed one year, and pay for it the next, and are almost always a year in debt."

Mr. Holmes and Mr. Waddy have employed some men at fencing, and a few girls at weeding, when they did not require it, but the practice is very uncommon." "Absentees never do so, they have no feeling for the country," said Mr. Waddy, "they live beyond their means, and make the tenants pay for it." A statement in which all present concurred.

John Bradley says, "The poorest class marries earliest; they frequently have to borrow the money to pay the clergyman, and the expenses of the wedding feast. The men marry at from 19 to 25, the women whenever they are called on."

"They have no providence whatever," said Mr. Holmes, "sometimes indeed, they look to a grown up family as a blessing, at least they allege to me as an excuse for going back in their rent, that they have a large small family; the parents, and especially the mothers, encourage early marriages, especially in the case of girls who cannot earn their own support by labour, and therefore are a burthen to their parents; they have also a look out for their character, and wish to have them settled; all depend on contingencies."

M'Can says, "they are often very poor when they marry, but generally have a small family before their distress is seen."

"Another reason for their marrying so early," said Mr. Holmes, "is, that a woman is actually necessary to superintend their household, so much so, that a wife will get on better (if she holds her husband's land) without her husband, than the husband without the wife. She makes a far harder bargain than he does; the men often excuse the non-payment of rent by saying, they have not a woman to look after the house, and that their property is in the hands of strangers."

"A widow, holding land and paying a man to work for her, pays me in every case better than a single man. A young man came to me the other day, and asked my leave to marry; he was only 19, and the girl 18. I endeavoured to dissuade him, but he said, he had before a father and a mother to see to him and to his property, but now he must have a woman. Those who are better off, are more cautious, they can support their children at home, and therefore are not so anxious to get rid of them off their hands."—(Mr. Holmes.)

The farmers often hang back to obtain a larger portion. A cow is usually considered a fair portion, with a bed, a chest of drawers, and a wheel. A farmer of eight acres, if he has money, will give some, and if not, frequently promises or gives his bond for such a portion as this; the man, on the other hand, is expected to have two or three acres of land, or to be a good weaver or tradesman. All, when they are married, separate from their parents, and get a house of their own."—(Mr. Holmes, Bradley, M'Can.)

N. B.—The assistant commissioners attach the greatest weight to every part of the evidence given by Mr. Holmes. He appears to me the most active, intelligent and benevolent witness we have yet examined; and his opinions, as coming from an Englishman, and one, therefore, free from party prejudice, appear to me deserving of the greatest attention.

MANY of the labourers are without work from November to March; at this season some of them weave, and others live as well as they can on their small store of potatoes, but are poorly provided for; there is no fund for their assistance.

The wife and children of unemployed labourers do not beg through the neighbourhood; there are many instances where women, with families, have been abandoned by their husbands.

No poor have ever been known to commit offences in order to be sent to gaol, nor have they stolen to relieve themselves from destitution, or committed outrages upon persons.

In the country the farmers give credit, the hucksters seldom do so now; the former generally charge one-fifth more than ready-money price; the debt is paid, in general, cheerfully, but some are processed at the quarter sessions for such debts; the barrister looks to the amount, and inquires if it is fairly due.

Mr. Clarke and Mr. Stephenson give work in ditching and draining, which they reserve or undertake to meet the distress of the season, when least employment is to be procured.

Many are greatly relieved, and appear very grateful towards these gentlemen.

FROM December to March is the period at which a portion of the labourers are without work; they generally have a patch of potato-ground planted, on the produce of which they subsist during the winter months; they are not reduced to so few meals in these months, as in the months of May, June and July. There is no regular fund out of which they receive assistance.

They beg much more in the summer months; begging is not so common in the winter months, when least work is to be obtained. Individuals, who have been compelled by necessity to beg in the summer months, have continued it afterwards when the necessity ceased to exist. The women and girls are very rarely driven to prostitution. When work fails the family, there are no instances in the parish of women, having families, being abandoned by their husbands.

There has been no instance of able-bodied persons, or their families, committing offences for the purpose of being sent to prison, in order that they might obtain food and shelter there.

There is no instance known of persons having been guilty of robberies, with a view to relieving themselves from destitution.

Credit is very common in the country, but rare in towns. Farmers are the persons applied to; 50 per cent. above the market price is frequently charged; 2*s.* or 3*s.* are commonly added to the price of one hundred weight of meal, value 10*s.* Processes for such debts, at the quarter sessions, are discouraged by the assistant barrister, who reduces the amount, if immoderately high.

Nothing like a labour-rate has ever been known, and county works have been generally undertaken when work was most plentiful. The wages of the labouring people could not enable them to lay by anything; but they suffer more from the occasional high price of provisions, than from want of employment. The very poorest marry the earliest; it is a common practice to borrow money in order to pay the licence. The only requisite then is to get a shelter for the night. The clergy are not often consulted. Farmers' sons are observed to be much later and more considerate in their marriages than labourers.

WORK is very scarce from the middle of November to the middle of March, and during the three summer months after the export ceases. The labourers agreed in stating, that half of their whole number were constantly out of employment, and very often still more; very many of the tradesmen are without work during at least one-third of the year. "I know 50," said Gallagher, "like myself, who, with the exception of employment in their own garden, or in harvest time, do not get work two days in the week." During the periods mentioned above, the labourer is frequently reduced to two, and sometimes even to one scanty meal of potatoes in the day. Mr. Ross Smith said, "From November to March employment is very general, but during the three summer months very little is to be had; and then the men go regularly over to England or Scotland, and return about September: this I know to be the case about my father's distillery. I do not believe that they are frequently reduced in the number of their meals, but that on many occasions they do not get anything but potatoes." Mr. O'Rean, when asked his opinion on this point, said, "I do not know; they would not tell their clergymen; they would be ashamed to do so." All agreed that though in the town employment might be comparatively general, yet in the country around a very large proportion of labourers were often out of work.

The wives and children of unemployed labourers frequently beg. When Rorke is either unemployed or gets but little for his labour, say 6 d. a day, which he often works for, his wife and six children must beg, in order to support themselves; many go to a friend, or sell their beds and pawn their clothes, to avoid begging.

In general the wives and children would fast before they would go out. Mr. Hay said, that "few residents, but many strange families, begged in this way; they generally returned to labour; but, no doubt, having once begged, are less reluctant to do so afterwards."

Prostitution sometimes arises in towns from distress; they "cannot starve," but nothing can compel to it in the country. Mr Hay thought prostitution never arose from want, but almost always from seduction in the first instance; they never sink so low at once, but are driven out by their friends and compelled to it; many, when out of work, leave their wives and children on the Mendicity to go in search of employment; few of these return, being generally of bad character, their families are well rid of them.

None have ever committed offences to be sent to prison, except the "walking" girls, who break a pane sometimes. Mr. Hay knew several act thus, and who were in prison, and after being discharged without means of living, wanted to get back again; but under the improved system, silence being enforced, and stone-breaking and other employments introduced, all are most anxious to avoid it; only 17 persons are now confined for trial within four months.

Paupers do not steal; but housekeepers, through fear of starvation, have been known to open potato pits; this is very rare, and only occurs in hard seasons. No outrages have occurred from want here.

A cottier would never get credit unless by giving good security; many poor women said, they got provisions at market price, but out of town the price is considerably advanced.

John Dermott often knew meal sold for 15*s.*, the market price being 10*s.*; he himself borrowed 5*l.*, for which he paid 6*l.* in six months; 24*s.* for 20*s.* was frequently given for the same time, and good security required. The people are most anxious to pay their debts, so that many live on one meal a day to do so. Dermott would sell his cow to be exact to the day.

Neither gentlemen or farmers have ever employed more labourers than they require; and but one instance was recollected where a number of labourers were employed, out of a general subscription fund, in breaking stones, for which they were afterwards anything but grateful. "They relieve themselves by going to Scotland," said Mr. Smith. A weaver might once have made 1*s.* 4*d.* or 1*s.* 6*d.* a day, but now not more than 1*s.*, and he has not constant employment. Porters on the quay get from 1*s.* to 1*s.* 6*d.*; labourers, in town, from 10*d.* to 1*s.* None could lay by anything; they can barely support themselves. Rorke's wife, when married, was only 17, he himself 20; a labourer without land. Rose M'Donnell's husband, in the same circumstance, married at the same age, as well as M'Dowd, who was a butcher. In all cases the women were found to marry from 17 to 19, the men about 20, and all extremely poor; many marry young, to have children to assist them when old; but they generally say, no change can be for the worse. Brown married at 24, but said, "Many here marry at 13, and that is what makes so many beggars; a houseful of children, and they unable to support them." In towns they marry early, from being crowded together in the same house; but all agreed, that in proportion as a man had saved anything, or was comfortable, he was cautious in marrying. "The farmers have more wit than to marry early," said Brown; the lower classes say, "As they have no other comforts, they can get a marriage cheap;" so that a man with 6*s.* a week is more likely to marry than a man with 9*s.* or 10*s.* "They marry in the country earlier than in towns," said Mr. O'Rean. Mechanics are much more considerate than labourers.

Mr. M'Clure and others agreed in thinking, that in towns the men married later, not only because they were generally better off, but that greater facilities were there afforded them for indulging their passions.

"THE precise number of vagrants in this parish is not ascertainable; I think, however, that it is rather on the decrease; I attribute this to the comparatively few county of Mayo labourers who now go to England for work."—(Mr. St. George)——"In the parish of Killersa there are not twenty regular beggars; there are not half the number now that there was about ten years ago. Six or seven call at my house daily, on an average, to get potatoes."—(Mr. Burke.)——"Poverty has been decreasing these last twenty years; last year, I think, it was stationary, owing to the great reduction in the prices of agricultural produce."—(Mr. St. George.)——"I think that the comforts of the people are increasing steadily, though slowly, for the last forty years."—(Mr. Burke.)——"The price of labour is more equalized than it was, and there is not so great an inducement to emigrate for work as there was formerly; the wives and children of those who left home in search of work, used invariably to leave their own part of the country and beg."—(Mr. St. George.)——"There is a greater quantity of agricultural employment, and a greater number of persons employed; and, though the price of labour is less than it was seven or eight years ago, I think there is more general comfort."—(Christopher Jamison.)——"There is more tillage, and the land being better tilled now than it used to be, produces more; but the increase of the quantity is not sufficient to make amends for the fall in the prices; and only that we have a good landlord, who gives an abatement in the rent, we would be worse off than we were before."—(John Burke.)——"There are not more than twenty public beggars in this town."—(Rev. Mr. Walsh.)

"The greater part of the beggars, who are residents in the parish, come from the neighbourhood of the lake; the landlord of that district is a non-resident; they can obtain little or no employment, and their land pays a very high rent."—(Mr. Walsh.)——"In proportion as they increase the quantity of tillage, their poverty increases; the land is very bad, and they are not able to procure manure to till it properly."—(St. George.)——"It is rough pasture land, and, when tilled, becomes exhausted immediately, but their poverty is so great that they cannot afford to consider the consequences of breaking it up."—(O'Flaherty.)——"Many of the families who reside on it have not one whole blanket; scarcely any of them have a second."—(Walsh.)——"They half starve themselves, that they may have the means of paying their rent. If they did not pay it the land would, of course, be taken from them, and then they must beg; rather than do which, many of them would submit to almost any privation."—(Fitzgerald.)——"There were more beggars here formerly, but many of them having got employment, are now tolerably comfortable."—(Chr. Jamison.)——"Many who are snug enough in winter, must walk out with the bag on their back in summer."—(Thornton.)——"There are about fifty families (who are ashamed to beg) supported by their neighbours during the summer."—(Rev. Mr. Walsh.)——"Vagrants are more numerous after seed time, than at any other time of the year, because at that time the men leave home in search of work, and the wives and families go out to beg. There are some resident paupers, but the great majority come from a distance; they are of all ages and sexes, but principally women and children, because the men generally go far from home to procure work. Very few from this parish go to beg after having planted their potatoes; the wives or children of employed labourers are never known to beg, at least in this parish. Mechanics and unemployed servants are often reduced to beggary, but very few of the cottier tenants of this place are; when they are, I am sure they would prefer going to a strange place, where they would not be known; some few, who when old and infirm, have transferred their property to their children have been obliged to adopt a vagrant life; all who leave this parish to go to England to work take what will bear their expenses with them; very few go, and those who do, go more on speculation than from necessity."—(Mr. St. George.)——"There are some able-bodied resident beggars, but the greater number are strangers; the residents are from the part of the parish near the lake."—(Mr. Burke.)——"The strangers are generally from the mountainous and country districts of Mayo. The principal causes of vagrancy are the low prices of agricultural produce, and the minute subdivision of land.' —(Mr. St. George.)——"Those along with the high rents."—(Mr. Burke.)——"They are all ashamed of begging, and none would do it from choice."—(Mr. St. George.)——"None would beg at home from choice, but they would go to strange places to beg when they were really in no want."—(Jas. Lynch.)——"If the children of vagrants could get employment, they would accept of it; they would hire at fifteen shillings a year rather than continue begging, when others of the same size and strength would get from 30*s.* to 40*s.*"

"An able-bodied beggar would get from one to two stones of potatoes in the day, and are often able, by exerting themselves, to procure more than they can consume, indeed I may say they always do this, for they are generally able to sell some, and often have gold and silver sewed up in their rags. Some receive relief from passengers, but they are generally town beggars, rather than country vagrants. Beggars get very little meal; there is no rule as to the quantity, but generally those who have large families get more."—(Mr. Burke.)

"They generally purchase clothes, tobacco and soap for the money they receive for the surplus of their collections."—(Mr. O'Flaherty.)——"They do not purchase good clothes, for that would destroy their trade and uniform. They do not often dissipate during their vagrancy, but generally reserve it till they return home; I have no doubt but some few are induced to leave home and beg hoping to return with large sums of money. I knew a woman from this country to go to the county of Kilkenny during a season in which potatoes were very dear there and very cheap here; on being asked why she did not stay at home, where potatoes were plenty, she answered, 'They are not worth gathering at home, they are so cheap.' I have known many who have returned home comparatively rich."——"A man from the mountains of Joice Country, a miserable object, for the last two summers has made a descent into this part of the country, frequenting Tuam, Headford, and Shruel markets; he was not in such extreme want as to require the produce of his begging for his support, but laid out the amount of his first summer's tour, nearly 3 l., in the purchase of sheep, to stock his father's holding; though I have not ascertained the amount of this years' produce, I believe it to be at least equal. I believe this is not uncommon; it is not usual to beg under the plea of being in search of work. Dirty clothes, and filthy appearances, are often assumed by professed beggars, especially in towns; if they do not produce sores, they certainly maintain them.—(Mr. St. George.)——"Strangers, sometimes, use deceptions, but residents do not."—(Mr. Burke.)——"I knew many instances of persons pretending to be lame, or otherwise disabled; I saw one man at the fair of Tuam who had his hand tied up, and in a sling; he kept it so the whole day, but in the evening had a verbal dispute with a countryman, who struck him with a stick; on being struck, he immediately drew his arm from the sling, snatched the stick, and gave the countryman a most unmerciful beating."—(Dr. Hartnet.)——"Lying, forged recommendations, and many such expedients, are resorted to by a particular species of beggars, generally called 'decayed gentlemen or women;' I never knew of persons having deaf or dumb children, having refused to allow them to be taken to an asylum for those so afflicted; but I often knew them to take such children about in the wet and cold, without a sufficiency of clothing, in order to excite pity."—(Mr. St. George.)

"I have frequently known vagrants to lead a dissolute life, but it is not by any means general; they are very seldom concerned in outrage, and never (to my knowledge) in assassinations; they often commit small thefts, or rather pilferings; but never robberies to any extent. The agricultural vagrant who is in search of work would gladly emigrate; but the professed beggar would not. In this parish vagrants never borrow or hire children; but I have known instances of bastard children being placed by their fathers under the care of vagrant nurses."—(Mr. St. George.)

"I never knew a case of death from starvation, nor do I believe that one ever took place in this parish, though many have contracted diseases, such as low typhus fevers, from the badness and scarcity of their food, of which they eventually died."

"An able-bodied man could not collect as much by begging as he would earn by his labour, though a miserable wretched-looking object might collect much more."—(Mr. St. George.)——"The vagrant is a great deal better fed than the labourer."—(William King.)

"When giving potatoes, the character of the applicant is never inquired into; but if giving money more caution would be used. I do not think the prevalence of private charity is prejudicial to the morals of the labouring classes; there are many whom it would be impossible to bring to a steady mode of life; but I think the great majority of able-bodied men would gladly adopt it; very few become vagrants in preference to remaining labourers; I should almost say none; I knew only one instance of a vagrant refusing work when offered him."—(Mr. St. George.)——"An able-bodied man would work for his food rather than beg; I have known many do so in scarce seasons."—(Rev. Mr. Fitzgerald.)

"A vagrant is never refused lodging by the poor cottier or householder."—(Mr. Burke.)——"The relief given generally consists of potatoes at Christmas, or in case of sickness, a little meal is sometimes given; and at fairs and markets small coin by those in better circumstances; buttermilk is generally given to the beggars."—(Mr. St. George.)——"I think it is highly prejudicial to the poor to give lodging to beggars; it causes dirt, and brings on fever. They often circulate false reports, and excite rebellious feelings."—(Mr. O'Flaherty.)——"Farmers always prefer giving food, because there is no coin of so low a value as to represent a potatoe, and because they always have plenty of potatoes, and often have no money; beggars always prefer money, for they take the raw potatoe only with the view of converting it into money."—(Mr. St. George.)

"In giving alms they do not limit themselves to any certain quantity; when potatoes are scarce, they give two or three, when plenty, ten or twelve."—(William King.)——"Persons of every class, from proprietors down to farmers, have a number of dependents, who are chiefly supported by them."—(Mr. Burke.)——"Four beggars make this their walk on market days, and receive assistance from the shopkeepers. I would rather divide among a large number than take the entire support of a smaller number."—(Mr. James Lynch.)

"The support of the vagrant falls principally on the small farmer and shopkeeper, though all classes contribute something; the farmer and shopkeeper are more open to the vagrant than the richer classes are."—(Mr. St. George.)——"The beggar calls oftener at the poor man's house than at the rich man's, and is oftener sent away empty by the rich."—(William King.)——"The rich give rather to certain known objects than to common vagrants."—(Dr. Kelly.)——"The poorer classes give away more, in proportion to their means, than the rich do. The charity of the richer classes is exerted more in employing more workmen than they require than in giving alms."—(Mr. St. George.)——"The poor give ten times as much as the rich, in proportion to their means."—(Dr. Kelly.)——"Persons renting only one acre, and even day labourers, give relief to the beggar, if they have it."—(Mr. St. George.)

"A beggar often collects more than he requires for his support; but this never leads to a waste of provisions, as they always sell the surplus, generally to poor persons who have a little money, but are in want of provisions."—(Mr. St. George.)——"Persons have, I believe, often given away in the early part of the year so much as to leave themselves afterwards in want."—(Mr. St. George.)—"I have known poor persons who were buying provisions to give more away than the persons from whom they bought."—(Mr. James Lynch.)

"I consider that I would be in greater want if I gave none away than if I gave a great deal away, for I think charity never shortens the quantity."—(William King.)——"I believe the feeling of charity to cause a wasteful and irregular expenditure of what might otherwise go to add to the comforts of the labourer."—(Mr. St. George.)——"If a meal was going on, and a beggar called, you would never miss what you would give away. I gave away, myself, part of the cake made of a quart of meal to a beggarman, and at the time I had no more victuals in my house, nor the hope of getting it to earn the next day; but I hoped that as God gave it to me that day he would some more the next day."—(William King.)——"The shopkeepers and farmers would object to the payment of a regular sum, even though small; and say they did not feel the small outgoings of provisions, &c., which they now give towards the support of the poor."—(Mr. St. George.)

"Relief is sometimes given lest the person applying might be suffering from hunger; it is often extorted by importunity, but is generally given because it is the custom of the country." (Mr. St. George.)——"When I give I do so for the good of my soul, the honour of God, and for their benefit. When you say there is nothing for them, they will go away, except the sturdy beggars."—(William King.)——"I think that religious feelings would induce many to relieve a beggar, even at the door of a poor-house; I believe fear of violence from the applicant never causes any to give."—(Mr. St. George.)——"I would not give to those who they say have the money, or to any one who was not in want."—(William King.)——"I am sure many give through fear of the beggar's curse."—(Mr. St. George.)

"Diseases are often spread by giving lodging to vagrants, particularly typhus fevers and itch, and, I believe, scrofula, which is very prevalent here. In my opinion this system is very injurious to the morals and habits of the labouring classes. It is difficult, if not impossible, for a tenant of a cottage and garden, suppose on the side of the road, let his intentions be ever so good, to keep it in that state of neatness and order which he ought, if the beggar and his family, with his bag and all the attendant vermin, are to be admitted, almost as of a right, to his meals; if they can come as they do and almost demand a lodging for the night, and with all their habits of idleness and love of gossip, and what they call 'strange news,' mingle with his family circle, and curl themselves up in a corner to sleep. Independent of any vice that may be disseminated, there is an irregularity and want of decency that is calculated to injure the morals and habits of the labouring classes in the highest degree, and this is one of the worst features in the state of vagrancy."—(Mr. St. George.)——"I knew many persons who were once obliged to beg, and are now industrious and doing well."—(William King.)——"I have known some instances, but not many."—(Mr. St. George.)

"There is no punishment inflicted for vagrancy; but if a vagrant is known to be guilty of stealing, he is drummed out of town, and scarcely ever known to return. Rigorous laws against vagrancy could never be enforced while a possibility of a person starving existed; the donors never will have recourse to such measures unless there be some provision made for the destitute, then their repugnance to the forcible suppression of vagrancy will be entirely removed. Outrages cannot be accounted the immediate results of destitution; I never knew an instance in which it could; nor do I believe one instance ever was known in Ireland."

"There is no mendicity or house of industry in this part of the country. In my opinion mendicants would not be willing to go into one, and from my knowledge of the country, nothing but absolute starvation would drive them into such an institution."—(Mr. St. George.)

A LARGE majority of those whose support is derived from begging are wanderers that come from distant districts. You can never recognize a face amongst them; all are utter strangers who apply at one's door; so that whatever may be the evil of encouraging vagrancy, by giving to those whose characters are altogether unknown, there is no alternative left but that of not relieving at all.

The greater number of strolling beggars come from the estates of absentee proprietors; none wander from properties where the landlord is resident, or where the tenantry are treated with kindness.

From the estates of the Marquis of Clanricarde (to whom I am agent) or from my own, I do not believe that there is one single tenant or tenant's family who goes out to beg; but there are many in great want in this, and I fear in most other parishes, who seldom or never ask alms, who would endure almost any degree of suffering rather than disgrace themselves by doing so. These ought either to be relieved in their own houses or when they beg. There are many of the higher classes (I speak generally,) who, from a wish to discountenance vagrancy, will not give in the one way, and I do not know of their giving in the other; but I do not say that they do not give at all, for I cannot possibly tell.—(D'Arcy.)

I cannot say what the exact number of vagrants is; they are chiefly strangers; I do not know the faces of more than three or four. Five or six families call every day in summer for relief; not more than two or three families call in winter.—(Captain Rogers.)

My servant counted 120 beggars who called at my house in one day.—(Mr. D'Arcy.)

I think there is no increase of vagrancy, the numbers are much the same; in summer there is generally an increase; but they decrease again in winter.—(Captain Rogers.)

I resided in the parish for the last seven years. Comparatively speaking, there are not many native mendicants; there is a decided increase; the numbers are greater by at least one-third; there is an equal increase in the residents and strangers. General poverty is much increased, and there are many householders worse off than the mendicants.—(Mr. Mullens.)

From 20 to 50 persons call every day at my house; more call in summer than in winter; there is no increase of numbers. Do not see any increase of poverty, except what was caused by the fall in grain. It caused much additional distress. I would not say there is one-fourth more distress than there was.—(Richard Gloster.)

Twice the number are obliged to beg now that were seven years ago.—(Sharpe.)

For every ten who lived by charity in my own village seven years ago, there are 20 now.—(Smyth.)

Poverty is of course more general, for the markets are low, and there is no reduction in the rents. The labourers are half idle. The fall of the markets left the farmers unable to employ them.—(Griffin.)

They pay high rents for holdings, which, if they had them for nothing, would not support them.—(D'Arcy.)

When you ask them why they beg, they will answer, "We were turned out into bogs and swamps, and when we had reclaimed our little spots, we were sent in further, till we were beggared at last, else we would be now comfortable."—(Barrett.)

The wives and children of unemployed labourers beg sometimes; while the labourer is in work they never do.—(Mullins.)

The wives and families of cottiers often leave home after the potatoes are set, and beg in other counties. It is a common thing to say, "Your own potatoes are now fit for use, you ought to go home;" to which they generally answer, that they hope to return shortly.—(Cassidy.)

Most of the vagrants are from the county Mayo, and the upper part of this county; they are generally the tenants of absentee landlords.—(D'Arcy.)

When the children of beggars come to the years of discretion, they give up begging and turn to industry.—(Cassidy.)

They are forced into industry when able to work; they will no longer be relieved by the people.—(Mullins.)

Nothing but dire necessity causes any one to beg.—(Cassidy.)

An able-bodied man would get six times more than he could consume.—(Barrett.)

A good many come from Loughrea, and beg about this place; they are chiefly women and children; they collect six times as much as would support them.—(Rogers.)

They sell the surplus; if they did not, what would pay the rent of a cabin in town, or what would put clothes on them?—(Mahon.)

There are many who only beg, while they are actually suffering from want, and who, the moment they can obtain other means of support, cease from being a burthen upon the charity of others.

In the course of last summer a poor woman used to beg in this neighbourhood for several weeks; she had left her home, which was near Ballinakill, nine or ten miles from this place. Once every week she used to meet some of her family in Loughrea, and I have reason to know that she was never able to save more out of her hard earnings than 3*d.* a week; but what she could she gave to them. I have seen her more than once weep bitterly when she spoke of her children, and thought of the condition to which she was reduced; yet, poor as she was, I saw her divide half a stone of potatoes, that a neighbour gave her, with a poor creature that was more destitute than herself. As soon as the provision came in she ceased begging; but after a week's absence she came back, not to beg, but to get 2*d.* the price of a single stone of potatoes which was due to her. She neither asked nor received any thing in the village, and went back to her home the same day.—(Cassidy.)

Some of them buy a little tea and sugar, and the fair beggars buy whiskey.—(Shaughnessy.)

It is not unusual for fair beggars to wear a coat, the sleeve of which is composed of 20 rags stitched together, when they have a comfortable one in their bag, or very probably inside it on their back.—(Shaughnessy.)

They frequently assume the appearance of being crippled or maimed for the purpose of exciting pity; none do it but the fair beggars.—(Mullins.)

There is one man who goes about from fair to fair, with his arm bandaged from the elbow down, and, though you would think by looking at him that he could scarcely move it, there is not a man in the room can use the two arms better than he. He was one day on the bridge bridge of Ennis, where he had a quarrel with a policeman, to whom he gave a sound drubbing with his crutch and hunted him off the bridge.—(Griffin.)——That man gave his daughter 30 l. fortune. He is like a king over the others, and the people say he has a tribute from each of them. I saw him, at the fair of Kilcreest, take off the bandage in a drunken fit, and defy any man in the fair to try him at the stick.—(Mahon.) ——His name is M'Gan.—(Griffin.)

A young man, about 26, attends the fairs in this neighbourhood, having his arm bandaged in the same way; when drunk he can wheel the shillelagh about as well as any man; he goes barefooted when in town, but when out of town he wears a good pair of shoes.—(Mullins.)

This class of persons often are relieved through fear of violence; they are very surly fellows, and if there was no man in the house they would take it by force.—(Mr. Shaughnessy.)

The children are very often taught to practise impositions. I have seen three batches belonging to one family; they divide that they might procure the more.—(D'Arcy.)

Generally speaking, the vagrants are better off than the labourers; unless a man is in constant employment and has a small family, he is worse off than the beggar; for if the beggar will not get relief in one place he is sure of it in another.—(Kenny.)——Not one person in the parish would go out to beg if they could get employment. There are some out already who, I dare say, would not like to work, they are so long unused to it; but like, or like not, they have no employment to get.—(Mahon.)

They scarcely ever get any thing but potatoes, we cannot afford to use meal ourselves; such as are well off sometimes give them a little buttermilk.—(Griffin.)

They derive their support chiefly from the poor; they get little or nothing from the gentry.—(Mullins)——The gates are often ordered to be shut against them.—(Shaughnessy.) ——The commissioners asked whether any thing was left at the gate for them? "Yes, the order to shut them out is left for them."—(Cassidy.)——The poor support the poor; the middle classes are very good, but the rich forget them.—(Griffin.)——Vagrants get much more relief from the poor than from the rich; the farmers give to them as fast as they come.—(D'Arcy.)

I hold 33 acres of mountain land, at 1 l. an acre; I could not afford half nor quarter of a stone of potatoes and keep myself safe.—(Buckley.)

I give a quarter every day; I am buying potatoes.—(Lally.)——We never make any calculation of the quantity we give.—(Buckley.)

If a person was so close as to give none away, he would have more in the latter end of the year for himself; but it is the general opinion, that whatever is given in charity will never be missed.—(Griffin.)——Even the man who is buying at a dear rate would divide with the beggar. I saw a beggar-woman open her bag and give some potatoes to another whom she knew to be in want.—(Cassidy.——I know many to be in want in the latter part of the year, who gave a good deal away in the beginning of the season.—(Shaughnessy.)

When we give alms we give them to lay a foundation for our own souls.—(Shaughnessy.)

Some give alms from a natural compassion and some through shame, it being customary to relieve the distressed.—(Mullins.)

I give, recollecting that I have another place to go to, where, if I give alms, I will receive four-fold reward.—(Griffin.)

When I give alms I am actuated by a sense of gratitude towards my Saviour, who gave his life as a ransom for my soul, not vainly hoping that I am performing a meritorious deed, for "man's righteousness is but as filthy rags," and the inspired Apostle writes, "though I give all my goods to feed the poor, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing."—(Cassidy.) ——Teasing, importunate beggars are not liked, and get very little encouragement.—(Mullins.)

I have seen some beggars called back to get something, because they went away without grumbling when told they had nothing to get.—(Griffin.)——I give in honour of God, and I think whatever is given for God's honour will turn to a good account.—(Barrett.)

Diseases, children's diseases, such as small pox, measles, hooping cough, &c. are frequently spread in a town or village by giving lodgings to vagrants.—(Cassidy.)

I never knew an instance of a person's morals being corrupted by a vagrant.—(Griffin.)—— All the witnesses present said they agreed with Griffin. I am afraid that many female vagrants are ill conducted, but I never knew one of them to interfere in political subjects, or any thing of that nature.

They are in the habit of telling old legendary tales; I am sure they are not the means of spreading political discontent.—(Mullins.)

I am 73 years of age; I was able to work a little three years ago; I was a labourer and was middling well off, for I had work almost every day. I live in town, and have a cabin and half-a-quarter of ground from Mr. Pearse, for which he charges me no rent; my wife is blind these two years; I have one unmarried daughter who lives with me; she can't earn enough to support herself; I go about amongst my neighbours to get a sup of milk or a lock of potatoes; I carry a bag, and always get from two to three stone at a time; I'd get more than another because I am an old neighbour; I was never refused by any of them yet that I went to.

Mr. Gloster gives me 6 d. mostly every week. I scrape a little manure up every year, and the neighbours till the spot of land for me. I get nothing from the rich people, except from Mr. D'Arcy and Mr. Gloster. I don't go far from home; I am nearly naked; I have not a tack of covering but what you see on me, and would be ashamed to go where I am not known. I bought no clothes these three years; did not wear a shoe since last Christmas; this is the first 12 months that my feet knew what it was to want shoes since they were able to wear them.—(Terence O'Loughlin.)

VAGRANCY cannot be said to exist as a practice in this district, though many of the worst evils with which it is elsewhere interwoven are to be found here; and while, in the words of the Rev. Dr. Kirwan, one of the witnesses, "The spirit of industry is still alive amongst the people, and it is a great calumny to say that they are idle;" the peculiar circumstances which characterize this little known, but extensive and important district, seemed fully to warrant a careful and detailed inquiry, and although "a vagrant is seldom seen in the neighbourhood, except some chance wanderer."—(Dr. Kirwan.)——The parish in which, "during the last summer, 150 families were entirely supported by the gratuities of their equals, or by the assistance afforded them by the gentry," appeared to furnish a new and valuable field for investigation into those subjects which hitherto, under a more common aspect, have engaged attention. Did the absence of vagrancy, as a profession, denote a greater degree of comfort in the mode of living that the humbler classes of society can afford, or were the wants and miseries of the great mass of the population not greater where beggary is unknown than where it is known, less time might perhaps have been deemed sufficient for the collection and arrangement of the following evidence. But if those are "destitute" who never are "able to procure kitchen of any kind to eat with the food," which "is sometimes bad and often scanty;" and that the exception among the great body of the peasantry to such privation "is 1 in 50," (J. M'Donough), it is hoped that the materials of the subjoined examination will be found useful as affording basis for further inquiries into the causes of destitution.

There are not more than seven or eight professional beggars in this parish: they are principally old women without families. One only is a native of the parish, the others reside in it from four to ten years. Occasionally other beggars resort here, but not in any numbers, nor for any long period; but though so few beg from door to door, there is a vast number in probably greater, but certainly as great, distress as those who resort to street begging, but who are prevented by shame or pride from adopting such a means of subsistence. Street beggars receive quite sufficient food for their support, and even the means of procuring tobacco by selling the surplus of the potatoes they receive from the villagers. I have not known any of these beggars to be in worse condition at any time than thousands of those who contribute to their support have been, and are likely to be, in seasons of partial or general scarcity. I have nothing to complain of with respect to their habits. I believe that they are honest, and I have not known or heard that any of them are addicted to the use of ardent spirits.

"There is no charitable fund whatsoever in this parish for the relief of such persons. They attend at the chapel doors on days of divine service, and also at funerals; upon such occasions the charitably disposed always give them some trifle. I have no probable means of knowing the amount thus given."—(Dr. Kirwan).——"The amount of distress is much greater now than it was ten years ago, owing to the increase of population, without any corresponding increase of employment. The resident gentry give some employment; but there are scarcely any other sources from which regular work can be obtained. I hold upwards of 170 acres of land in my own hands, and employ throughout the year from 10 to 20 of my own tenants, who hold under leases at the rate of 10*s.* an acre. On my own property alone there are, I believe, 70 able-bodied men, residing in four villages,* who would all willingly work; and the greater part of these are unable to procure employment. One extension of employment has been of recent years lost to the people of this district, by the discontinuance of making bye-roads in the neighbourhood by the Grand Jury. Another cause of the increased and increasing distress is the loss of employment for women. The wives used frequently to pay the rent, by the produce of their spinning flax, and knitting stockings. She was considered a bad wife who would not make half the rent."—(Captain O'Flaherty.)——"A woman might perhaps still earn 2*d.* or 3*d.* a day: she could make four times that before now."—(J. M'Donough.)——"Aye, but 'before now' is gone."—(Fox.)——As an instance of the increase of population, I may say that in the four villages before-mentioned only twelve yeoman lived in the year 1796. There are now 40 who hold under leases, and about 30 sons and brothers, able bodied men.—(Mr. O'Flaherty.)——One very prevalent cause of loss and ruin to the smaller holders is the system of mountain farms, to men in the straitened circumstances of those who constitute a large proportion of the small holders; such losses are frequently irrecoverable. They happen every week.—(Dr. Kirwan.)——I know one struggling industrious man named Youghton, who had but one cow: she was killed a few weeks since, somewhere among the mountains, and I do not believe that he can pay the rent after her loss.—(Fox.)——Besides the usual want which is felt during the summer months months in every year, we must expect famine next season, in consequence of the failure of the potato crop; and then, as has so often happened before, if the gentry or the Government will not give the people the means of purchasing meal, each man must hoist 10 bags upon his shoulder, and go beg.—(Fox.)——There are not above six who live by regular begging in the neighbourhood. Strangers are generally discouraged, they do no good while they stay.—(Dr. Kirwan.)——It is common to grant tenures of three or four years at a rent that may in itself be said not to exceed that of other lands. The holding consists of an acre, or it may be two, of arable land, and a tract of mountain or uncut bog adjoining. The poor manufacture this waste land for themselves, and then the landlords turn them out, add their farms to the estate, and put them into another part of the mountain. I have known them frequently to be told that no other terms would be given to them, unless they chose to pay the full rent for the land they had without any help retained. So many undertake this, for they would sooner go under the rent than under the mountain to rack themselves again and again after the perishing they got before.—(Fox.)——A man named Dowd reclaimed a small portion of land on which he was a yearly tenant. When he began, the ground all round him was worth nothing; but he has now got into the middle of it. He has made many improvements, and put a wall round his garden; and if he does not pay the rent that they choose to fix, they will pitch him out upon the station they have showed him. He is now a great mote in their eyes, because their business is done. He will have greens for his dinner, but the landlords must have the advantage, and they are gathering the people like pigeons to get some of the crumbs for themselves.—(Fox.)——There is little or nothing over the rent for the holder. The meat and the marrow go to the landlord, and there is nothing left to us but the picking of the bones.—(Gerraghty.)——They are subject to constant and heavy losses while they hold the mountain farms. The cattle that they cannot afford to feed in the low lands are sent to the wild pasture; and every day we hear of some of them being lost in the clefts or bogholes.—(Flanagan.)——Many come from Roscommon and some from Mayo looking for work into other parishes of this barony. I have frequently seen them in batches of six and eight on their way to England, or to the adjacent counties, seeking for employment. They are, I believe, relieved by the way, when they ask assistance; but I do not think they get work in my neighbourhood. I can only account for the immunity this particular parish possesses from such intruders, by the fact that this is not the passage from one county to another, and the other districts are. I should say that scarcely any migrate from any part of Moycullen.—(Mr. Burke.)——Hundreds of small holders in Connemara and the other districts around, are known annually to plant their potatoes and go out with their families to beg; but they seldom come here, and none go from us that I am acquainted with.—(J. M'Donogh.)——There is, I think, a spirit of independence in the people, that at present keeps them from mendicancy; but it was clearly shown, in 1830, when food was given to all that wanted it, how easily this feeling may be destroyed, and how difficult it becomes to guard against endless impositions. Numbers who the first year scorned to think of such relief, in the second asked for it, and the third year fought for it.—(Dr. Kirwan.) ——Some of those alluded to were 20 acre men, and they were amongst the foremost and most clamorous in demanding what all believed to be their right.—(Mr. Burke.)

* Townlands; some are termed working villages.

If there were a house of industry established in this district, with the inducements of good food and clothing for every man and his family who would accept it, subject to the regulations of work and the separation of those of different age and sex, great numbers would go in. The man who can afford to keep five or six cows would, I think, be willing to take it.—(Mr. Burke.)——There are not many of my tenants who would accept such a provision; but I am satisfied that every year the number would become greater. I remember one respectable man who, in 1824, sold all his cattle, one after another, rather than take relief from the public funds; but he would take it now. If once they resort to such means for support they will ever afterwards be willing to do so.—(Captain O'Flaherty.)——How could the farmers afford to pay the tax that would be required for the maintenance of such an establishment when, for miserable weedy stoney ground, they are paying 3*l.* per acre, and it is not worth that to any man? But the birds must live on the mountains as well as on other lands.—(Gerraghty.)

I think that a parent, when sick or old, would receive more kindness from a son or daughter, than in a poorhouse; the people would be very kind to the old and delicate if they had it in their power, and the old would think it a hardship to be separated from their friends.—(R. M'Donogh.)——I think it would hurry them to death to be away from their friends when sick.—(M'Grath.)——I think one-half of the people would be glad to get their old relatives into a poorhouse, and it would be a good place for them.—(Clarke.)—— Not one would let them in if they could help it.—(R. M'Donogh.) of vagrants; the greater number of beggars are strangers; I would say there are about one-third more strange than resident beggars; on an average about three or four families call at my house every day; I believe that two of the four are idle village beggars, who make a trade of it; I cannot say this from actual knowledge, but they bear an idle character, and live by going from village to village."—(Kilkalday.)——"I have lived in this parish forty years; there is twice as much poverty among the labourers now as there was thirty years ago; there are one-half more common vagrants than there was ten years ago; I do not mean the years of scarcity when I say their numbers are increased, for of a scarce year you would see vagrants going about like bees."—(Campbell.)

"Pauperism is increased very much; I think it is increased ten to one for the last twenty years; the number of beggars is increasing every year, and every day that I see."—(Mara.) ——"Pauperism must increase, when a man who is not able to buy the hat he is to be married in must get a wife and children."—(Kilkalday.)——"I remember when there were only four houses on this town-land; the increased number of cabins is a sign of poverty, for when the small farmer is broken, and either obliged to give up the land or turned out of it, he goes into a village and builds a cabin, and tries by his labour to support his family."—(Mara.)

"I live on the road-side; in winter about five or six families call at my house every day; in summer about twenty call; half the number used not to call about ten years ago; more than one-fourth the number would not call twenty years ago; I attribute it to the increase of the population and the general increase of poverty; the increase of poverty is produced by rack rents and the low prices given for agricultural produce. The rents are as high now as they were during the French Revolution, when every thing was at its highest; in general land is higher now than it was then, if a late take; I know of no land that has been set for the last ten years, whether it was previously held under a lease or from year to year, that does not pay a higher rent than was paid by the former tenant; the increase of rent is not to be accounted for by any improvement in the quality of the land. This leaves the farmer unable to employ labourers in the cultivation of his land, and the tradesman in the improvement of his place, as he formerly did. I attribute the improvement in the appearance of the houses to the increased industry and cleanly habits of the people; this improvement in their habits cannot be attributed to any improvement in their circumstances, for they were much more comfortable twenty years ago than now; I attribute it to the people being more enlightened; twenty or thirty years ago the people were able to give their children an education, who, when they grew up, were more tasty and more cleanly; but I fear that as education has caused this, that here, where it has been so shamefully neglected (for they cannot afford to pay for their education, and there is no free school) the people will fall back into the same habits of slovenliness and dirt. I do not think cleanliness costs much, or leads any way into expense."—(Egan.)

"It is less expensive to be cleanly than otherwise; I would think it is rather profitable." (Kilkalday.)

"There is so very little expense in whitewashing the house, sweeping the floor, and making the manure heap in the rear instead of the front of the house, that poverty cannot be produced by cleanliness."—(Egan.)——"If the landlords stopped at home from St. James's-square, and gave employment to their tenantry, we would have very few, if any, vagrants."—(Monaghan.)——The poor of other counties come here, and our poor go there."—(Lowry.) ——"All the strolling beggars who frequent this place come from the counties of Mayo and Roscommon, and that part of Galway adjoining Mayo. Twenty years ago the flax or linen trade was very good, and enabled an industrious woman to pay the rent of her husband's farm, now there is nothing to be earned by the woman; the men must pay the rent by selling a part of the crop, which before they either used themselves or converted into other necessary comforts. I think the abolishing the 40*s.* freeholders was a great injury to the lower orders, for, as soon as their leases expired, the rent was raised, the landlord had no longer any interest in giving a lease or setting the land cheap."—(Monaghan.)

"I have never known any persons in this part of the country to plant potatoes and then leave home and support themselves during the time they required to grow by begging."—(Egan.)——"If a man is unemployed, his wife and family must beg; but otherwise they would not. The majority of those who beg are women and children; there are some old infirm men; but you will hardly ever see an able-bodied man begging."—(Kilkalday.)—— "The old farmers always transfer their holding to their children, and are generally, I might almost say always, supported by them. The Irish are too proud to turn their parents out to beg."—(Monaghan.)

"The male children of vagrants sometimes hire as servants with farmers, but they generally go into the army; the female children are generally taken in by the farmers or comfortable householders to take care of children, carry water, &c."—(Egan.)

"None adopt vagrancy from choice; there is a general antipathy to begging; as long as there is any prospect of a means of subsistence, they would not beg; they would submit to live, for a time, on one meal a day rather than beg. I have seen instances of it in this parish."—(Coghlan.)

"During the season of plenty, an able-bodied beggar would procure from three to four stones of potatoes, in the scarce season he would not get much more than one stone; a family would obtain nearly the same quantity".—(Egan.)——"None but the disabled receive any thing at the chapel door."—(O'Hara.)

"A beggar having a long family is not able to sell much; with the price of whatever they are able to sell, they purchase clothes; if they were not able to save something for clothes, they would perish."—(Campbell.)

"Some

"Some of them buy tobacco, soap, &c.; they never buy tea; farmers holding 20 acres of land do not mind tea; dissipated beggars, such as fair beggars, buy whiskey; if such characters got good clothes, they would sell them for whiskey."—(Egan.)——"I remember to have given a blanket to a man last spring, who some hours after he had it, sold it and got drunk; the really distressed have a sort of decent pride which makes them try to appear as clean as possible; there is more compassion felt towards a decent looking beggar than a filthy looking one, especially if known, otherwise I believe there generally is not."—(Kilkalday.)

"They never reserve any thing for summer; in winter they sometimes keep some days' provision, lest there might be snow or rain, which would prevent their going out."—(Campbell.)——"I think beggars would rather have provisions dear than cheap, that they might get a better price for what they would have to sell."—(Campbell.)

"There is a particular class of vagrants, who are in the habit of attending fairs and markets, and who, I believe, practise all manners of deception; an instance of this came under my observation last year. I was at a fair in Loughrea, and saw four men in different parts of the town, some having their legs bandaged and others their arms; they were repeating, or rather roaring, prayers, and asking alms from the passengers. Next day there was a fair at Eyrecourt, to which I was going, when, to my great astonishment, I saw the identical four men running on before me, without a bandage on either of them, and appearing as supple as they could wish to be; on asking them why they ran so, they said they were going to the fair of Eyrecourt, and were afraid of being late. A great many cannot get work, and are obliged to beg, but I believe many use that plea merely as an excuse."—(Kilkalday.)——"There are very few disabled children taken about here, as a means of exciting pity; there are some instances of it."—(Egan.)

"The fair beggars meet in the evenings to smoke and drink whiskey, other beggars do not; any outrages that have been committed in this part of the country, were, in my opinion, committed by strangers hired for the purpose. I do not think they were vagrants, this is the general opinion."—(Kilkalday.)—"Very few of the vagrants would go to America, the labourers would go willingly. Vagrants are as kind and as much attached to their children as other classes of the community."—(Egan.)——"When provisions are very scarce, a vagrant, if he had any more than he would require for the time, would divide with one whom he saw in immediate want."—(Monaghan.)——"In other parts of the county, where I had been stationed, I saw beggars divide their earnings with persons who seemed in present want, but it so happened, that during the three years I have been here, I never saw it."—(Coghlan.)

"I saw a beggar get some meat in a house in this village, at a festival time, and before he went out of the house, he gave part of it to another who came in, and was refused."—(Walsh.)

"The vagrant is much better off than the labourer. I have often known a labourer's dinner, dry potatoes, to be carried a mile to him where he was at work, and these cold potatoes he is often glad to get, trying to shelter himself from the rain by sitting at the side of a ditch; one of my labourers told me he was glad to have salt with his potatoes, and a drink of water after them, for he said, I can't afford to buy milk."—(Monaghan.)——"My family do not wish to give to any strangers; they find they have more, ten times more, than they can do to relieve those resident vagrants whom they know."—(Monaghan.)——"The poor never make any inquiry as to the person's character or place of residence, they give as well to the stranger as to the person living in the same village with them."—(Egan.)——"If it is a fault to be too generous, the poor are to blame, for they divide to the very last potato."—(Monaghan.)——"The poor know, from their own feelings, that nothing but dire necessity would cause any one to beg, and therefore they are inclined to give to all who ask from them."—(Coghlan.)

"The poor are the only persons who give lodging to vagrants."—(Monaghan.)——"They might lie by the ditches and die there, only they get lodgings from the poor."—(Campbell.)——"The food given by the poor is potatoes, they do not use anything else themselves."—(Egan.)

"There is no certain quantity set aside for the relief of vagrants; there is no limit; the quantity given one may be twice greater than that given another day; it depends, in a great measure, on the number who call."—(Mara.)——"A ten-acre man would, on an average, give a stone in the day."—(Coghlan.)——"I do not think there is one in fifty who gives so much."—(Kilkalday.)——"He would give about one stone a day when they are plenty, and half a stone when they are scarce; half a stone is of as much value when potatoes are scarce, as a stone is when they are plenty."—(Egan.)

"Not the lodging only, but also the feeding of the vagrants, falls chiefly on the small farmers and labourers, let them be ever so poor, if they have anything they will divide. I have known persons getting potatoes on credit at five-pence a stone, to give away to a comparatively considerable amount; this is by no means uncommon."—(Monaghan.)——"It is my firm belief, that there are many who, if they had not the second meal in the house, would give to another whom they conceived to be in more distress than themselves."—(Coghlan.)

"Men, from the labourer to the eight-acre men, give more, according to their means, than any other class."—(Egan.)——"The relief of beggars falls principally, if not entirely, on the farmers, I would say from the forty-acre farmer down to the labouring man; a forty-acre man is seldom known to let any go unrelieved from his door, he never gives them lodgings, they are generally lodged by labourers, and men from that class up to five-acre men."—(Coghlan.)

"The poor give more largely, not only in proportion to their means, but in point of extent. Some of the gentry have their gates closed against beggars, it may be more through fear of their spreading disease than anything else. There is one gentleman in this neighbourhood who never gives as much as a potato to a beggar; he is worth six hundred a year."—(Coghlan.)——"The rich are never pinched by hunger, and they do not feel for the distress of others."—(Killeen.)——"I think that of those who are in want, during the last month or six weeks of the summer-quarter, many have, during the former part of the year, given away what would have kept them from want."—(Kilkalday.)

THE general poverty of the country is much greater than it was twenty years ago. "I am disposed to attribute this, in the first place, to the rapid increase of population, and the consequent subdivision of land; in the next place, to the continuance of high rents, notwithstanding the fall in agricultural prices."

"This district has suffered much from the loss of the trade in kelp, formerly the most lucrative employment which the poor could obtain. It is a delusion to imagine that the reduction of price in clothing is any compensation for the fall in agricultural produce."—(Mr. Cunnis.)——"I cannot think that the difference of prices is alone sufficient to account for the difference in the amount of comfort which the people formerly enjoyed, compared with what they now possess. There was not, till within the last fifteen years, any market for grain in this district, and it could scarcely be said to exist in the country."—(Mr. D'Arcy.)——"But there were ten head of cattle then for one that there is in the parish now."—(Mr. Cunnis.)——"The extraordinary increase of population is attributed partly to the building of the town of Clifden, the entire of which has been erected within eighteen years; and partly to the operation of the subletting Act in other counties."—(Mr. D'Arcy.)——"I have only resided in the parish of Omagh about three years and a half, and I should say, that distress, as taken generally, was during that time nearly stationary. In the years 1831 and 1834 the people were in a state of starvation; and during the interval they were but recovering from it."—(Mr. Fitzmaurice.)——"Poverty, in the last fifteen years, has increased in the proportion of five to one."—(P. Browne.)——"I perceive a gradual increase of destitution in the last seven years."—(Mr. Jones.)——"Rents are better paid than they used to be, owing to the additional facilities afforded for the sale of a larger portion of agricultural produce."—(Mr. D'Arcy.)——"There is less danger of famine now than formerly, we were then blockaded for want of roads."

"The tenantry are improving, and are gradually bringing more of the land into cultivation. Very few of the people of Conamara are ever known to beg; even those who live in huts have always some small portion of land, from which they derive a subsistence."—(Mr. Martin.)

The poor who live in huts are called "Squatters," they are strangers, generally supposed to be tenants dispossessed of their holdings in other parts of the country, who are induced to flock towards the sea coast for the sake of the cheap food they can easily procure; they obtain, in most instances, a half or a quarter of an acre of land, on which they build a miserable hovel. They pay an enormous rent for this ground, sixpence* a perch, or fourth-sheaf. "None of these people, within my knowledge, are able to live any year without the assistance of the neighbours, who are most improvidently charitable. I administered relief to 300 families, who are of the above description, in the course of the present year."—(Mr. Fitzmaurice.)——"One great cause of distress in this neighbourhood was the delay in paying those who were employed in the public works. In several instances the engineers were obliged to wait until a Parliamentary grant should be made to pay for the work done."—(Mr. Martin.)——"Much misery was caused by the want of punctuality in these payments."

ments."—(Mr. D'Arcy.)——"There are very few of the natives of Conamara who beg; and I conceive that the noted generosity of the people was one cause of the increase of beggary in the district. When first I came into Conamara, 18 years ago, I could not get an egg or a pound of butter to buy; the people had plenty of both, and no one would take money from a poor man for food; it was a hospitable country then, indeed; but the crowd of strangers, settlers, and paupers who since that time have been coming in every year, have made it at last like other places; they have markets now, strangers made them wise."—(Kelly.)

"This was a very free and open country formerly, and ready to embrace strangers."—(White.)——"But the people are getting wiser, they have bought their wit."—(Corbat.)——"It was a boast, that there are no beggars in Conamara."—(Liddan.)——"They may well boast that there is no such class, for they are all beggars. There is plenty of ground, to be sure; but where the poor must attempt to make land of it you dare not venture to tread; a crow would not walk the bog. They might feed sheep on the hill,* if they had them, but the rest is good for nothing without sea-weed or lime. There is lime-stone in every town-land, but when the poor ought to be getting and burning it, they are looking for four-penny worth of work up and down the country; and there is not a hill that you could not knock three or four families out of."—(Flynn.)——"I do not think there are more than three or four persons in Clifden whose support is exclusively derived from begging."—(Mr. D'Arcy.)——"I should think there are fifteen and upwards."—(Mr. Fitzmaurice.)——"There are more than fifty persons, this day resident in Clifden, who are supported entirely by begging."†—(Corbat, Kelly, White, Mullin, Burke.)——"Those who live in the huts are generally obliged to beg every year, at the least every alternate year."—(Mr. Fitzmaurice.)——"Many of these poor people have been reduced to beggary by the non-payment, or delays in payment, of wages at the public works."—(Mr. D'Arcy.)——"Of strolling beggars the majority come from the county of Mayo. In the summer time I see a dozen strange faces at the door every day."—(Kelly.)——"Very few strangers beg here in winter."—(White.)——"But the number is visibly greater than it was two or even three years ago. The summer is the worst season, no doubt; but there is a time when you never see the face of a beggar; when they get any sort of work, and are paid for it."—(Corbat.)

"In the winter of 1822, in consequence of the abundance of government work, there was not a beggar to be seen; yet in the end they were worse off than ever, as some of them were not paid for years after, and many are lying out of their wages to this day."—(Kelly.)——"They want, and hope for nothing but employment; hundreds would think it good wages to be made sure of one good meal of potatoes every day."—(White.)——"They are unwilling to work except for money wages. There is much indolence, and an absence of a desire to improve their own condition by any exertion, to which some immediate remuneration is not annexed."

"I have frequently been obliged to drive their cattle to make them work. When they are at work, they work hard and well; but they might employ much of their idle time in improving their own land, particularly by making fences, and keeping them in repair."—(Mr. Martin.)——"The want of fences is an eternal source of litigation amongst the people."—(Mr. D'Arcy.)——"Let it be published to-morrow that there will be work given on those hills, and you will see 200 men, women and children turning out to go seven miles from their homes, to obtain the lowest wages that is offered to them; and if you said seven-pence, the roads would be filled with them (as they were more than once before) eager to be employed,—the men at whatever work might be given them, and the women and children at half the wages of the men, carrying baskets of sand and gravel, where horses could not draw."—(Kelly.)

"As long as they have anything to eat, the people will not beg."—(Burke.)——"Many may be seen passing, with their spades on their shoulders, begging."—(Kelly.)——"But they are often unable to purchase the implements of work; if the could procure them they would be willing to labour. A man, whose wife and family were begging at my door, was thankful to me for allowing him to work the price of a spade."—(Mullin.)——"Many leave the country seeking employment, and are forced to beg; and many who are sickly and weak come here in order to have the benefit of sea-bathing, who are miserably poor."—(Kelly.)——"We have not come to speak of the poor yet."—(Corbat.)

"The beggars are not the poor; many a man under a nominal rent of 4*l.* a year has not a shoe to his foot, nor a shirt to his back, nor has he had either for these four or five years. They must pay the rent, or the cow will go out from them; these are glaring facts; the proprietors of the land may deny them, but we can prove them. If you walked with me through the country, I could show you many a house where decency would not suffer you to look at the mother of the family for want of sufficient clothes."—(Joyce.)

"There are few who can afford to taste the milk of their own cow; they are obliged to bring it into the market to sell, that they may have something to pay the rent."—(White.)——"Many a man that would be ashamed to beg, must cut his beard with a scissors, he could not afford himself the use of a razor."—(Kelly.)——"I happened to see, not long ago, a decent farmer, of an adjacent parish, when he and his family were going to rest at night, when they had laid themselves down he shook some of the loose straw over them, put a coarse cloth over that, and then he himself crept in. And I know an honest respectable man, who has not actually begged yet, whose sons have but one coat amongst them, and when one goes from home, the others must remain within."—(Corbat.)——"Yet there are scarcely scarcely any who, from choice, adopt or continue beggary as a means of support. I would not say that there are not any such, for I know one family that are begging these seven years; I think the father looks like a lazy man, for he might as well work as carry four stone of potatoes on his back, as I frequently see him doing."—(White.)——"The mass of the people are industrious labourers and tradesmen; they are a proud kind of people too, but when poverty touches them they must beg."—(Mullin.)——"And when they once set about begging, the cunning ones divide themselves like the still-hunters."*—(White.)——I have, on some occasions, offered men work, and they declined, saying they were unable from sickness or infirmity; they were, perhaps, foxing.† Those that are bred up to it follow their trade by plumb and practice; but I should say, that in the course of my own experience instances of this kind are very rare.—(Corbat.)——"I am not sure that we can always tell how much a man need beg, and how much he prefers begging. A man lodged in my house for a fortnight, not very long ago, who supported himself altogether by alms-asking; I used to pay him at two-pence a stone for three stone of potatoes every day he remained in my house. It one day happened that I wanted a man to help me in making up turf, and I offered this man sixpence a day, but he said he had a pain in his back, and could not work; I told him that I thought to stand up straight and labour, would be better than stooping under a load of potatoes; I never offered him work again, and he did not ask it. He staid after that in my house two or three days, but I was not so warm towards him as I had been, and from this, I think, that there may be many who lay themselves out so long for the one way, that they cannot be brought to turn to the other; (this man was a stranger, who said he came from Headford.")—(White.)——"I know of no class who manifest any reluctance in giving to beggars; I think relieving the poor in their own houses a preferable mode of distributing charity, but we find it necessary to give in both ways."—(Mr. D'Arcy.)——"I have often known the children of beggars turn out industrious and respectable members of society."—(Corbat.)——"None, except the fair-beggars, disfigure themselves, either in dress or person, for the purpose of exciting pity."—(Kelly.)——"There are not many lame or blind persons who go about this neighbourhood begging."—(Mullin.)——"When the committee were giving out meal, the beggars used to lend and borrow each other's children, but at any other time they would not; they would have no gains by it, for a woman with three in family would get as much as if she had six."—(Mullin.)——"The fair beggars often meet together, but the others do not."—(Corbat.)——"The prayer-rhymers sometimes do."—(Kelly.)——"One of the fair men, who pretended to be blind, counted the money he got on one fair day in this town, it came to 10*s.*; besides this he got bread, and several other things, this he called a bad day. On an average, there are five of these fellows at each fair and pattrons; there are four fairs and three pattrons every year in Clifden. The fair beggars think it beneath them to steal, they are too well off to require it; nor do the other poor creatures ever do so."—(Corbat.)

"What they can sell is too little for their calls. Won't the creatures want a rag of clothes? Won't they want a shirt? and they smoke tobacco, and won't they want to buy a bit, when they would sooner, such of them as smoke, fast on one meal a day than do without it." "The registered beggars sometimes buy whiskey."—(Corbat.)——"You may often see the prayer-hawkers drunk."—(Mullin.)——"All the travelling dealers drink."—(Corbat.)——"A woman lodged with me who was going about as a kind of voteen.‡ She had a great many prayers, and used to go out every day swapping them; and every evening she brought me a stone of potatoes, for which I used to pay her 4*d.* One evening she had the potatoes, but I had not the money. I was sure of having it the next day, and I wanted the potatoes on trust; but she said she would give no trust. I then said, 'that though she was living on charity, she had not a spark of it herself, when she could see a family without having a meal to put into their mouths, and would not give them credit till morning; and as she was so cruel, she must not be in one house with me.' She immediately went out, sold the potatoes, bought a naggin of whiskey, and brought it into my workshop, and said, 'Arrah, poor man, I am afraid I vexed you a while ago; but I had a drop in, and only for that I would not take the potatoes from you. I am fond of it, and when I get the taste of it I can't do without it.' She wanted me to take the whiskey, but I would not, and I turned her out of the house. The next day I saw her at the chapel, saying prayers out loud,§ and I told the people she was only an impostor, so I never saw her since."—(White.)——"It is after they take a glass that the prayers come flowing from them."—(Burke.)——"I never knew a regular beggar's child to get married but one in a neighbouring parish. They generally get as much as a person can take in two hands. They often get nothing. They are refused oftener in winter than in summer. The people know when they are in want, and don't like then to refuse them. A man having only one stone of potatoes would give some to a person in distress." —(Mullin.)——" I often gave gave part of the last stone of potatoes I had, when I had not the price of another in my pocket. I don't say it by way of boasting."—(White.)—— " There are very few in Clifden who would not do the same. Some would give half a stone."—(Mullin.)——" I have eight in family, and not two stone of potatoes in my house, and I would divide them with a person in want, even if I had not a certainty of earning for a week. I was one week last summer, and I had only eight stone of potatoes in my house, when sixteen was my allowance. A poor woman called, and I gave her some. At the time I was not sure of even eight stone the next week."—(White.)——" White was at that time living on half allowance, and so was every tradesman, labourer and cottier in the parish."—(Corbat.)——" Vagrants are chiefly supported by the persons who pay from 2 l. to 5 l. a year rent. VAGRANCY is more common in the summer and autumnal months, because food then is scarce, and the males leave home in search of employment elsewhere, these being hurried seasons in England and Scotland. There are both resident and wandering mendicants. They are chiefly healthy, but of a very squalid appearance. I have never found persons who, during the week, were earning a sufficiency for support, begging on Sundays. When the husband or the father of a family goes over sea, or to a country district for work, first having sowed his land, perhaps half a rood, the wife and children lock up the cabin and turn vagrants. Those who go to England for work, generally take oaten bread with them and a little money, and sometimes endeavour by begging to procure their passage free. In summer and autumn the vagrants come chiefly from the country.

At the season for digging out the potato crop the vagrants are well supplied, and get more each day than they can consume. I am inclined to believe that many get, even in the other seasons, more than is sufficient to maintain them, for I have known beggars to sell potatoes for money, and heard of their bartering them for tobacco. I cannot say what quantity they receive from coach and car passengers, but there is sufficient given to induce a number of them to surround carriages at every town.

The alms of the lower orders and shopkeepers of the roman catholics are exchanged for prayers for the dead or the living, and the increase may be in proportion. There are not many able-bodied men beggars. I am inclined to think that the helplessness of a mother and children has a greater effect on feeling and sympathy than even disease.

I have known beggars to hoard for their burial, or through love of money, but the instances are rare. I do not think they hoard for the purpose of dissipation, although many are very dissipated.

There are some able-bodied beggars, who ask under the plea of having unsuccessfully sought for work; there are not many instances of this. I am sure that filth is suffered to accumulate in order to impress, but I do not know of any instances of beggars feigning infirmity. I never knew of persons having sores refusing to have them cured. Blind, deaf or otherwise afflicted children are certainly led about for the purpose of exciting sympathy, and in many instances, I fear, to the aggravation of the disease; but I am not sure that the parents, in this exposition of their offspring, discern in the act any moral turpitude.

The habits of vagrants are generally supposed to be dissolute. I have never known them to be concerned in outrages, either on person or on property. I could not form a just opinion as to whether a vagrant would be inclined to emigrate or not, as I never knew an instance in which a vagrant had the option. I do not think that any vagrants go to either England or Scotland for work, for there are not many confirmed male vagrants who are not either unhealthy or too young to be employed at the work in which emigrating labourers generally are engaged. I have often heard of vagrants borrowing or hiring children, that by the number of their supposed family they might excite compassion, and thereby procure a greater proportion of relief; but as I never knew an instance of it, I do not assert it as a fact. Generally speaking, vagrants have larger families than other classes of the community.

The instances in which the character of the vagrants is known by the person affording relief are comparatively few; in consequence of alms being given by the lower orders, roman catholics, in lieu of prayers, the character is never inquired into. I do not think that private charity is prejudicial to the morals of the persons relieved, for I cannot suppose that the exercise of the first christian duty can tend to deprave those upon whom it is exercised. My opinion is, that charity, in its legitimate sense, must soften the heart and improve the disposition of those upon whom it is conferred. My firm opinion is, that if there was a sufficiency of employment you would never see an able-bodied healthy man begging. I am sure that none adopt begging as a means of support from choice; they would much prefer being supported by the produce of their industry.

Vagrants often are relieved by a night's lodging being given; clothes are not frequently given to them; but I have known instances where clothes have been given, especially to vagrant mothers in their lying in, and to children. The alms given by the poor chiefly consist of oatmeal and potatoes, and sometimes milk. The farmers always prefer it to giving money, because the quantity given to each individual does not amount to the lowest current coin; besides it is the common mode.

All applicants at the cabin-door do not receive alms, and those who give are more guided by caprice than any other motive; provided alms are given, the objects are little considered. There are not many vagrants wholly supported by individual families, but many instances of poor housekeepers being thus supported by the upper ranks. I do not think that any of the shopkeepers give as much away in alms as would pay an additional workman's wages; none of the farmers give sixpence a day, or any thing like it. I have heard that the practice of giving weekly allowances is obtaining much among the shopkeepers, but not extensively. I do not think the farmers are in the habit of sowing plots of potatoes for the exclusive purpose of the produce being given in alms.

The relief of vagrants does not fall exclusively on any one class; the generality of housekeepers give, whatever class they belong to; the farmers and shopkeepers encourage vagrant beggars more than the upper orders, who feel it a duty in some sort to discriminate. I do not think the relief afforded by the farmers and working classes is as valuable in proportion as that of the upper orders. The man holding but half an acre of land would give, and does give, alms, unless he is a beggar himself.

I am sure that, from the impossibility of knowing how much a vagrant has already got, some get more than might be intended, yet not more than they require. It can hardly lead to waste, unless the mendicant be dissolute, in which case the whole quantity obtained might be counted waste.

On an average, the quantity given by a ten-acre man, between meal, potatoes, milk, money, &c., might be estimated at two-pence per day. A shopkeeper's alms might be estimated at 2½*d.* per day, but there are various circumstances which must be considered as affecting the givers here alluded to: for instance, the number of children, bad or good year of profit, &c. I never knew an instance of a labourer rendering himself a fit object for beggary by his generosity in relieving the distressed. "The liberal soul shall be made fat." (Proverbs, xi. 25.) I think the farmers and shopkeepers would rather dole out day by day than give a regular annual sum; and besides, by giving in the latter way, they would not procure assistance for their own or their relatives' souls from the prayers of those relieved as they (vainly think they) now do—that they can purchase it.

A fear that the applicant is suffering from want is not the motive which produces the giving alms; instances of extremity rarely appear at the farmer's door. Begging is a trade and charity is a duty; custom induces many to give. Relief may be extorted in towns by importunity, but it does not occur in the country among the farmers. I do not know how far the certainty of not being in want might operate to restrain the hand of the giver, but I feel confident that there is no inquiry and very little discrimination in the giving of alms. A fear of violence in case of refusal never causes alms to be given, for the instances of able-bodied men beggars, eo nomine, are not frequent; many give through fear of the beggar's curse, which is supposed to be of very malignant influence.

The system of giving night's lodging is often the means of spreading disease. In troubled times, beggars, or persons disguised as such, have been made the channels of intelligence for evil purposes.

Women and children, who are periodically vagrants while the husband and father is a spalpeen elsewhere, return to industry when he comes home.

There cannot be, and ought not to be, any vigorous laws to repress vagrancy until there is employment for the whole surplus population; then the law should be rigorous. The givers of alms would not be willing, under the present circumstances, to have such a law enforced. After what has happened in Ireland, it cannot be desirable that rigorous and severe measures should be resorted to where crime has not been committed. I am sure the farmers would not advocate poor laws if it were to add any thing to their annual payments, either in the way of rent or tax.

be considered as applicable to the general condition of the poor of the west of Ireland, unless where reference to peculiar cases may be specified.

The number of vagrants is variable, depending on the plenty or scarcity of provisions: it was much increased during the severe summers of 1822 and 1831.

Small cottiers are those who most frequently become vagrants, and principally towards the approach of summer, when the little stock of provisions that remained after the payment of exorbitant rents is consumed. There are more vagrants of the female class. Able-bodied men are sometimes among the number of those who beg; this is a proof that they cannot get employment, since they are generally ashamed to ask alms. I cannot ascertain the proportion that go about in families, or singly: it is certain, however, that many, from a sense of shame attached to begging, endure the severest privations; nay, fast whole days rather than resort to the expedient of mendicancy. It seldom happens that where small farmers have, at an advanced age, transferred their property to their children, they are themselves compelled to adopt a vagrant mode of life during the rest of their days; it only occurs in instances in which unnatural children treat their parents with neglect. The labourers who go to England for work do not beg their way, unless when, as has sometimes happened, they are driven home from England without having been able to procure employment.

Begging is not a professional business which any, the most wretched, would be anxious to receive, or to transmit as an inheritance. There are few would not, in my opinion, prefer labour the least remunerative to such a precarious and humiliating system; the best beggars can save little after the most successful day's labour. The amount given on Sundays to mendicants at the doors of places of religious worship is inconsiderable; some few may receive a few pence on such occasions. When a family apply for relief, the quantity given is increased in proportion rather to what may be deemed necessary than to their number. Were the most numerous group of strolling beggars already sufficiently supplied, they should experience, for that day, no extraordinary sympathy, otherwise a numerous family would be sure of a larger measure of charity.

Beggars sometimes obtain more food than they require for their own consumption, the surplus generally consists of potatoes, which they would gladly exchange for a little meal or milk; with the exception of some few notorious and importunate beggars that may be found in every town, those who are supported by mendicancy can seldom reach any other luxuries. Itinerant beggars are seldom supposed to save a part of their earnings in summer on which to support themselves in winter. A few deceits may be practised with a view to excite sympathy; but they are the exceptions. The poor seldom affect in their dress a greater degree of wretchedness than is really their lot; and rags are, in forty cases to one, a raiment of necessity rather than of choice. Perhaps one in a hundred induce or continue external diseases for the purpose of exciting compassion; but there is now too much real distress for people to suffer themselves to be imposed upon by the cheats of impostors.

(In reply to the question "Whether the exhibition of maimed and diseased persons in the highways is frequently the cause of great pain and injury to women who are enceinte?")

Without the remotest intention of reflecting on the motives of the individuals who have prepared some of the interrogatories, and who, I am sure are actuated by the most benevolent intentions, I cannot but feel they have been originally suggested by hard-hearted enemies, who caricatured our national misery in order to find in the exaggerated faults of its victims an apology for neglecting it.

Again I must beg of the Commissioners distinctly to understand that to them I attach no portion of the above censure: it is intended for the habitual slanderers of the poor, whose conversation, as the Apostle says, "creepeth like a cancer," and infects even those who may be unconscious of its tainting influence.

As respects the habits of those who live by begging, with the dangers incident to such a state, and the want of the ordinary protections of virtue, the morality of that class may be considered a prodigy. There are instances of bad and dissolute characters among them; but the wonder is, that with such neglected habits, there are not more: they have however been seldom found guilty of such enormous crimes as assassination: some of them have been found to be very efficient organs in directing revenue officers to places where smuggling is carried on.

Few deaths result from immediate starvation, since the most wretched would share their last morsel sooner than see a fellow-creature starve.

Yet it can be safely asserted (and it is a melancholy truth) that a vast proportion of the population are cut off before their time, in consequence of the decay and exhaustation proceeding from inadequate nourishment; for within the last 30 years there is an evident abridgment of human life, and a perceptible degeneracy in the human form, owing to bad diet, and a too early requisition of labour before the frame is sufficiently strong to sustain it. Whatever may be our political advancement, the condition of the numerous peasantry is unquestionably getting worse.

When an able-bodied man can obtain labour, the lowest wages would be more productive than begging. Yet in many places 1 d. got by begging would be more profitable, since no work or wages are to be had.

(In reply to the question, "Whether the prevalence of private charity is found in practice to be prejudicial to the morals of the labouring classes?")

It is hard to imagine that charity could be, whether public or private, prejudicial to the morals of any class. As the charity of the Irish is generally governed by the feeling of St. Paul, "thinking no evil," they give alms to vagrants of whose characters they are wholly ignorant. Clothing is not usually given away in charity: the poor who support the poor have none to spare.

The farmers prefer giving food to money, because the one is at hand when they frequently have not the other.

The relief given to beggars has no reference to the number of applicants. There is a general feeling, founded on the ancient practice of christianity, that the people would not wish to see any applicant for alms go empty.

(Whether any of the farmers or shopkeepers give as much away in alms as would maintain an additional workman?)

It never enters into their heads, and I trust such people will never entertain the question.

As far as I know, there is no such practice as that of small farmers planting small portions of ground, intending the crops for distribution in alms, since the generality of farmers, I might say all, suppose that every part of their tillage is to be tributary to the calls of charity.

The relief of beggars falls especially on the humbler classes. The poorer give in larger proportions than the wealthier portions of the community: so that "dearka d'on dearka," (i. e. alms from alms) has passed into a proverb, the practical meaning of which is every day attested by the fact, that it is by the poor the poor are supported. As I may not have sufficient leisure to answer all the interrogatories, and without meaning any disrespect, as I deem several of them unimportant as to any practical result; I must observe, with regard to the 82d interrogatory, "Whether the relief of beggars falls particularly on any class?" That it is well deserving the consideration of the legislators for Ireland. Not only does the support of the poor fall upon the poor, but a more unfeeling class than the higher order of gentry, who are generally absentees, never existed in any country.

For the poor they have no sympathy; they squander money to corrupt them, but none to improve their condition; and it is singular that I know instances where hundreds of pounds were given to make unfortunate individuals perjure themselves, where a penny would not be given to rescue them from starvation. A farmer holding ten acres of land gives away much to the poor; but I should rather, and it would be better for society that the amount should not be rigorously calculated. The peasantry are under the impression (a salutary one) "that he that giveth to the poor shall not want; but that he who despiseth his entreaty shall suffer indigence." (Proverbs, xxviii. 27.)

(On the motives of those who give alms, whether from custom or fashion, or to avoid importunity?)

The various methods here alluded to are too refined for the simple notions of the Irish peasantry. As far as I know them (and I know them pretty well), they are influenced in their charities by the rewards and punishments which Christ assures us shall be the respective portions of those who gave him or did not give him to eat when he was hungry, &c.

Houses of industry and mendicity institutions are things almost unknown in this province. It is, therefore, no wonder if the people should never be influenced in their charities by considerations of which they are ignorant; such as that of religious feelings inducing an individual to give to an applicant who he was aware could obtain relief by applying to a public institution, &c. &c.

Diseases are seldom spread through the country by the system of giving nights' lodgings to vagrants. It would, however, be a great improvement if the causes of vagrancy were removed, by bettering the condition of the peasantry. In general their character is exceedingly harmless. Those who have been obliged to live for a time by begging, generally return to industry as soon as the cause which drove them to vagrancy is removed. Many are forced by unfavourable or dear seasons to beg for a few weeks, who never after resort to the practice.

I have known many to fast on one meal a day; nay, some days without any, rather than be guilty of the least outrage or trespass on property.

(If there were houses of industry established, in which the food and lodging would be only equal to that usually possessed by the labouring population, would those who beg avail themselves of such an institution?)

Some would, and others would not. In this country there is scarcely the opportunity of making the experiment.

Persons who attended the Examination.

Mr. WILLIAM BIRMINGHAM, woollen-draper.—Rev. Dr. BURKE, roman-catholic rector of this parish, and dean of Dunmore.—GEORGE CLENDENNING, esq., magistrate.—Mr. COLLINS, a gentleman connected with the press.—RICHARD GIBBONS, small farmer of 12 acres.—Mr. LARGE, clerk of petty sessions, and churchwarden.—MATTHEW M'DONNELL, esq., magistrate.—ROBERT W. M'ILVEA, esq., magistrate.—WILLIAM M'MILER, small farmer of 12 acres.—EDWARD M'NALLY, weaver.—JOHN REEGAN, labourer.—THOMAS REILLY, labourer.—Mr. GEORGE WOODS, general merchant.—Mr. JOHN WYNNE, general merchant.

MR. LARGE thinks there are about 70 persons residing in the town who beg publicly throughout the year; besides about 30 persons who derive their support privately from the richer classes. M'Nally would say 80. Reilly says, that including the outskirts, there must be above 100, though, in what is strictly called the town, there may not be above the number mentioned by M'Nally. Mr. Wynne says, "in the middle of winter, when none but residents are applying for relief, I have counted at my own shop door, in one day, about 100 persons, not including very young children." Beggars residing within a short distance frequent the town on certain days, when the shopkeepers distribute alms. Rev. Mr. Burke thinks, that in the town, and within half a mile of it, there are, including children, 200 persons who live throughout the year by begging; and in the town and parish 400 at the very least; few strangers beg here in winter.

The parish is so extensive that the other witnesses cannot undertake to state the probable number of beggars throughout it; but some idea may be formed from M'Nally's statement; he says, "I cannot speak of the whole parish, but will speak of my own neighbourhood that I am acquainted with. I live about a mile and a half from the town, in the most populous of the country parts of the parish, and think that within one mile round of me* there are from 50 to 60 families who beg through the year, having no house of their own, but going from house to house for their night's lodging, some carrying their blanket with them, and many not having a blanket to carry; there are on an average three or four persons in each family. There are several able-bodied men among them, who would work if they had work to get; they go among the neighbours while the women and children beg publicly. They have often visited my house, and when I said it was a shame for able men to be begging, they have asked me, Have you work for us, or where is there work to be had? and not left me a word to say. I know these men to work occasionally, and I believe them to be very willing to work. Within the same space I think there are from 25 to 30 families who beg during from one month to three months of the year; these are persons that have a cabin and a small spot of ground: in many cases the cabin built for them, and a few perches of ground given them gratis by the neighbours; the ground sometimes is attached to their cabin, just sufficient to grow them a few hundreds of cabbage plants, and a few weeks' consumption of potatoes, and they are never disturbed in the possession of it. Sometimes a place is given them in a field to grow their potatoes from their own manure, leaving the owner the benefit to be derived to the succeeding crop. They work when they can find employment, and the families beg on all occasions when work fails them."

Rev. Mr. Burke and Mr. Wynne, from their general knowledge of the country, confirm this statement of M'Nally.

Mr. Burke is of opinion that vagrancy has advanced progressively for the last ten years, but with increased rapidity during the last five. He attributes to the increase the great fall that has taken place in the prices of corn, while rents remain undiminished, the decline of the linen trade, and increased local taxation. Mr. Large says, "no buildings or improvements of any sort are going on in the town. The linen trade is gone, the weavers are obliged to become labourers, and every other trade is sinking in the general decline." M'Nally says, "The number of beggars has doubled within the last six years. The decline of the linen trade has injured every class that lived by their industry. I have known the farmer six years ago pay a rent of 5*l.* out of half a rood of flax that his family prepared for the market; he thought little of the rent, when the industry of his family employed on the flax, could pay it, exclusive of the corn, and many persons were injured by that decline that did not see what injured them. I am a weaver myself, and when my trade was good, I bought from the shoemaker and the tailor for myself and family, what I cannot afford to buy now." Mr. Clendenning believes that vagrancy has increased within late years: he says, "I attribute it partly to the great famines that have prevailed in this country, which have utterly ruined some, and initiated others into habits of vagrancy, from which they have not since been reclaimed. There is also a local cause, applying particularly to the town of Westport, the failure of several corn merchants, and consequent decrease of employment. Excessive drunkenness, facilitated by illicit distillation, has also contributed. This does not prevail so much among the labourers as among the mechanics, who misspend both their money and time in drinking." Mr. Clendenning does believe that rents have not diminished proportionably to the diminished value of produce, but does not think that this has contributed much to the increase of vagrancy.

Mr. Wynne says, "The number of beggars in summer is considerably increased from their number in winter. The wives and children of labourers beg in this season who beg in no other;

other; the labourers sometimes working occasionally at home, oftener having gone in search of work to Leinster, Scotland or England. Many strangers also come here to take advantage of the salt-water, and increase the number at that season." M'Nally says, "provisions are dear and employment scarce in that season. I know myself 20 or 30 families to beg at home in summer who do not beg in winter. There are other families who at that season go out to beg in Leinster, or other parts of the country, as they find them more or less plentiful; the men commonly leave this place to seek work, leaving their families to beg at home, and go a long distance, and through great hardships for very little gains. A neighbour of mine went to Leinster this season; he bought a pair of shoes before he left home, and he came home without a penny, and had been forced to sell the shoes to make his way back. Another went to look for work in England; he had bad success, and was obliged to sell some of his clothes before he returned, and he declared to me, he lived on five meals while he walked down from Dublin (128 Irish miles), and he looked it, for he was a mere skeleton; he was neither a spendthrift nor a drunkard, nor was he fit to beg poor fellow, he was too bashful, and I believe he would rather bear the hunger than the shame of begging."

Mr. Large says, "The wives and families of labourers occasionally employed in the town commonly beg; a workman could not give food to a large family in summer, on occasional employment at 8*d.* a day, the ordinary wages here." Reilly and Moore can mention, by name, several labourers in the town whose families they say "do, and must beg." Mr. M'Ilrea says, "A very large proportion of the beggars consists of widows and orphans, but there is also a large number of the wives and children of labourers reduced to beg by want of employment for the labourers; several able-bodied men go about seeking relief, who, I am sure, would gladly accept of employment if it were offered to them." M'Nally says, "able-bodied men carrying spades on their shoulders, in some cases having their wives and families along with them, commonly apply for relief at my door in summer; perhaps three or four, perhaps one in the week. I have sometimes employed them when I could not myself spare time from my room, and they always worked for me 1*d.* under the current wages, and would I am sure have worked for less, if I asked them, but I would think it a sin to take an advantage of their want; they seem very anxious to be employed, having often offered to work for me for 18*d.* and 20*d.* a week with their food, and in some cases for their food merely." Mr. Large says, "Last summer I have met at least 20 able-bodied men who applied to me for relief, and I have no doubt would have gladly worked at reduced wages." Mr. Wynne says, "I have had from two to six such applicants every week during the past summer; one of them, a mower, applying to me, I told him I would give him work, as I had a meadow to cut down; he immediately went to work without asking me a question about wages."

The witnesses are all convinced there is no deception practised by the able-bodied men, who go about seeking relief on the plea that they are unable to find employment. The witnesses agree, that stating it as their opinion that no persons take to begging in preference to industry. The greatest exertions are made among the labouring classes to avoid it, but Mr. Clendenning thinks, that when once they lose caste by having begged, they make little exertion to regain it. M'Nally mentions an instance of a family driven to beg, as illustrative of the general unwillingness to resort to that mode of life; he says, "when provisions came short with them, the children used to come to my house at meal time, looking for something to eat, but not asking for it. The father and mother were ashamed to make any application, though I know they were living at home in great want. The children told me that they had lived for two days on a single meal of potatoes, this they suffered rather than beg; at length the mother and five children turned out and went to a strange place to beg, the father remained at home."

The labourers are of opinion that the town labourer is more liable to be reduced with his family to beggary than the country labourer. In the country the labourers generally have a small portion of land, which supplies them with a few months' consumption of potatoes, and supports them when out of employment. In town the labourers have no such provision, and when work fails them they fall on the public immediately. They have not even the same facility of keeping a pig; for if the pig runs out on the street of the town, it is instantly seized by the police, and the owner fined.

Mr. M'Ilrea and Mr. Clendenning are of opinion, that mechanics, from their dissipated habits, are more commonly reduced to make private applications for assistance than labourers, but are not so commonly reduced to beg; they are, they think, more reluctant to beg, and they can more easily find friends or persons of their own trade to relieve their occasional distress.

The witnesses do not think that labourers generally beg on their way to England in search of work, but it sometimes occurs. Moore says, "I have known them to leave home with no more than the 5*s.* to pay their passage; of course they begged their way up to Dublin, and as I have known persons to come home without a halfpenny, I must suppose they begged their way home." The witnesses believe it happens oftener than it comes under their observation, as the labourer who begs his way is anxious to conceal it. Mr. Large says, "In town though the whole family be begging, the members of it generally apply separately. In the country, I believe, they mostly travel together." M'Nally says, "Sometimes they separate, sometimes they go all together whatever way they think they will get most, and they have different ideas about it."

The same witness adds, "In the country beggars are most commonly relieved with potatoes; meal is not commonly given; the poor people have not it. Cabbage is given; milk, but not much of it; on the sea-coast fish, sometimes turf to take to their lodgings in town, and the more comfortable farmers would give them straw for a bed. They sometimes collect flax, which when they have gathered a sufficient quantity they sometimes sell in its raw state, sometimes manufacture into yarn; but this is rare, we never give them money in the country; it is not convenient, it is seldom passing through our hands." Mr. Collins says, "In the town they are relieved with potatoes, with meal, broth and broken meat at meal times at the shop-keepers and gentlemen's houses. It is a practice among the shop-keepers to relieve them regularly every Monday, when they give them, sometimes, some of whatever necessaries their shop supplies, as soap, tobacco, and bread at a baker's, &c.; sometimes halfpence, which they prefer to provisions, as they get these latter in the country, and the money enables them to procure some small necessaries, as soap, &c. as they require them; I do not think that they obtain sufficient to enable them, in many instances, to purchase an article of clothing." The other witnesses do not know that they are ever charged for lodging either in town or country; they carry their bed-clothes, which are always very scanty, perhaps a single blanket or a sheet for a whole family, about with them, and beg a bed of straw; they are generally admitted with welcome into any poor man's house, and stop sometimes a single night, sometimes a week or longer. In one place, Mr. M'Miler says, "I know persons that would be glad to have beggars in their house every night in the year, they conceive they carry a blessing along with them." But M'Nally says, "They have often told me that in town if they had a few halfpence to pay for it, they would get better lodging than if they got it for nothing; I suppose the difference would be of a drier house or a better fire; I know in the country where they never pay they take care to go to the house where they see a good stack of turf standing outside." Mr. Collins says, "In town an old article of clothing is now and then given to them, and there is a Dorcas Society which gives clothing to the poor at half price, but I do not think the beggars can derive much advantage from this charity; their clothing is wretched in the extreme, never sufficient to protect them against the inclemencies of the weather, to which they are constantly and necessarily exposed; they are obliged to take their children about with them half naked in the most severe weather: many of them while they lodge to-night in one house, which they quit to seek a lodging for to-morrow night in another, having no place to leave their children, can make no choice, but must take them out, regardless of the weather. Those who have more permanent lodgings, or a hut of their own, may have no food to leave them; and between the choice of taking them out without clothes, or leaving them in the house without food, generally adopt the former alternative, and expose them to the most inclement weather.

M'Nally says, "Able-bodied men, though commonly reduced to subsist on the beggary of their families, are scarcely ever seen to beg publicly themselves; they make private application for help; that we do not call begging. The only time they carry a bag, and that not in the common way, is, when we are digging the potatoes: they then go from field to field collecting potatoes, applying to us at the ridge, when we are digging them. An able-bodied man, well able to carry them, would collect for ten days or a fortnight of that season, five or six stone a day. People are very liberal when they are digging, and would give to a man though they saw his bag full, as they know he is making a little store to keep the family in, of a hard day in winter. If an able-bodied man persist in begging, he might gather, as the season advances, two stone to a stone in the day; and in summer half a stone. But the general rule is, that men would rather take the lowest wages you would offer them for working, than be under the shame of making so many applications to people's charity. A woman with a family would collect much more than a single man. Numbers would give to her that would let him pass by, when we are digging the potatoes. A woman with a family, would collect more than she and her children, if weak, could well carry: but this lasts a short time when potatoes are plenty. She can sell some, just enough to purchase her a little tobacco, or some milk, herrings or salt, to eat with what she reserves. She can never sell in summer." All the witnesses agree that beggars are commonly able to sell potatoes in the potato harvest, (October and beginning of November); that after the digging of potatoes has ceased, the practice is constantly diminishing until Christmas or the middle of January, by which time it has altogether ceased; from that time forward it may be stated generally, that they have no surplus over their consumption. And in summer their collection is frequently insufficient for food for their family. A woman with a large family obtains more than a woman with a small family; she obtains relief from more persons, and more from each individual. Yet the witnesses do not think that the whole day's collection is increased in proportion to the family.

Some beggars make application to passengers by coaches, and to the congregations on Sundays, as they pass to and from the several places of worship; the relief obtained is halfpence, and very inconsiderable. M'Nally has known three instances of beggars and single old men hoarding—two of them five pounds and six pounds, and the third ten pounds; he says this man lent his ten pounds to a neighbour, and never recovered it; he told me the story, and I reasoned with him that it was a great sin to distress himself as he did to hoard that money; he admitted that it was, and said he had often pinched himself sore to do it; and I am sure he must often have denied himself food for the sake of it. The other witnesses have heard of such cases, but not known them; they are very uncommon.

M'Nally does not believe that there is greater mortality among beggars than among labourers. "I think," he says, "they are inured to the hardships they undergo; they do undergo greater hardships than the labourers in my neighbourhood, who all hold a bit of land." The other witnesses, whose experience applies more particularly to the town, do not concur concur in this opinion.* Reilly says, the beggars from door to door get broth and meat, that the labourers family seldom or never taste; the labourer, unless he is fed by his employer, very commonly works on dry potatoes. The beggar can have better food than that, and be idle, and as to the summer, when both beggar and labourer are scarce even of potatoes, the labourer, until he and his family turn out to beg, is the scarcer of the two. Mr. Clendenning, Mr. M'Ilrea, Mr. M'Donnell, and the other witnesses, are convinced, from the same considerations, that beggars are generally better fed than the labourer and their families.

The witnesses agree that the relief of beggars falls principally on the middle classes, shopkeepers, small farmers, and even labourers, the very wealthy classes being comparatively exempt; they have freer access to the former classes; their doors being always open. Reilly says, " The very poor are more ready to feel for, and to help them according to their means, than any other class, as they are never sure but it may be their own case soon." Mr. Collins says, " The wealthier country gentlemen are peculiarly exempt, being surrounded by walls and gates." M'Miler says, " the poorer classes give more to the beggar, in proportion to their means, than any others. The poor farmer often relieves the beggar that has been turned away from the rich man's door; but some of the richer class give to the distressed persons who do not actually beg, what, it is impossible for any but themselves to estimate." Reilly says, " the labourer will share the meal he is sitting down to with the beggar, or give him part of his last stone of potatoes; it is true the beggar may be more certain of his next meal than one of ourselves, yet we would think it a sin to refuse him; even beggars are known to relieve one another. M'Miler has frequently seen them do so. He says they wish to have the benefit of almsgiving, and believe the benefit is manifold to them of what it is to other almsgivers." Reilly says, " in my own house, a beggar selling me a stone of potatoes, has relieved a woman that came in to ask for alms, and said she had got nothing during the day." Mr. George Wood and Mr. Benningham, shopkeepers, having consulted together, agree that there are about 40 shopkeepers in the town who give to beggars, either in money or value, two shillings and sixpence a week on an average; some giving less, and others, who are charitably disposed, considerably more; and that there are 60 others who give from one shilling down to three-pence a week. The other witnesses consider this a fair estimate.

M'Miler thinks, that on an average of the whole year, a farmer holding 10 acres of land gives one stone of potatoes each day in alms. Richard Gibbons holds 12 acres of land, and has no other means of industry: he says, " I am sure a stone of potatoes in the day does not save me on an average of the whole year." M'Nally is a weaver by trade; he is often unemployed, but may earn, on an average of the whole year, 3*s.* a week; he holds half an acre of land; he says, " when I have my own potatoes grown on my own land, between November and May, I cannot give less than three to four stone a week. After May I am generally buying, and may give, during the rest of the year, one stone or one stone and a half: the value of potatoes averages 2*d.* per stone for the winter half-year, and 3½*d.* for the summer half; it is true that the value of these potatoes, if they were brought altogether to market, would be a considerable sum to a poor man; but when we are giving a handful now and a handful again, we neither feel nor consider the loss, we only think of the blessing of feeding the hungry. I think a farmer holding ten acres, if at all liberal, would give twice, and many three times as much as I do." Mr. M'Ilrea says, " M'Nally's statement of what he himself gives to beggars at first surprised me, when I considered it in the bulk, and for so poor a man; but when I recollect how I have seen beggars relieved in very poor men's houses, and attempt to calculate the several handsful of potatoes given them, I must agree in his account." Reilly says, " it is quite common among mere labourers to relieve beggars in winter, and be themselves in great want in summer. I was reduced to great distress last summer myself; I begged, and, if it be the will of God, may expect to be so next summer too; yet when a beggar asks for God's sake, I cannot hold back part of what I have. I know that the poorest man amongst us when he has it in his hands will not refuse, and I would therefore say, he gives something in summer too; but if there be any charity in him, he must give at least one stone a week in winter." M'Nally says, " no attempt is made before relief is given to ascertain what a beggar has previously collected, but some idea may be formed from the size of his bag; if I considered he had enough in it for himself and family for the day, I would give him no more. I have seen a beggar return to his lodgings to empty his bag, and go out again to beg; but it did not occur to me whether the motive was to lighten his burthen or to put on the appearance of having gathered little, and by that means make sure of gathering more. The givers of relief do not limit themselves to any fixed daily quantity." M'Nally says, " we give as we see they want it, as we can afford it. It is very distressing to those who live on a thoroughfare, that they cannot give to all, and yet they are delicate to refuse any."

No

* From what M'Nally has stated of his neighbourhood, it must be difficult to draw a distinction and institute a comparison between the beggar and the labourer, for, as he has already stated, there are labourers or persons willing to labour, holding a patch of ground, whose families beg on all occasions, on which their provisions run short, and this occurs so frequently that M'Nally has already counted them among beggars. There are others who hold a larger portion of land, and whose families beg only in summer; others holding more land and cheaper are still labourers, and work for hire, but are never reduced to beggary; among the two former classes it is hard to distinguish, for the purpose of comparison, where the beggar begins and the labourer ends.

No inquiry is made into the character of the person soliciting relief. Mr. Large says, "in the town we are acquainted with the character of some, but could not possibly be acquainted with that of all who solicit alms. Alms are constantly given by persons wholly unacquainted with the character of the applicant." M'Nally says, "in the country persons generally know all about the beggars that are resident, I myself know a great deal of most of them, even of those who live in town, for when I come in I hear them spoken of among persons of my own class, and I believe if there were any great misconduct among them I would certainly hear of it; if we heard of such it would certainly make us much less inclined to relieve them."

Mr. Clendenning, Mr. M'Ilrea, Mr. M'Donnell, magistrates, do not think that immorality is more common among beggars than among the classes immediately above them; they do not recollect a single instance of a beggar brought before them at petty sessions charged with an offence; they may be guilty of some pilfering not worth prosecuting, but they (the magistrates) believe, that, considering their destitution, and the temptation to which they are consequently liable, there is actually less of immorality among them than among any other class. Mr. Clendenning says, "the influence of religion as inculcated by the roman-catholic clergy is a great restraint on them." Mr. M'Donnell says, "although living as outcasts there is a double control over them, particularly the residents; one, that of their clergy; the other, that they would find it almost impossible to obtain relief if they were notoriously immoral."

The labourers do not think there is any peculiar degree of immorality among beggars. M'Nally says, "I believe the old people among them that saw better days are generally moral, but the children are badly reared, and often commit thefts; in most instances, I think, against the will of the parents, who know that people would abhor them, and no one give them lodgings if such things were known of them. A short time ago, a beggar child belonging to a family that lodged with me stole a dozen of yarn from me; I did not miss it until the mother finding it with the child came back and returned it." Mr. Clendenning believes, that the same or perhaps a greater degree of affection towards one and other prevails among families of beggars as among the families of labourers; he says, "they have no property to quarrel about, and common misery is a common bond to them;" but M'Nally says, "some of the children, for want of early correction that the beggar parent cannot well use, are very unruly, and use language to their parents, that you would not hear in a labourer's family; others are as kind, and as well behaved as any man's children:" he adds, "the families of beggars are as large as the families of labourers; I know seven and eight children commonly in a family, and if I drew any distinction between them, would say, their families are increasing faster than the families of the labourers. I never knew a beggar marry with the intention of continuing to beg, though they are often reduced to beggary soon after marriage. I knew two girls out of the families of beggars to be married a short time ago to labourers, they are now very industrious; generally such girls get service in a farmer's house first, and then marry from that as soon as they can; they wait as short time as they can; they are glad to get any one, however poor, that will give them a chance of bread."

Mr. M'Donnell says, "there is a class of beggars, but inconsiderable for their numbers and fast decreasing, who marry with the intention of continuing to beg; they are the strolling tinkers; they dispense with the services of the clergyman, and substitute a marriage ceremony of their own. The wives and families accompany the tinker while he strolls about in search of work, and always beg. They intermarry with one another, and form a distinct class."

M'Nally does not think that it is common among beggars to have illegitimate children; he says, it is more common among people that are better fed. Mr. M'Donnell agrees with M'Nally; and Mr. M'Ilrea says, "beggar girls when they grow up often hire with farmers; in this situation they sometimes get illegitimate children, which obliges them to become beggars again. I think that whatever bastardy is among them generally originates in this way, and being less under the eye of friends they are more exposed to temptation in this position than girls of another class."

Strolling beggars are frequently the means of spreading infectious diseases, particularly fever. Walter Staunton (a small farmer) says, "I have known several instances in my neighbourhood of two or three persons in one house dying of a fever taken from a beggar to whom they had given lodgings; if you see a beggar look weak and sickly, and asked what ailed him, he will never tell you it was a fever he had."

M'Nally says, "after sickness they have not the means of getting new clothes, nor can they cleanse the old ones; sometimes they cannot get soap, and always their clothes are so worn and patched and ragged that the art of man could not wash them. The best way of cleansing them would be to burn the whole; but they must wear the rags or go naked, and they carry the infection a long time in them, and spread it through the country." Reilly says, "a beggar girl after she had left the fever hospital, came to my house; my wife pitied her weakness, and kept her for three days; she got a relapse, God saved us from taking the fever; but we were obliged to leave the house to herself, and hire a lodging."

Some time ago a rumour prevailed here that Government was about to give able-bodied paupers and their families a free passage to the colonies in North America. There were some few that were frightened by the accounts they heard of the climate, and feared the children could scarcely live in it; others had heard that many persons who had gone out had failed of obtaining employment, and professed themselves therefore unwilling to go; but the great number declared themselves anxious to take advantage of such a provision, that, as many expressed themselves, they might escape out of this cursed country."

Mr. Clendenning has observed, that gratuitous relief, even as dispensed by private persons is attended by results pernicious to industry. He says, "I have observed it to be the case in higher grades than the labourers, a person who has a rich relative to relieve him in distress, makes the less effort to support himself. In a long experience, I have observed among labourers, that the man who has any one to apply to for help becomes indolent and listless. I have given assistance to such persons, and felt and expressed to them at the time that I was doing them an injury. I would instance soldiers discharged with pensions; these persons having a dependence besides their industry are the most dissolute and extravagant class of the community."

Mr. Collins is of opinion that the shopkeepers of the town would prefer a regular tax for the support of the poor to the present mode of relieving them; he says, "I have conversed with many shopkeepers on the subject, and found them generally of this opinion."

Mr. M'Ilrea is of a different impression; he thinks the shopkeepers would prefer the discretionary distribution of whatever they might give to the poor; though he is aware that the solicitation of beggars, who constantly extort by importunity, is to them who are obliged to keep their doors open, almost an intolerable nuisance added to the expense.

Mr. Dudgeon, a shopkeeper, would himself prefer the present mode, but believes a considerable difference of opinion would be found among his fellow shopkeepers.

M'Nally says, "I would prefer giving from day to day to giving a sum periodically; it would fall lighter on me, though the sum were much less than the value of what I would give from day to day."

Gibbons says, "I prefer giving what I give at present, and as I give it, to paying the same amount as a tax: I now give as I feel I am able. A compulsory payment would at one time or the other bring me into difficulties that can never arise from the present mode of distributing my own alms."

Being asked if there were a house of industry in the parish, would the small farmers continue to encourage vagrancy by giving alms, M'Nally says, "I would think any one that then applied to me, idly inclined, and I would give him nothing."

Gibbon says, "We should be certain that they got enough to eat, and were not harshly treated; in that case we would not give. The curse of the beggar would not extort relief."

Walter Staunton, a small farmer, says, "When we do not deserve the curse we would not heed it; the curse of the wicked never availed, and he would be a bad man that would curse." M'Nally says, "Beggars are not in the habit of cursing when refused alms; for the last six years I have known but one beggar curse when refused."

M'Nally says, "I think the generality of beggars would prefer entering a house of industry to wandering about half naked in the cold and rains of winter; but there are some, who, having no charge (children to provide for) that they can easily get enough of food outside, and would prefer remaining out. John Foster, an old beggarman, says, "I would rather have the free range outside, and supple my joints by a walk through the country."

The labourers, both those under examination and several others present, declare that there are many occasions of want of employment, on which they would gladly avail themselves of a house of industry, by entering it with their families; they would even be willing to submit to the necessary separation of the different sexes of the family; but would not go in if they could get four-pence a day outside.

Mr. VERSCHOYLE, protestant rector.—DOMINICK WALDRON, labourer.

Mr. Loftus, Mr. Johnston, Mr. Wilson, Mr. Culkeen, and the labourers, agree in stating that the proportion of beggars to the population has greatly increased of late years. That at a low calculation there are at present 300 persons in the town who live by no other means than begging; and that, considering the number of labourers' wives and families who are from time to time reduced to beg, there must be at least 600 persons that one period or other of the year beg in the town; besides these, many labourers when reduced to great distress, leave the town, with their wives and families, to beg, where they are not known.

The class of beggars consist of widows and children, orphans, old and impotent persons, and for a considerable part, of the wives and families of unemployed labourers.

The witnesses state, that the burden of relieving beggars falls principally on shopkeepers and private families in towns, and small working farmers in the country; that the relieving of them may cost shopkeepers, on an average, 5*l.* per annum; many less than that, but some 7*l.* or 10*l.* and Mr. Loftus knows more than one that it must cost from 20*l.* to 30*l.* per annum. In this opinion the greatest pressure falls on the small farmers, and the more liberal of the shopkeepers.

The witnesses think that there is less crime among the beggars than among the labourers. Mr. Culkeen says, "They have not the spirit to be immoral; the depredations that are so frequently committed are committed not by beggars, but by persons who are ashamed to beg."

We have examined two beggars, Mary Hanley and Catherine Flynn, as to their own cases; while the witnesses agree, may be taken as illustrative of the condition of the class:—

Mary Hanley says, "My husband is a labourer, but does not get sufficient employment to support his family, so I must beg with my children for the most part of the year. I have six children. I have been 15 years married. I have been begging for 11 years of them. My husband never begged himself: he works from time to time, as he can get employment. The day he is employed we do not beg: he gives me his wages to buy food for the family. The day he has no work (and that is most of his days) I and the children go out and beg for ourselves and him. We live now in a deserted cabin, shifting our bed from side to side, as the wind blows or as the rain falls through the roof; and that sort of lying has left my eldest child, a girl 14 years old, a cripple, that she cannot stir out; she was a healthy child at first, but from the damp and cold she soon took pains in her arms and legs, and she is a cripple to-day. Myself and my children are so naked, that when we go out to beg, I must take the blanket out to shelter us: the wetter the day the more we want it; and when we come home at night we have nothing else to cover us. We would use three stone of potatoes in the day, if we could get them. I can seldom get more than one and a half stone by begging. I get nothing else but a drop of broth, and very seldom milk, and perhaps 1½*d.* or 2*d.* a week in half-pence, often no half-pence at all. In summer, when potatoes are scarce, I have often been days that I did not gather half a stone a day. Where would we get it all of us that are looking for it then. I have often made five parts of a potatoe, to divide it among my children. I dare say others collect more than I do; they go out constantly to the country among the villages; I cannot, as I carry two of my children, one six months, the other three years old, on my back. I am relieved principally by the shopkeepers; and I have often got potatoes from the labourer that has been forced to send his own family to beg a week afterwards; and that man beyond (pointing to Walsh) has often brought my children the potatoes, boiled and raw, when he was buying them himself, and had not the employment to buy enough of them." ["I did," says Walsh, "divide my dinner with her, and remain hungry myself; I would rather do it than that her children should go to bed without food." "And she herself," says Fitzstephen, "has given me, when I went into her house, part of the potatoes she had gathered for her family. No one feels for the person with a helpless family like the poor person who has a helpless family himself."] "I do not go to the country gentleman's houses: they do not like to see people like me coming about their houses at all. In some places I would not be let inside the gate; in other places I would not be dragging my children up to the house for all we would get. If there were a house of industry in the parish I would be happy to go into it. Would not I be happy to take my six children into such a house, and get enough to eat, for them that have often to fight for one potatoe!"—"Do you expect at any time to return to industry, and earn your bread?" "No, there is no employment to make me expect it." "Do you look forward, then, to being always a beggar, and in your present condition?" "My children may one day rear me, as I am now rearing them, that is, when they grow up and are able to earn something; though, God knows, that is a poor look out: little my husband is earning, that is able and willing to work to-day; but I will not part with the hope, after all."

Catherine Flynn says,—"I am 63 years old; my husband and all my children are dead. I have for some time supported myself by begging. While I had none to support but myself, I could always get as much potatoes as I could eat; but my daughter and son-in-law both died about three months ago, of cholera, leaving 5 children; 2 under 14, and 3 under 6 years of age; they had no other friend to take charge of them, and I now beg with them. They scarcely get enough of potatoes even now, when potatoes are plenty. I am old and weak, and obliged to walk with a crutch, and cannot go far with them. They would use about 1½ stone a day; we collect about one stone, besides getting a boiled potatoe from house to house. I have not begged in the scarce season of the year with them yet, so I cannot say how we will fare when it comes. Our food is potatoes, without any kitchen, except now and then a sup of broth. There are a few families that know my case, and give me, some 1*d.* some ½*d.* a week, which enables me to pay 3*d.* a week for lodgings. I have one sheet, which I got as alms, and had no blanket of any sort, until a few days ago I got, in the same way, this piece of old carpet that I wear round me by day, and, if I can bring it in dry at night, throw it over myself and grandchildren; but it often happens, that in the cold wet weather, when we want night covering most, it has been wet during the day and we cannot use it. The children have no clothes but as you see them now." [It was a cold wet day in the latter end of November, she and her grandchildren had been brought in off the street as they were passing, begging from door to door. The children's bodies were partially covered by a single woollen covering frittered to rags; their heads and feet, arms and legs, were perfectly naked. They stood shrinking from the cold, and endeavouring to shelter themselves under the ragged ends of the piece of worn carpeting that hung from the old woman, who was little better protected from the cold than themselves. In passing through the town we observed a great number of beggar's children in the same condition.]

Carman says,—"Some time ago I saw a man begging with his five children, one of them, a grown girl, was so naked, that I was ashamed to look at her: poor as I am, I went and bought a shift to cover her, a yard and half of 4*d.* calico; and if she was clad in satin she could not look happier than when she got it on her."

THE examination was held in a public room, which was crowded during the greater part of the time it lasted.

The number of beggars varies considerably with the season of the year, as the potatoes are more or less abundant. Mr. Hughes thinks, that in a summer, when potatoes are more than ordinarily scarce, from 300 to 500 persons beg from door to door through the parish; three-fourths of these are strangers from places, just so distant that they may avoid the shame of begging among their own neighbours. The witnesses could speak with so little certainty of the total number of beggars residing in the parish, that we thought the best judgment of their probable number would be formed, by having the actual number in a few of the villages enumerated by persons locally acquainted with them; the causes which reduced these persons to beggary have been also stated to us, and other circumstances of their condition, which may be considered as generally applying to the class of which they form a part. Horan, assisted by several persons present, has enumerated and described the cases of beggary, in four of the villages, as follows:

Village of Crucknageehee, containing 33 families.

The wife of —— Garavan, a labourer, and four children, have begged for the last three years.

Ned Malley, an old man, was a labourer, now begs through the year with his three young children.

Widow Reilly and two children, her husband was a labourer.

Widow Lavelle and two children beg the greater part of the year, but endeavour to keep in their cabin for a few of the winter months, by means of a small plot of ground in which they plant potatoes.

Owen Lavelle's wife and four children beg all the year; he is a strong man, a labourer, well able and anxious to work; at this season (end of October, when potatoes are digging) he could not last out, he could not stand the weather, as he had neither shirt nor shoes.

The wife and four children of William Scuffle, a labourer, beg through the summer.

Derrylohan, containing 43 families.

John Quin held a short time ago two acres and a half of land; his wife took sick and died; in his attendance on her he neglected his farm and incurred expenses, which obliged him to give it up; he now begs with his three children, one of them an infant.

Peter Flinn is a weaver by trade, but getting no work, was obliged to turn to labour, by which he cannot support his family; his wife and children beg in summer.

James Quin is a labourer; his wife and family beg during summer; he himself worked last summer for his food.

Ned Quin is a labourer; his wife and six children beg through the year; he has been often known in seeking work to offer himself for his food, and not succeed in obtaining it.

Pat Deane's wife and four children beg; Deane held land three years ago, but being unable to pay the rent was obliged to give it up, and has now "no means but beggary and labour."

Michael Lavelle's wife and three children beg during summer; Lavelle himself worked for his food the whole of last summer with a person in the room.

Widow M'Intire and her two children beg; her husband died a few weeks since; he held land under a joint lease, which the other tenants would not suffer her to continue to hold, lest she should fall into arrear for which they would be accountable.

Ned Lavelle's wife and three children beg; Lavelle is a labourer, and has been out of this country, it is supposed looking for work, since spring.

Widow M'Fadden and five children beg all the year round.

Derrygarriff, containing 20 families.

John Garavan last year held land, but being unable to pay his rent was ejected; is a good labourer and would gladly work if he got employment; his wife is dead, and he now begs himself with three young children; the eldest carries the bag, and he carries the youngest.

M'Gowan's, a family of five children, orphans; the eldest a girl of fourteen years, beg.

Pat Moran, a labourer, with his wife and three children, beg all the year round.

James Murphy, a labourer, and three children, beg; he is an old man, and ought to have past his labour, though he still would be glad to work if any one would employ him.

Hugh Moran, a sickly wife, unable to go out herself to beg, and four children, are supported by the beggary of his mother-in-law, who being present at our inquiry, says, she sometimes begs alone, sometimes if the day be good, she takes the children with her; her son-in-law is a labourer, if he got any thing to earn; he worked eight or nine days lately at some county work, where he was obliged to be up to his knees in water, and for which he is still unpaid, the presentment not being yet allowed by the grand jury; and when he lay ill of a cold which he took at the work, for the four days that he was lying, she had nothing besides cold water to give him but the quart of meal, the price of which she begged from the priest; and scarcely she could get him to lie down, fearing that the neighbours thinking it was cholera he had, might take a disgust against her, and not let her near them.

Knocknatinibeel, containing 51 families.

Pat O'Connor did hold land, but was unable to pay the rent; is now a labourer; his wife and three children beg through the summer.

Widow Conway and her three children beg.

Thomas Loftus, his wife and four children are at present out of the parish, thought to be begging; he is a strong labourer.

Widow Noon and her two children beg.

Pat Hoban is a labourer; his wife and seven children beg all the year round; he works when he can find employment, and for the rest is supported by them.

The Rev. Mr. Hughes declared, that though perfectly acquainted with the parish, and remembering these persons and their circumstances when reminded of them, he could not have supposed the number living by beggary to be so great, if they had not been enumerated by name.

These villages contain only 147 families; of the 2,041 contained in the whole parish, many besides those enumerated were named as being in a worse state than beggars, and many as begging privately from friends and neighbours, but we have included none that did not beg from door to door. A great many of these beggars for a large part of their time leave this parish and beg elsewhere; they mostly have huts of their own, for which they sometimes pay a small rent, generally to under-tenants, made up by an occasional day's labour; sometimes they hold them free, being allowed by the villagers to build on their ground; in many cases they get lodgings gratis from house to house, carrying their blanket or quilt with them, if they have such; their clothes are mere rags, and in many instances would not suffice to cover their nakedness, if they did not wrap a blanket or quilt, a rug, a sheet or pieces of tick round them; they sometimes get these and some worn-out clothes as alms: the blanket they generally had before they begged; the children are always half naked.

The relief obtained is almost invariably potatoes; several beggars present agree with the other witnesses, in stating that in winter when potatoes are plenty, a woman with a moderate family may obtain from two to three stones, which is about sufficient for their consumption; even at this season they scarcely ever have a surplus to dispose of, and when they have, it is too trifling to purchase any thing more than a little tobacco or soap; they sometimes get milk, but not often; their general food is potatoes and salt. "In summer," one of the beggar-women says, "we may one day get enough and two days not half enough; for the day we get plenty we do not eat it all, but keep it for some other day when we know we will want it more."

The richer classes are so few, that the great burthen of their support falls on the small landholders of ten acres and downwards.

Mr. Hughes thinks that a farmer holding ten acres of land and having two cows and a horse (such would be considered a snug comfortable man) gives in alms, on an average of the whole year, half a stone of potatoes per day, which may be valued at 2*d.* a stone; many of the farmers and labourers thought a person in such circumstances would give a stone each day, but were alarmed on being reminded that such would amount to 365 stone in the year, and bear a considerable proportion to the rent: simple as it was, they evidently had never made the calculation before. The smaller holders give fully in proportion, and the poorest labourer shares his own scanty supply of potatoes, while it lasts; one of the beggars says, "The man that is buying potatoes gives more freely than the man that is selling them and making money." The labourers and small holders present being asked, did they not consider when relieving the beggar, that they were giving away what they must soon want themselves, and perhaps be obliged to beg for, seriously spurn the idea of a man wanting the sooner for what he gives in charity: even beggars divide with others that have been less successful in collecting than themselves. The farmers think that the expense of giving alms as at present, falls lighter on them than a compulsory money tax of much smaller amount, and prefer the present mode of supporting the poor to any other that would fall solely on the occupiers of land.

The beggars say they would gladly enter a house of industry; that though compelled to work hard and live on coarse food, they would live much more easy and comfortable than they do at present.

WHILE the witnesses were consulting with one another, in order to give a probable estimate of the number of "common beggars" resident in the parish, Mr. Finn, who did not think there were so many as the number mentioned by some, required them to name as many as they could recollect; 47 were named. Mr. Finn said he did not think there were so many, and he was sorry to hear it, he thought 20 might be allowed for persons unknown to or forgotten by the witnesses, and the whole number might be something under 70; most of the witnesses would say 80, and some 100; the witnesses could give no idea of the number of strollers who frequent the parish, principally in summer; they agree that they are very numerous, much more so than residents. Mr. Blake says he has counted nine families of them applying together at his own door. Mr. Finn, in considering the quantity of provisions given to beggars by the small holders, says of them, "these are the persons that run away with the potatoes."

It is agreed that the number of "common beggars" is no measure of the amount of pauperism, the witnesses say, "there are numbers living on their neighbours that never take the bag." In order to get some idea of what this pauperism is, we have taken two villages and examined the witnesses as to the condition of such residents in them as they would call "paupers." In the village of Castletown, containing 24 houses, William Butler mentions the following cases:

Mary Rich, a stranger, a widow, three children, begs all the year; she came to this country for the convenience of a free school, to which she sends her children.

Pat Mea, a dumby, now nearly past his labour, begs.

Mary Mea, a dumby, begs.

Biddy Magrath, an old woman, a widow with her two daughters, all beg.

Nelly Magrath, an old woman, never married, begs.

— Meade, an old man and his wife; he lost his son some years ago, and being unable to work his farm and pay rent, was ejected; while his strength lasted he earned something by working for a year or two; he then went to the next county for two or three months, where, I suppose, he commenced begging, for he begged when he came home, and ever since; he still goes away, for a start, for where a man had been holding land for 30 years he would not wish to be running every day to a neighbour's door, he does not mind it much with strangers.

Pat Carty lost his land; has his wife and mother-in-law living with him; "he is able to work, any day he gets work, but that is not often; the mother-in-law begs and divides with them; he does not beg at home, but they all sometimes set off for the county of Galway."

Biddy Fox, a middle aged woman, never married; wants the use of her arms; "she begs the year round; she used to live with her sister, a widow, now dead, who also begged, but contrived to keep both in the house, during the cold weather, by means of conacre potatoes planted in return for some little jobs she did for the neighbours."

Widow Rielly has one daughter living with her; "their friends give them a lock of potatoes to keep them in the house, and the boys of the village plant them a few perches of conacre; her landlord assists her with 20*s.* a year and a cabin."

— Butler says "at this season of the year these poor people endeavour to do something for the winter by going to us in the field while digging our potatoes; every one gives a dish or a basket holding a couple of stone; a decent man would not grudge five or six stone to an old neighbour, or his widow."

In the village of Lislogherry, containing about 40 houses, the following cases are mentioned:

Widow Costello has four children, the eldest six years old; she has not been able to keep her husband's land, and now lives in a cabin with a rood of land attached, for which she undertook, but has not been able to pay rent; it rests with the mercy of the landlord to turn her out.*

James Butler is one of five who holds seven acres between them; has five children. Hynes says "he was not seen at mass or meeting these six years; he is so naked that he hardly leaves the cabin; he is sickly too; he and his family go from one friend to another for potatoes."

Widow Butler, an old woman, lives from one child to another; they can do little for her.

Widow Shaughnessy, also an old woman, living in the same way.

Michael Leffey has no land; works occasionally, but lives chiefly on the assistance given by his neighbours.

William Butler, a sickly man, with five children; eldest 10 years old; was ejected a short time ago from his land; he has not left his cabin, nor begged yet, but must immediately be left without any other resource. Butler says "I lent him a trifle of money to buy potatoes; potatoe , he will never be able to pay me; he has nothing; but as if he fell from the sky yesterday, and his clothes are not worth 5*d."

Thomas Higgins has no land; has three children, all too young to work, and is starving to support his sister, who has, for two years, been ill of a decay; "he is not in much better health himself; we cannot say we know him to be assisted, but we are sure he cannot earn for himself."

Thomas Burke has no land; he is a sickly weak man, and has four young children; his wife deals in eggs, and is his chief support. Hynes says "little support she can give him; she goes into the far part of Connemara to gather the eggs; she carries a bit of bread with her or some potatoes to boil on the way, or gets a part of the meal at any house she calls at; she takes her eggs to the market of Tuam, and after travelling 60 miles one way and 60 more the other, she is glad to have 2*s.* 6*d.* profit at home; these are the shifts poor people make in this country to keep them from the bare beggary. Molowney† says "that woman does not take a stitch off her back from the time she leaves home till she comes back again."

Beggars, almost without exception, consist of persons who have once earned their own livelihood, but have been reduced by the death of parent or husband; by old age disabling them for work, only the loss of their farms.

Reverend Mr. Waldron would particularly insist on the latter cause, but as one leading less immediately to public than to private beggary; he says, "The most numerous class of tenantry in this parish are persons, who, as long as they are left in their holdings, can afford to use as food, mostly potatoes and salt, occasionally a herring or an egg, very seldom milk; when such a person is ejected, he has no means of re-establishing himself; his labour cannot support him, and he and his family are necessarily reduced to live on the charity of their neighbours, exerted either publicly or privately."

Mr. W. contends that such persons form a large portion of the class of both public and private beggars. Butler agrees with him, and says, "this is November day, and our whole village has been served with a notice to quit. I am just going to see who will be left in their houses, and of the 24 families, I fear not many will light a fire on their hearth again."‡

Rev. Mr. Crampton has not observed either increase or decrease of vagrancy in the parish of late years, nor of any other form of destitution, except in the village of Cong, where, he says, with increasing population there has been decreasing employment. He thinks the condition of the people has been nearly stationary for some years.

Hynes says, "there are people reducing every day, and we are only in the beginning of it. There are many in their house to-day that will not be able to keep in them; how can poverty be but increasing, when a hundred of wheat is sold at 6*s.*; and if I complain to my landlord, and ask him to reduce my rent, the answer is, 'leave the crop to myself;' that is, leave him my seed and my labour, and often we must do so; and bad as the price is, leave it to be canted for half of it; if the times do not mend, there will be more beggary, and worse than beggary; better die at once than be lingering. An empty sack cannot stand."

Hopkins says, "we take con-acre here for three years, and always expect that the third crop of wheat (the other two being potatoes) will pay us best. After I had lost my labour and my seed on it, and thrashed it out this year, I offered all this grain for the rent, if the straw was left me, and was refused. Is not that enough to beggar me?"

Rev. Mr. Waldron, Mr. Bourke, Mr. Butler, and all the farmers present, agree in stating, that poverty ending either in public beggary or dependance on relations or neighbours for support, has been progressively increasing for several years, owing to the depression of prices, while rents remain unreduced. The number of beggars, both resident and strangers, is much increased in summer, particularly of the latter class. All agree in attributing the increase to the scarcity of provisions, immediately before the new crop of potatoes, and the want of work at that season. Many of the resident beggars have little plots of ground or con-acre, which helped, by the potatoes gathered from the farmers in the field while digging them, to supply them with provisions during the winter. Hynes says, "Cottiers and their families sometimes leave this parish laying out, that is to earn, but we know they go as much to beg as to earn; and I suppose the strangers that come to us in summer are of the same sort."

Able-bodied men, strangers with families, very commonly beg in summer, carrying a spade or reaping hook, and seeking work.

Rev. Mr. Crampton knew one instance of such a person refusing to work, but believes it a "curious and singular case."

Mr. Finn says, "The relief of beggars falls principally on the poorer classes; the wealthier are unwilling to encourage them. Besides beggars, belonging to the poorer class, and being always

* Rev. Mr. Waldron remarks, that "many receive relief from their neighbours and friends, which no one else is aware of; for instance, had Butler not been present, no one would have known that the person last mentioned had received relief, which may be called gratuitous. I, myself, am constantly applied to to make collections in my chapel, without mentioning names, for persons in circumstances such as those mentioned, but unwilling to expose their distress."

† All the witnesses present agree that such a traffic, at such profits, is quite common.

‡ We consequently heard that the threat against Butler's village was not executed; but we have retained the expression he used, when he dreaded it,—as exhibiting more forcibly, by the depth of feeling it betrays, the poor man's own sense of the utter destitution consequent on the loss of his land in a country where labour affords him no refuge, than any detailed and measured statement we could make of its result.

always among them, experience more sympathy from them, than from persons that converse little with them, and have never personally known them. The poorer people expect rewards in a future life, for the good acts they do in this, which leads them to be the more charitable to the beggar. Many of the wealthier classes do not like to admit them inside their gates, if they wish to relieve them, they meet them on the roads. It would be better to have them up in houses provided for that purpose, than leave them dependant on any class."

Hopkins being questioned on this point, says, "It is on potatoes the beggars live, and at the poor man's door they get them. When they come to this little town, they go the round of every house, rich and poor; the labourer gives, with as much welcome, though he cannot give as plentifully, as if he had a thousand a year; if he had but the food he was putting in the pot, he would give part of it." Molowney says, "I have known the man that had not a second stone of potatoes in his house, nor a stroke of work to earn them, divide with the beggar." Hopkins, being asked, did he never consider, when relieving the beggar in winter, that, if he withheld that relief, his stock of potatoes would last him perhaps a fortnight or three weeks longer towards summer, answers, "I count they would stand me a great deal longer by giving them; while I would be giving to the beggar, I think the potatoes would be growing fat in the room for me." O'Brien says, "I think they ought not to do any one good, that would deny them to the starving man."

Beggars are almost wholly relieved with potatoes. An able-bodied man is seldom, if ever, seen begging, except in summer, and at any time could get nothing beyond his food. The beggar that will obtain most is a woman with a family.

The rest of the witnesses nearly agree with the statement of Mr. M'Donnell, who says, during the nine plentiful months, a woman with a small family would collect much more than they could consume; a woman with a large family, quite sufficient for their consumption, but scarcely any thing over. During the other three months, a woman with a small family will have no surplus. A woman with a large one, must often want. He believes the aged people get a full supply all the year round. The farmers, if they could not give them the unboiled potatoes, would share with them what was boiled for their own meal. Any surplus supply of provisions is disposed of for tobacco, never to the knowledge of any of the witnesses for whiskey. Sometimes for an article of cheap clothing, soap, or salt to eat with their potatoes, occasionally they can purchase a pair of shoes. Hynes says, "It is very seldom they can get the shoes; most of them travel through the frost and snow without any shoes."

Molowney says, "During the winter six months, when potatoes are plenty, there is scarcely a man, holding eight to twelve acres of land, that does not give half a stone of potatoes in the day; six or seven beggars may sometimes apply; on an average, I think, three are relieved each day, and half a stone of potatoes would go a short way on them. They are given with both the hands, and often with a dish. When summer comes, and the potatoes get scarce, it lies with a man's own heart, as he has the goodness to divide his share. I know some persons that give most when the potatoes are scarcest, but you would not find many like them."

Mr. Elwood speaks from observation, having frequently been in the houses of the small farmers, when beggars called; he never saw them refused; he believes half a stone a day is a fair average of the quantity given each day, by a farmer holding 8 to 12 acres.

Mr. Finn does not believe the quantity given to be so great. He does not think the number of beggars sufficient to visit every such house every day.

The witnesses do not believe that beggars keep themselves in dirt and rags for the purpose of exciting compassion. They are commonly in a very filthy condition, but the witnesses attribute it to the want of soap to wash their clothes. There are a few beggars who produce sores on their bodies for the purpose of obtaining alms, by exhibiting them. Half a dozen or a dozen such persons may be seen at every large fair; but the same set attend every fair within a very extensive district. Some of the witnesses have not the same "boccoughs" at fairs 40 and 50 miles distant, with the exception of these.

Rev. Mr. Waldron and the other witnesses believe the beggars of this parish to be as moral as any other class of the community. Mr. Finn says, he has heard that it is common among beggars to borrow children, that, by the appearance of a large family, they may excite the more charity. The labourers have also heard of such a practice, but never knew a case of it. Rev. Mr. Waldron has never known a case of it, but mentions of his own knowledge cases bearing that appearance, where beggars, in order to relieve the distress of a neighbour or relation, more particularly who was not able to procure food for his family, have taken one or more of the children out with them, and thus supplied them with food.

Rev. Mr. Waldron has not known beggars to marry, unless after they have been raised from that condition; nor is he aware that the number of illegitimate children among them differs much from that among labourers.

All the witnesses agreed that, when the young beggars grow up, they generally betake themselves to industry, but there are old persons and persons burdened with families, who have no chance of changing their condition.

Being asked whether beggars would willingly emigrate, if supplied with the means, Hynes answers: "The old hands would care little to go, but there are others that would be glad to do any thing to be rid of begging." Mr. Finn says, "People here know nothing of emigration, or its advantages; propose emigration as a free offer to persons of any condition, and they will suspect you of a bad design, in wishing to get rid of them. I am confident, if they could be assured of its advantages by having friends in that country whose report of it they could trust, they would be very anxious to emigrate; but emigration from this barony has been very rare; it is commonly represented here that people are lying starving in the streets of American towns for want of employment."

Hynes says, "If a house of industry were established in the parish, there are a great many beggars, well used to the road, that would rather have their ramble than go into it, but many a poor housekeeper would be glad to go in. Would not the man, who is glad to get his bit for his work, and a quart of meal to carry home to his family to last them for the 24 hours, be a fool if he did not go himself, and take them with him, into such a place? The labourers would spend the whole summer in it." Being asked whether, if the families were separated, male and female, they would go in, he answers, "Though they would not like the separation, when distress would catch them, they would go any where." O'Brien says, "I think you would want a house that would cover two or three acres for all that would flock into it." Mr. Finn says, "They have such an attachment for their home and fireside, that they would be very reluctant to go in." Mr. Blake thinks, with Hynes, that distress would force the poorer class of this parish to go in in great numbers.

The farmers all agree that the present mode of subsisting the poor is cheaper to them than any other mode by which the funds would be derived from them. Mr. M'Donnell says, "It comes easy to them to give potatoes from time to time; it would press hard on them to be obliged to make up a money sum, if it were but 3*s.* at the end of the year." Mr. Elwood says, he knows the small farmers would prefer the present mode, and think it cheaper; but his own opinion is, that a compulsory rate would be cheaper to them, "as the money would be more judiciously expended when entrusted to persons who would make inquiries, which the farmers never make as to the cases proper to be relieved."

Mr. Blake is confident that the requisite machinery of overseers and other officers would involve our expense immeasurably exceeding the present, and which the small occupiers would be utterly unable to bear. Rev. Mr. Waldron agrees with Mr. Blake, and wishes to add, as his opinion, that "the funds should be derived from their original source of tithes and church lands." Mr. Finn declines giving more than his individual opinion, which is, "that provision should be made, but only for the old and infirm."

Rev. Mr. Crampton thinks a compulsory note is required to support the aged and disabled, and to supply work to the able-bodied. A question being asked, whether, if there were a house of industry in the parish, the farmers would still continue to encourage vagrancy by affording relief? James Jennings, a small farmer, being present, says, "If there were such a house in every village, I would relieve the beggar still, and think it a sin to refuse him." Hynes turned to him, and said, "If you would relieve him, a hundred would refer him to that house; you could not support them all yourself, and they would soon find begging a bad business." All the other witnesses seemed to agree with Hynes, that in such a case begging would soon cease for want of encouragement.

Mr. POTTER, protestant curate.—Mr. REED, land-steward to Marquis of Sligo, the principal proprietor of the parish.

THE witnesses agree that 100 is a fair average of the number of persons begging publicly through the year in the parish, but that the number of public beggars bears no proportion to the number of persons occasionally subsisting on private charity, who may be classed at will, under the head of either private beggars, distressed landholders, or able-bodied wanting work. Mr. Gibbons remarks, and all the witnesses concur, "There are many in this parish living for a considerable part of the year on charity, who may for the time be called private beggars, and in any other parish would inevitably be reduced to public beggary; so much of clanship prevails here, that there is scarcely a man in the parish who, when reduced to destitution, cannot find either kind neighbours, or relatives more or less distantly related, ready to assist him for a time with a gratuitous supply of provisions, and thus save him the disgrace of publicly taking the bag."*

The witnesses cannot distinguish the numbers of residents and strollers. Beggary is most common in summer, in consequence of the scarcity of provisions at that season. Their supply of potatoes is then exhausted with many, who have had sufficient for the winter and spring. The total absence of employment at that season also contributes to increase the numbers, but scarcely of resident beggars, for all the witnesses concur with Mr. Gibbons in stating, that, "not even in spring, is there in this parish a sufficiency of work to keep the labourer and his family from begging." Mr. Reed, joined by the other witnesses, states, as an additional cause of the increase in summer, the practice among beggars of resorting to this parish for the benefit of sea-bathing. The public beggars consist almost without exception of women, children, and men unable to labour, in consequence of age or infirmity. There are a few men who might, perhaps, be called able-bodied, "but," Mr. Gibbons says, "not such as would be likely to find employment, while so many abler men are offering themselves for work, and, without exception, residents or strangers, they do work at reduced rates when they can find employment in hurried seasons."

Much the larger proportion of resident beggars consists of the wives and children of cottiers or labourers, who work occasionally, but are utterly unable to support themselves and families by their holding or labour; many of these cottiers and labourers having planted their potatoes, either in their own small holding or con-acre land, rented for the season, shut up their cabin, and wander about begging, some at home, others in distant parts of the country. M'Donnell says, "those who leave home, do so, either thinking another country more plentiful, or fearing to be too burdensome on their neighbours at home."

There are many of the latter sort in the parish. M'Donnell says, there are three in his village. M'Donogh knows four in his, Freehill six in his, and M'Evily two in his. Labourers who go to England to seek work are frequently obliged to beg their way through Ireland. Mr. Gibbons says, he has heard the labourers themselves confess that they have begged their way to Dublin, not being able to collect more money than was sufficient to pay their passage, and sometimes even back from Dublin, when they failed of obtaining work in England. M'Evily says, he knows such cases among his own neighbours.

None of the witnesses know any cases of persons begging from infancy to mature age. They have all, at one time or other, earned their own subsistence. The causes that led to their destitution, as mentioned by the witnesses, are, orphanage, widowhood, sickness of the principal earner of the family, ejection for arrear of rent, high rents and low prices, obliging them to throw up their land, acre by acre, until at length they hold too little to support them; and the subdivision of farms, on occasion of marriages among the children, producing the same effect. None of the other witnesses think that any persons beg from choice; but, Mr. Potter says, "I know among the strangers a few women so far begging from choice that if they sought occasional employment among the farmers' families, they might keep themselves from begging; they could certainly earn more by begging, than the very small remuneration they would receive in that way. I do not think there are any such characters among the resident beggars."

Persons are very unwilling to give any relief to an able-bodied man without a family; he must find it very difficult to get any thing beyond his mere consumption. M'Donnell says, if people see a few potatoes in his bag, they are very loath to give him any thing. Up to March he may, besides his food, have as much potatoes to sell as will procure him tobacco; after that, he is fortunate if he gets enough to eat, and he is often taken short for food. In summer the woman, with a family, obtains most, the quantity varying with the abundance of provisions; on the average of years she may gather three stone in winter and one and a half stone in summer; when a large family applies, the quantity given is increased, but seldom in proportion to the number; a woman with three or four children, considering that she obtains relief where others are refused, may collect in proportion to the number of her family; some, particularly very large families, separate in the morning, beg separately during the day, and meet again in the evening. M'Donnell says, "'Tis only distress obliges them to do it; more is given to an infirm than to an able-bodied person." Mr. Gibbons says, "An able-bodied person can make more applications in a given time than an infirm, and may, on the whole, obtain more than him in a plentiful season, when persons give alms freely; but in a scarce season he will apply at many places and get nothing, while the infirm person is always sure of a place in the corner, and a share of the meal; on the whole, the able-bodied beggar will feel hunger oftener than the infirm. The woman with children has the advantage in all seasons."

When beggars are able to obtain a surplus of provisions they sell it, and buy generally tobacco, sometimes an article of covering, (the infirm man is the only man who lives wholly by begging), a cast-off article of clothing, the woman a piece of coarse sheeting, which serves as a covering both night and day. It very rarely happens that they can collect sufficient for this latter purpose.

When able-bodied men beg, they always profess themselves in search of work, and generally carry with them some instrument of husbandry, as a spade, sickle, &c. Mr. Gibbons has known them to work for 1½*d.* or 2*d.* a day with their food. The witnesses do not think that beggars generally keep themselves in a state of dirt or raggedness for the purpose of exciting compassion. M'Donnell says "They cannot avoid it; they have no means of buying either new clothes, or soap to wash the old ones." That class of beggars who expose their sores and are supposed to keep them open for the purpose of exciting compassion, is very rare, they come only to fairs and markets. There are more residing in this parish. The other witnesses will not say they are impostors, though they believe them to be so; but M'Donogh has actually seen one of them use an herb for the purpose of irritating his sores.

All the witnesses agree with M'Evily, who says, "unless women took their children about with them, even in the most severe weather, they could not procure them a sufficiency of food; but I have known them to leave them at home, on a single meal, while they themselves went out to beg, rather than take them with them in bad clothes in cold wet weather."

Mr. Reed believes that any dissolute habits that prevail among beggars, may be accounted for by the fact, that women have been reduced by such habits to beggary, and that their conduct is not improved in their new line of life. The other witnesses have never observed any immorality among them, though many are in the constant habit of giving them lodging. "The worst," says M'Donnell, "I ever saw among them was some quarrelling between themselves."

The other witnesses agree that beggars, if the means were offered, would be very desirous of emigrating, provided there was no separation of families; but Mr. Reed is of opinion, that a desire of remaining in their own country would operate with the lazy habits induced by begging, to prevent the habitual mendicant from availing himself of the offer; he he thinks, however, that all those families who beg occasionally would gladly accept it. There is an equal degree of kindness shown to their relations among beggars, as among the labouring classes. M'Evily and M'Donnell say, they have observed that beggar children when they grow up, show even more feeling and attention to their parents than labourers' children; their kindness to other beggars not at all related to them, is very remarkable. M'Evily says, "I have heard from beggars that I have lodged, that when they had not collected a sufficiency of food during the day, they were relieved by others that had more luck." M'Donogh, Cox and M'Donnell have all mentioned instances which they have themselves known, and believe such to be quite common. Beggars have as large families as any other class of the community, but in most cases they have been reduced to beggary by the number of the family. Beggars never marry, intending to continue to beg. Tinkers' families who always beg are the only exceptions, they are born, live and die in beggary.

The number of illegitimate children is greater than among the labourers, partly because women of already ruined character are reduced to beg; partly because both the temptation and opportunity are increased when girls, as among beggars, are withdrawn from their families. The witnesses have made no observation as to the comparative mortality among beggars and the labouring classes; but M'Evily believes it may well be greater among the beggars, as they suffer more hardships than any other class; others may feel more hunger, but are not like them exposed to the weather, wet and dry as it may chance to come.

Relief is afforded to total strangers without any inquiry into circumstances or character; no attempt is made to ascertain before giving alms what a beggar has already received, farther than may be known by the bulk of his bag, if it appears full, either less is given or is wholly refused; beggars have been known to return to their lodgings when their bag was half full, and having emptied it go out to beg again.

The relief given in this parish consists almost wholly of potatoes; M'Evily says, "We have no meal for ourselves, that goes to the landlord." The farmers cannot afford much milk; lodgings are always given gratis; as to clothes, M'Evily says, "We cannot afford to give them any sort of clothing; one may sometimes throw a bag over them for the night where they lodge with them, now and then (but it is seldom); they may get a shattered old coat; they mostly throw round them by day the bed-clothes that cover them by night."

No limit is observed either as to the number of beggars to be relieved, or the quantity of relief afforded; the latter depends on the number of applicants.

In this parish there are no resident proprietors nor any middling class. Mr. Reed says, "in the whole parish there are scarcely a dozen occupiers holding as much as 10 acres of good arable land. The relief of beggars therefore falls wholly on very small holders; the clergymen of both persuasions bear their full proportion." Mr. Potter, the protestant curate, says, "on one occasion, I gave a coat to a beggar, I wanted it before the year was out, and could not afford to replace it."

All the witnesses agree that more is given in charity by the farmers of this parish during the summer than the winter months. M'Donnell says, "there are fewer looking for it in winter." They agree that a farmer holding five to six acres of land (the most comfortable class in this parish at all considerable for its numbers) may give to beggars during from six to eight weeks in summer from three to six stone of potatoes per week; during the remainder of the year from one to three stones, according to the liberality of the person. This is altogether independent of the relief given to relatives and neighbours. M'Donnell, himself a holder of eight acres, says, "the man that has but a rood of ground is as liberal as the man that holds six acres; he cannot give as much, but he gives perhaps more freely. When he purchases a single stone of potatoes he gives with as good a will as if he had a store of them. The men that beg part of the year themselves relieve the beggar while they have any thing to relieve him with." M'Evily says, "I sometimes sell potatoes towards the middle of summer; I reserve so much for my own consumption, and sell the remainder. I calculate what I am likely to consume by what I have usually consumed, including, of course, what I give away to beggars. In this manner, though I may not have it in my mind at the time, I keep my potatoes out of the market that I may give to beggars."

Cox is of opinion, that a religious feeling so far influences the givers of alms, that though a house of industry were established in the parish, they would still continue the practice if application were made to them. All the other witnesses dissent, and say they themselves would not give. M'Donnell says, "he would consider it no charity to the man that did not want it, except in seasons of extraordinary distress." The witnesses have never known a beggar attempt to extort charity by any sort of threats on such occasions. Mr. Potter says, "I have heard men declare that unless something were done for them it would come to that, that every man should seize whatever he could lay hands on." M'Evily says, "when beggars were refused I never knew them either threaten or curse; their words were as civil as if their bags had been filled for them." As regards stories and talebearing, M'Evily says, "beggars never interfere in such things at all." M'Donnell says, "I would be careful of what was said in my house in their presence; I would not trust them, for they would carry it out with them." Mr. Potter and Mr. Reed believed that when the families of beggars grow up they generally turn to industry; but have contracted habits of laziness that make them more ready to beg during every period of their subsequent life. Mr. Gibbons, Gallagher, M'Evily and Cox say, they speak purely from observation, and that they each can mention by name in his own neighbourhood more families than one who being reared beggars are now as industrious as any persons in the parish, and would endure as great privations as ourselves before they would beg again. All the witnesses believe the beggars of this parish would gladly enter a house of industry though it involved a temporary restriction on their personal liberty, provided they were allowed tobacco; they would rather be restricted in their food than be deprived of it, and would gladly forego a meal to procure it.

THE witnesses say it is impossible to ascertain with any degree of accuracy the number of persons begging in the parish. A considerable proportion of its population, either by public or private begging, appeal to charity for support at one season or other of the year. Burke says, "There are two classes, the public beggars that carry a bag, going from door to door and ask alms for God's sake, and the private beggars, housekeepers, that when they come short ask help as neighbours. The latter are the greatest burthen on us, for what we would offer to the common beggar we would be ashamed to offer to them; we must give them a stone or two of potatoes at a time."

Two years ago Mr. Lyons made a census of his parish, distinguishing the population into classes according to their condition; one class was of those who, residing continually in the parish, had no houses of their own, but lodged a week in one house and a week in another, living solely by begging and having no other occupation at any season of the year. There were at that time 29 such families, which might comprise 120 persons, principally old men and women, and young widows and their children.

Capt. Ireland, Capt. Nugent and the other witnesses agree with Mr. Lyons, that the number of such beggars has considerably increased since that time. Donohoe says, "it is greatly increased; what has become of all that have been ejected in the last two years? they are nearly all begging, many in the way described."

Besides these, there are in the summer months at least an equal number of strangers from the adjoining barony of Tyrawley, who beg here, being ashamed to beg at home; there are also not included in this number many old men and women, orphans and widows with their children, who are supported during the plentiful season of the year, either by relatives or by their own industry, but when provisions become scarce they are obliged to beg, continuing to live either in their own houses or those of their relatives. The families of the numerous labourers that hold no land, also beg for some part of the year and are not included; these latter beg sometimes at home, but much oftener leave the parish for places where they are not known. Burke says, "'Tis the poor people almost as poor as themselves that bear the burthen of the beggars' support; the highest class do not look into nor know the distress and desolation that is about them. Those that live by the sweat of their brow support the poor. The landlords make more beggars than they relieve." Rev. Mr. Lyons says, "There is no class of resident landlords here, nor is there an independent farmer in the parish, so the relief afforded to the destitute must be principally derived from persons very poor themselves."

Capt. Ireland says, "There are so few opulent persons in this parish, that their whole property (excepting Major Bingham's) would not suffice to relieve all the forms of destitution that exist here. The great burden, therefore, of such relief as is obtained must fall on the poor, though the clergymen of both persuasions and those richer persons who do reside contribute liberally."

Freehill says, "The beggar going about calls at every door, and at mine among the rest. If I have any thing in the house I give. I have seen the beggar lodging in my house divide with the beggar that came in asking alms, and the beggar woman is here in the room that, if she had but that length of tobacco [marking a small measure on his finger] would give half to the woman she saw wanting it. I have given lodging to an old beggar-woman for the last three months; she begs her food through the parish; if I saw her fasting, I should be very scarce indeed when I would not give her part of my potatoes, but I am oftener in want myself than she is, and she gives me potatoes oftener than she gets any from me."

Mr. Lyons says, "I have been greatly gratified by witnessing an instance of the sympathy beggars feel for one another. A woman with but one child, having her bag nearly full of potatoes, met on the road a woman with a large family whose bag was empty. 'Lord be praised,' said she, 'I have been lucky to-day and you have fared but badly, I will give you a dinner for the children from what I have gathered,' and accordingly she gave her the greater part of what she had in the bag."

The witnesses are of opinion that in winter beggars can collect sufficient food (potatoes) for their consumption. In harvest, the season for digging potatoes, they are known to sell some, but not more than is sufficient to procure them a little tobacco; and it is believed that in order to sell what may procure them a very small supply of this, they are obliged to stint themselves in their food. O'Brien says, with the concurrence of other witnesses, "in the summers of years of ordinary plenty, a single person, or a woman with a very small family, may gather sufficient potatoes for their meals, but a woman with six children would not gather more than sufficient for three; they might do better if they went and begged elsewhere, where, but many of them have friends here and would rather live on in a starving way than leave them; in some seasons they are obliged to fly."

Deane says, "I have seen beggars ask for one potatoe, when few could give them even the one; there was a custom that is now going out, of giving them wool; I have seen beggars so hard set, as to refuse the wool when offered them, and beseech for a single potatoe to divide between themselves and children."

Beggars easily procure lodging gratis in any poor man's cabin they apply at.

Being questioned as to their means of procuring clothes, O'Donnell says, "such gentlemen as these (to Mr. Lyons, Capt. Ireland, &c.) may now and then give an old article of clothing, or sometimes the price of it; but you need not mention such clothes as they have, for they are all nearly naked."

Burke says, "As regards clothes, we are ashamed and cannot tell you the misery either of beggars, or of many that do not beg, because we cannot say it with propriety or delicacy." O'Brien says, "it is not the beggars merely, but persons that relieve the beggars that are without clothes."*

On consulting with one another, the witnesses agree that any landholder who grows sufficient potatoes for his consumption, gives in alms about three stone of potatoes a week, on an average of the year; that, in the words of one of the witnesses, "a generous person, one willing to pay for his generosity," may give six stone a week, and that there may be from 20 to 30 such generous persons in the parish. Burke says, "The year of the great distress (1831) I did not know where I was until I had scarcely a potatoe for myself."

Captain Nugent and Mr. Lyons say a poor man must give according to his ability, and think it must often happen that a man's energy and industry are repressed, and his disposition to save discouraged and impeded by the necessity that exists of his distribution of alms keeping pace with his means. If it does not, he becomes the subject of remark among his neighbours, and the object of their hatred and contempt.

O'Brien says, "No man ever takes up begging in preference to industry. Beggary is always the very last resort; but children that have been reared in that way contract idle habits, that may induce them to live longer on the public than absolute necessity obliges them."

Mr. Lyons says, "They are also led into dishonest practices; they are very generally accused of pilfering cabbage, potatoes, turf, &c., and plucking wool off the sheep. In fact their morals are borne down by their wants. Hunger and cold forces them to these practices, and the habit remains after the necessity has ceased, nor does it stop here, but is too often communicated to persons who have never experienced the same absolute necessity." O'Brien says, "What they do not get by begging, they must either steal or rob." Burke says, "There are many persons that steal before they beg, and it falls very heavy on those that live in their neighbourhood." Mr. Lyons says, "This place affords the habitual beggars very little means or temptation to return to industry. They have nothing to do here. The great source of the evil is want of employment; if employment could be had, the honest people would shame the indolent into exertion; however, great numbers beg for certain seasons of the year, who contrive to support themselves by industry during the remainder."

Mr. Lyons thinks that if any difference as to the largeness of their families exists between the class that periodically beg, and the class immediately above them, the families of the former are the larger.

Mr. Lyons is of opinion that were a house of industry established in this parish, the greater number of alms-givers would still give, though in a diminished quantity, if beggars applied to them. Prejudices would be very easily excited against such a house, if any found it their interest to do so, by circulating stories about cruelties practised on its inmates, which would find ready credence; a few thinking persons, but these are the smaller number, would of course be indifferent to such rumours, unless well grounded, and would cease to encourage vagrancy by not giving alms.

It is the universally expressed feeling of the landholders present, that bearing, as they consider that they do, the principal burden of the beggar's support, still they would prefer the present mode of subsisting to any compulsory mode, by which a similar proportion of the burden would fall on them. They say they can afford an amount, given in the present mode, which they could not afford to pay in sums periodically to a taxgatherer. Burke says, "Perhaps it is at the very hardest time of the year that the tax would be demanded."

The following is the case of an infirm man (Edmund Dixon), driven by ill health to beg with his family. We give the statement as made to us in private by himself; its general features may be taken to represent those of a class:—"I was a weaver, but many years ago gave up working at my trade, in consequence of ill health. The same cause compelled me to give up my farm, acre by acre, until four years ago I gave up the last of it, and turned out with my family to beg; I have had no home since; I sold every article in my house before I went out; I sold my feather-bed several years ago; I sold the timber roof of my house when I was leaving it; I had two blankets, and I sold the best of them; the other I have carried about with me since to cover the family by night. After I had begged for a year, I worked as journeyman with a weaver for three months, as I was recovering my health, and had hopes I could give up the begging, but it hurt me, and for twelve months after I was not able even to beg; I could not walk with my wife and children, but was most of my time lying; my wife and family begged for me, and supported me; we lived in a cabin, for for which we paid 10*s.* a year to a tenant; he took the rent in work from my son, a boy of 15; my wife used sometimes to spin during that time; she was paid 1½*d.* a dozen, which she used to spend two days in spinning. When I found myself strong enough to go out and beg, I gave up the cabin, and have begged with my family ever since, sometimes at home, sometimes in strange parts of the country. I come home in the beginning of winter, and remain until spring, when I wander out into Tyrawley. My own place is the best for me, but I cannot always stay in it; when I have walked all the villages, I must not go to them too soon again; if I get alms from them to-day, I will want it again to-morrow, and the day after, and every day, but I cannot have the face to be always applying to the same persons; I go from house to house with my whole family; we get a bed of straw from the man of the house, or if he has not it, we beg it from some one that has; we have one blanket ourselves; we pay nothing; we get nothing else from the person we lodge with, except perhaps turf to boil our potatoes, but we must often beg that too; it may not be plentiful with the person we lodge with, for it is not in the best house a man like me, with a large family, will get a lodging; comfortable people have too much trouble of their own on their floor; their cabin is too scarce for themselves; they have a cow, or a pig, or a sheep in it; people that have nothing to put in their house have most room for us; we beg our food, potatoes, carrying a bag from door to door; we apply to rich and poor; the poor give us as freely as the rich; potatoes are what we commonly get from every one; gentlemen may now and then give us a halfpenny or a penny; that is the best we get from them, and we do not come across many of them; they are not plenty in our country; we apply to 40 poor men for one gentleman, and the difference of what they give is little.

" When we are at home in winter, we collect as much potatoes as we can eat; when we are out in spring and summer, we collect about two stone a day; we would consume three, if we had them. I have no means of getting clothes; you see what my clothes are, and it is strange enough you ask how I got such things. I have not had a new coat for seven years; even that I got by my wife's begging, before I begged myself; she begged the wool, bit by bit, and spun it at home for me; she spent four months wandering about the country gathering it (six pounds in all), begging at the same time for food for herself and children. This is a cast-off coat I got, some weeks ago, from a relation that had not it to spare himself; it is old and ragged, it is true, but he might have worn it, on a mild day, if he had not given it to me; my wife has never gathered any wool of late; she finds it difficult enough to get potatoes for our large family. The gown my wife wears to-day (it is not worth naming) she bought 13 years ago, and has not bought one since; by great management she kept it so long; she strove to spare it; I think it was worth sparing for six or seven years; on a fine day she would lay it aside, and do without a gown, and now and then a woman she has been doing a job for has given her a cast-off gown; that she has worn for three or four months, and given the other a rest for so long; she has no cloak, but when she goes out to beg, wraps an old sheet about her. My eldest daughter is 17 years old; but for her I could not live at all; she does not hire; she carries the weak children, when we beg, away from home; she works occasionally while at home here, in winter, scutching flax, spinning or picking potatoes; she gets sometimes 4*d.*, sometimes as low as 1½*d.* a day, with her food; if she could always get work at this rate, we would be very thankful, but the most she gets is one month's work in the whole year; whatever wages she earns in this way she gives to me for tobacco, it relieves my chest, and if I had the means of getting it, I believe I would live double the time. Though she is going almost naked, she would not buy herself a stitch of clothes; she has not had any clothes since the time I attempted the journey work three years ago; she then got a cotton gown; that cost just 2*s.* 4½*d.* The way she got it was this; she bought a little pig for 6*d.*; we were able to rear this, on the refuse of our potatoes, for three months, while I was working; at the end of that time we began to beg again; she sold it for 5*s.* 6*d.*, and bought the gown; the remainder of the price went for potatoes; she has got no clothes since. My second daughter, a girl of 13 years, was hired with my brother one quarter this year, and one quarter last year, at 2*s.* 6*d.* per quarter; 3*s.* of her wages gave her all the clothes she has had for some years, a cotton gown; the other 2*s.* I had drawn for tobacco.

" You may judge from these how the rest of the family are clothed. My son that I spoke of is dead, while we were begging away from home two years ago; he took a bad cold and cough; he never had a day's health since his cough turned to a decay; I could give him no sort of indulgences, and I have been looking at him these two years dying by inches; we have had lodging (gratis) during his last sickness, about a fortnight, with an old widow that lives by herself, in a cabin of her own, and is supported by her children. He was a week on his bed, and I had no other food for him than potatoes and boiled cabbage and salt. He died yesterday, and I am begging what will bury him to-day."

In the year 1834, the number of families who received food, from charitable funds, in the parish of Boyle, was 300. At last Christmas, Mr. Devine ascertained the number to be about 40, to whom he administered relief. Mr. Mulhall stated, that the resident poor amounted to from 50 to 60 persons, whose names are on his own charity list. He thought there was no perceptible increase of the number of resident paupers within the last 10 years. Mr. Foreman remembered distinctly when there were not above 20 beggars in the town; "they are now grown out of all count;" he judged of the want of employment by the morning market. If a man wanted 100 labourers, he could always find them willing to take work, and unable to obtain it, except during the months of May, September and October. These men are not, in general, natives of this parish. Mr. Lloyd thought he perceived every grade in society deteriorated within the last 10 years.

The period of the year at which vagrancy is most common, is during the months of July and August; the spring labour is over, and in most seasons the turf-cutting also; and there is no employment after that till the harvest begins. It is during these months that provisions are most scarce. There are hardly any able-bodied men begging. In the town and its vicinity there are from 20 to 25 boys and young men, from the age of 12 to 20; their only industry consists in playing pitch and toss; if any outrages on property occur, they are invariably the objects of suspicion, as they are a general nuisance. Many old persons of both sexes beg, but by far the greater number are women, with families of young children. The strangers generally go about in families, the residents do not. Very few, except those who attend the coaches, beg on Sunday, for which day "they have a respect." Many of the townspeople give the poor their dinner on Sundays, because their own dinner on that day is usually better than on week days, and the beggars get share of the comforts going. The wife or children of employed labourers or cottier tenants seldom beg. There is a distinction to be observed between cottiers who pay 40*s.* per acre, and work a considerable portion of their time for the landlord, and the con-acre men, who pay 7*l.* or 8*l.* for a corn or potatoe acre. Those who hold con-acre ground generally reside in the neighbouring town or village; the cottier invariably lives on his land, and in addition to his tilled ground, has the grass of a cow. The families of cottiers are seldom known to beg; those of con-acre men sometimes do. Mechanics are very seldom reduced to beggary. No instances were known of servants begging. A greater number of servants, in proportion, emigrate to England or America, than of any other class. The wages of females is from 20*s.* to 40*s.* a year, in the country; of men, from 4*l.* to 10*l.*; the consequence is, that few good servants are to be had; as soon as they can save enough they go away. Cottier tenants, except in a few instances, have not been known to go into parts of the country, where they are not known, to beg. No cases have been known where small farmers have transferred their property to their children, and adopted a vagrant life. Lord Lorton has frequently seen, both in this country and in England, persons begging whom he knew to be natives of this county and district. Most of those, however, who go to England for work, take as much food as they can conveniently carry, for use on the road. Some few would doubtless try to save whatever trifle of money they might have, and get themselves on by charity; but they can travel at so small an expense that this does not frequently become an object with them. It is a common saying among them, that 5*s.* would bring a man from Mayo to the fens country (Lincolnshire.)—(Thomas Bradshaw.)—(Captain Robertson.)

The greater part are country labourers, coming from the county Mayo.

"As well as I can remember," said Mr. Mulhall, "all whom I now relieve were always beggars; but many of their children have, by various means, frequently owing to the efforts of the parents in their behalf, been raised from beggary, and rendered useful members of society." Mr. M. has also known several instances of the children taking the support of the parents on themselves, and thus rescuing them from the degradation of mendicancy. The people, said Lord Lorton, are well disposed to work; and, although they have been kept in a degraded state for centuries, till they have become willing to receive charity, I believe that, could employment be given to the able-bodied population, they would require and wish for little additional relief.

A beggar, well up to the business, might obtain about a stone of potatoes, except in the "very scarce months;" two stone of potatoes would be a good gathering. Mr. Manghan knew one clever fellow, who, because he could sing well, often got from one to two hundred weight in a day; he used to come home as soon as his bag was filled, and then set out again. Two stone and a half of potatoes would give a parent and three children two meals a day. It is very uncertain whether in towns they obtain much from passengers. Those who attend the coaches are more importunate than any other description of vagrants, and are considered the worst class. They obtain much more from private carriages than from coaches or cars; the doors of the inn are constantly beset by them.

There are only two or three beggars at each of the doors of places of worship. In the country the amount of relief is increased according to the number of children, "but in towns charity is given with little or no discrimination. The man loiters about out of sight, as it would not be advantageous for him to be seen; and when the mother has got what she can, some of the children are sent to seek alms from the same person. The infirm, in all cases, are sure to excite the greatest sympathy."

Beggars frequently sell, as they go along, the potatoes that they have received in charity. It is no uncommon thing to see beggars selling one, two or three sacks of potatoes in the town markets at an underprice. Mr. Bradshaw knew one man, a beggar, and who had never been any thing better, who had the best pig in Boyle. Many of the beggars purchase pigs with the money they acquire by the sale of potatoes. Strolling beggars are unwilling to be too well clad, but residents are generally thankful for clothing, as it could answer no purpose with them to assume a wretched appearance, as they could not successfully practise deception where they are known. The winter is the harvest time of the itinerant beggar.

The able-bodied men, with some rare exceptions, are not found begging. The women are usually mothers, to whom agricultural labour would not be offered, and during five-sixths of the year there is no other employment open to them. There is a particular class of beggars, called "boccoughs," who resort to deceptive means of exciting compassion; they are usually found at fairs and markets, are the most immoral class among the poor, and are believed, in their mode of living, to resemble gypsies. Boccough is an Irish word, signifying a beggar who strolls about, affecting the appearance of impotence or scrofulous disease. Mr. Crofton has sometimes had false recommendations or statements brought to him, but has never known them to be given by one beggar to another. The poor are in general disposed to have their diseased or impotent children provided for, as they are a heavy and disheartening burthen upon them; but there are also many who, from a fear of proselytism, are unwilling to send them to institutions, "where they are generally not reared in their father's creed."—(Mr. O' Brien.)——Those who have children peculiarly afflicted often take them about insufficiently clad, to excite greater sympathy.

Vagrants in towns are frequently drunkards, and many of them are guilty of petty thefts; in the country they are generally as moral as the other classes. The practised town beggars would do any thing; the idle young men are the worst. Some instances have occurred where they have been concerned in burglaries. Strangers who beg have frequently been detected shoplifting. They have never been known to have been engaged in assassinations. The confirmed vagrants would be unwilling to emigrate to America; they have never done so. They never go to England or Scotland in search of work. They are strongly attached to their children, and do not deliberately injure or ill-treat them. In general they save little or nothing; but Thomas Bradshaw remembered a beggar once, coming to his father's house, declaring himself destitute, and very ill; he remained some hours; food was given to him, but he got rapidly worse, and felt himself dying; he then offered a man half a guinea if he would go to a considerable distance, and bring to him on the following morning a woman, who turned out to be his daughter; when, in two days after, he died, the woman found forty guineas secreted in his dress; "but he must have been a coiner, as I never heard before or since of any thing equal to it." Beggars usually go about with four or five children; one or two of whom may perhaps be borrowed, but the witnesses did not know that they hired them.

"There is not above half employment," said Mr. Crofton, "for the able-bodied male population." "The beggar," said T. Bradshaw, "is better off a great deal than the labourer; but I would not go out to beg for all that."

Those who give, seldom inquire the character of the beggar. They are disposed, from benevolence, to give, and feel bound to do so, from religious duty, to all who are in want. The prevalence of private charity is not injurious to the morals of the labouring classes. It certainly does not in general induce idleness; for so much of shame attaches to the act of begging, that none are known to abandon industry for such a mode of life. Work is seldom offered to beggars, as there are but too many respectable housekeepers to whom a preference ought of course to be given, and for whom no work is found. I am obliged, said Lord Lorton, to refuse many who apply to me for employment.

The clothing of beggars is in general miserable; little clothing is given them in charity. The want of night clothing is lamentably general; and, from the grown up children of both sexes being obliged to huddle together, many instances have been known of crimes the most revolting. Potatoes, milk and meal are the ordinary description of food given. The farmers prefer giving food to money. It depends in a great degree on the comparative price of food whether the poor would prefer money or not.

There is no calculation ordinarily made by farmers of the quantity of food which they ought to give away. If 50 call, 50 are relieved. There are few pensioners on the county, of families. "I believe it," said Mr. Crofton, "to be a bad principle of relief, which assures any person of support, to which he himself is bound to contribute nothing." Some few of the farmers and shopkeepers may give away as much as would enable them to maintain an additional workman, but in general they do not. Mr. Mulhall gives in money 3*s.*, upon two days in each week, dividing it amongst upwards of 50 persons, who obtain, in like manner, a few pence from other residents in the town. None, however, give away more, and very few so much; and 6*s.* a week could hardly maintain a married labourer who has children.

The relief of beggars falls principally on the middle classes; the hall-door is shut, where the shop-door cannot be. The gentry no doubt give liberally in many ways that are not so obvious to the eye; but, in proportion to their means, the small farmers and shopkeepers are generally believed to contribute more. "The labouring people," said Manghan, "possessed of half an acre or an acre of ground, give as long as the potatoes hold out; they are willing willing to share their meals with the passing beggar; and, after they have begun to buy food for themselves, they will at least give a night's lodging, or, may be, something to eat."

The value of food or money which a small shopkeeper in Boyle will give away, varies from 4*d.* to 3*s.*, twice in the week. On the question, whether any person gave away so much as to leave themselves destitute, Captain Robertson remarked, "The cause and effect, if relative, are not taken into consideration; and it would be exceedingly difficult to say accurately whether indiscriminate bounty really has such a consequence. The only case I know, was that of a person who, while in the upper ranks of society, was remarkable for his liberality, and subsequently became the victim of poverty himself." J. Manghan said, "I would rather give 40*s.* in my own way, to whom I chose, throughout the year, than pay one shilling annually, and not have leave to do the other. I would have a greater satisfaction in myself at giving with my own hand to the hungry, and I think I would have a greater reward."

Relief is sometimes extorted by importunity, even if there were any institution close at hand where the beggar would be certain of relief. Bradshaw said, "he would continue to feel it a duty to give the beggar, as long as the provision was such as he himself, if the world went astray with him, would not accept;" and supposing the relief could not be found fault with, but that, in the establishment, husbands and wives, or parents and children, were separated, "I would think it hard," said he, "when I had reared my children by hard labour to part with them for that or any thing else of the kind." "I would sooner," said O'Brien, "take my wife and children to beg, in some place where I would not be known." "There are some who give," said the same witness, "because they would just as soon not have the beggar's curse. This superstitious feeling is not so prevalent as formerly." Mr. Devine did not believe that any were induced to give from this motive.

The typhus fever was spread through the country by the practice of giving a night's lodging to vagrants. Mr. Devine did not believe the morality of the labourer was injured by this association, but rather supposed that generous feelings were excited by the practice. The talk of the peasantry round the fire at night, with wanderers, to whom they give shelter, is oftener, said Mr. Foreman, about matters that immediately interest themselves; where work is plenty; what crops have failed; what trade is beginning to look upward, &c. &c., than of political matters; though in unquiet times vagrants no doubt repeat at one place what they hear at another; they are often useful in spreading really advantageous information. It was by them that the million potatoes (a very productive kind) were first brought into Roscommon. The parent will often save sufficient to raise the child from pauperism, and some cases have been known of their accumulating money enough to portion their daughters. The children also, frequently, by their industry, rescue their parents from mendicancy.

No punishments have been inflicted for vagrancy in this district. Captain Duckworth and Mr. Lloyd would most willingly enforce any law for the suppression of mendicancy, if the provision for the poor were such as they individually, and the majority of the better class would approve. Mr. Crofton and Captain Robertson object to any system that would render the acceptance of relief compulsory.

There is no house of industry or mendicity institution in the barony. "I should not," said Lord L. "approve of any system of in-door or out-door relief, except some place which would give free labour to the able-bodied." "Those who beg," said Mr. Mulhall, "would not listen to the proposal of relief if confinement or the separation of families were a condition of it. I cannot believe that the country could bear such a tax as a plan of relieving all the poor would require; were such a mode adopted, and that I was legally bound to contribute, I should not think it right to diminish the amount which I may now voluntarily give away; I should however be glad to see street begging, if possible, put an end to."

Lord Lorton proposes that an acreable tax should be placed on the landlords to raise sufficient funds for all public works, (such as roads, &c.) now executed through the medium of grand juries, and for many others, such as canals, improvement of inland navigation, &c.; the performance of the work to be directed and inspected by civil engineers. Were this done, all that the people want, employment, would be given; the absentee proprietors would thereby be made to contribute their share, and we should be secure against the evils of poor laws. Mr. Lloyd stated that there were, within a circumference of five miles, 500 men paying 20*s.* for a cabin and garden, and eight guineas per acre.

THE number of beggars in the town is under a hundred, but vagrancy has been greatly on the increase, it is double what it was ten years ago, owing to the loss of the flax and linen trade, and besides, many who had small portions of land have been dispossessed of them.

From the latter end of May to the beginning of August is the season when vagrancy most prevails, when the wives and children of the Mayo labourers beg in great numbers in this district, whilst their husbands are at work in England. The number of strangers among them is three times greater than residents, and they come principally from Mayo and Galway. Captain Gray stated that some dozens had applied to him in the last month, not one of whom he knew. They consist generally of young mothers, with children under ten years of age; in the summer months, there are in proportion a greater number of old persons begging; in winter, the Mayo men lock up their houses and leave their cattle at grass till they return. Their wives are supposed to go along with them in most cases to Leinster and England. These are known by the name of "spalpeens." Amongst the beggars a great minority are of the infirm, and on Sunday a few of the women only beg. The earnings of a labourer are not sufficient to support his family, and consequently they are obliged to beg; but generally in this parish the cottiers are not known to beg, they have an acre of ground and a hut, for which they pay about 3*l.* and this exempts them from the necessity of begging; people in trade beg, and mechanics too to a greater degree than formerly; weavers, paper-makers, &c., these beg themselves more than the cottiers, but the wives and children of the latter, however, do so oftener than those of the mechanics. Cottier tenants never go into parts of the country where they are not known, to beg, but in many instances small farmers have made over their farms on their sons, and have gone begging; two cases are mentioned to have taken place in this parish; the first, a man of the name of Plunket, made over a farm of 10 acres on his son, and is now begging, being turned adrift by his ungrateful son; the other case was, a farmer who made over a property of about 10 acres on his son, at his marriage; he was shortly after turned out to beg upon a Christmas eve.

Those going to England for work generally take some provision with them, oaten cakes, &c.; many of them do not beg, "although," says Kelly, "I have been myself obliged to do so when my money was run out, in England."

Two hundred Mayo men have been seen going through this village in one day in June. They come generally from the country, the natives of towns seldom beg out of them.

The greatest number are those reduced by casual misfortune. Coulon, the potter examined, states, "I know one man of my own trade, who has lately been forced to go to Leinster to dig potatoes, and whose wife and six children are now begging in this parish; some years ago I myself could get half as much more for my goods as I can now, and it is not the fault of the times that I am not begging my bread."

The proportion who take to begging, from the facilities it affords of subsistence, is very small. A man in this parish is now paying 2*l.* per annum for a half an acre of potatoes; he has scarcely any employment, and is far worse off than if he was begging.

At the present season, some might obtain a stone and a half of potatoes in the day, but in summer a beggar would not obtain near so much, seldom more meal in a day than half a pint. Captain Gray states, "I have known beggars collect more than a hundred weight of potatoes in the day;" very few mendicants attend at divine worship; one or two wait at the doors to obtain alms from those who come out.

If a woman had no children she probably would get half a dozen potatoes; only two or three more if she had nine or ten; a man without children would get nothing, but with several children, without a mother, is deemed a greater object. Dr. Blundell illustrated the custom of beggars, after begging together, applying separately for relief with success: "A blind man and his son were relieved at my house some days ago; in less than an hour after a woman with several children obtained relief there; on going out of my gate I found them sitting together, and on questioning found them to be of the same family." With regard to the quantity obtained, the infirm person obtains more than an able-bodied beggar, from compassion. A woman with children too is better off than a woman without them. Glancy, a farmer, states, "that on one occasion a woman came to him and begged relief for the five children she had with her; when questioned, she said her husband was gone to England to work; that they had locked up their cabin, and left a cow and a heifer at grass, to have them to sell in the beginning of winter, to help them to pay the rent."

In the country the beggars exchange the surplus for tobacco and snuff, and sometimes sell a part and purchase milk, or some herrings; and sometimes they buy a blanket or the makings of a shirt, and as to laying by for winter, the reverse is the case; they sometimes lay up in winter for the distress of summer; the case of one beggar was mentioned, who saved enough, up the country, to raise his family to a tolerable sort of comfort and decency.

They usually beg under the plea that they can get no work. Glancy, the farmer, says that in spring and harvest he has 20 applications for work more than he can employ, yet he never set them to work that they refused or neglected it. There are two persons in the town who encourage the appearance of rags and dirt; one, a cripple, the other a blind man, who attend on the bridge every market-day; it is generally believed also, that they make their sores worse for the purpose of exciting pity, and sometimes even feigned the appearance of being deformed; one man, who had contrived, by means of some bandage, to give his hand the appearance of being withered, has been seen, when intoxicated, to box with both hands, and nothing the matter with them.

A person was for a long time in the habit of receiving alms at fairs and markets in this and the adjoining baronies, who was commiserated as a destitute old man; suspicion, however, from some cause led to this person's being watched, and when the mask was removed from the face, it appeared not to be that of an old man, but of a middle aged woman. False representations in writing are not known here, nor do the resident poor refuse good clothes; on the contrary, they are very thankful if they can receive them, and willingly wear them; one instance, however, yet altogether without parallel, took place about two or three years ago, of a woman in a neighbouring village exposing herself quite destitute of clothes. They do not seem reluctant to get their sores cured; many of them seek for medical relief at the dispensary, who are afflicted with scrofulous diseases. There does hot appear to have arisen any mischief to women enceinte from any disgusting exhibitions of maimed or diseased persons; the lower orders are so constantly in the habit of seeing them that no such effect could be produced, and the upper classes seldom come into contact with them. With respect to their children, they sometimes expose them in rags, during the wet and cold, for the purpose of making them excite sympathy, but in other respects they are not unkind to them, and though they endeavour to make what they can of them, yet it was thought that in all cases they would be willing to allow their children who were maimed in any way to go into a suitable asylum.

The strangers are generally decent and honest poor creatures; if they were not they would not come from their own place to depend on the gratuity of such as do not know them. It is shame that sends them; nor were they known to be concerned in any outrages on person or property nor in any assassinations, fortunately there are no such crimes in the district. Many of them have been known not to possess the means to go to England to work. They seem strongly attached to their children, and they have been known to extend the charity given to themselves to others more destitute than they were.

In the point of hoarding their earnings the following cases were stated by Coulon and Kelly the labourers. A woman blind from her youth, who had been for years supported by begging in the town and neighbourhood, left at her death 26*l.* to her niece. A woman who had been all her life a beggar, died about two years ago at a farmer's not a great way off from this; about six weeks after a young woman called and asked for the clothes of the deceased; when examined nothing of any value was found, but a child who was standing near, said, he had thrown the beggar's pocket on the roof of the house, and he had enough to do to get it up there, it was so heavy; on being obtained, the pocket was found to contain "thirty golden guineas."

Their families more frequently consist of four or five than of six or seven, and on the point of marriage the priest stated, he never had been applied to to marry a beggar. Gaffney the mason explained, that they cannot afford to be married by the priest, but they pass their words to one another, and that stands as good as the gospel to them. There is a place near Stokestown, in the adjoining barony, where they assemble every year in immense numbers; at this fair, called the fair of Ballinafad, the beggars are married for a year. The ceremony is performed by joining the hands of the parties over a pair of crutches, and hundreds return to have the rite renewed year after year.

As to whether an able-bodied man could collect more by begging than he could by working, it was deemed he could not; that he would not be taken notice of. The only wages he could get would be food. This the trading beggar would not take, and it is seldom offered to the decent working man. "I have known it in hard seasons taken," said Glancy the farmer, "but for my part I could not have the heart to take a poor fellow's labour for the food he would eat." Four or five months are the most that labourers, without land, can get employment; the cottiers are with less profitable wages, and can obtain work not much longer, and it is certain that they are much worse off in food and clothing than the sturdy beggar. The latter cannot indeed himself obtain much, but when he goes about with his children he is well off.

In nineteen cases out of twenty no inquiry is made into the character of the applicant, or his condition. It is believed that none take to begging from choice; it is considered a disgrace to a family if any of them turn to begging; Gaffney, the mason, mentioned the following case in confirmation. "I know a respectable farmer who supported himself and his three daughters last year for the space of seven weeks, by bleeding his cows and eating cakes made of meal, and the blood thus obtained, having no other food during all this time but cabbages; and all this for pride." In answer to the question whether beggars would work at the ordinary wages, Glancy stated, "that no one would give work to a known beggar; but this class are not comparatively numerous; and so far from any disinclination to work existing among the accidentally distressed, that many and many a time have men come to me, and worked for me when I had any hurry of labour; refusing to take any wages, wishing to show their gratitude for my having given them work six months before."

It is a very general practice; the poor cottier is often glad to share the surplus provisions of the beggar to whom he gives shelter, as remuneration; Glancy mentions this, because an instance of a decent cottier doing so, and acknowledging it to him, recently occurred, and he had reason to believe it was far from uncommon.

The farmers give potatoes, milk and meal. The gentry, when they are kind, give soup and broken meat. The shopkeepers give money, soap or tobacco; money indeed is rather precious now, and though generally the beggar would rather have it, but not so when hunger is pinching; a meal of meat from a gentleman's house is worth more than all a beggar would get from any one in coin.

A strong farmer would give perhaps from 20 to 30 alms (as much as the two hands can hold together), in the day, probably about a shilling's worth of potatoes. The small farmers give according to their means, from two to four-pence worth of food in the day. There are no pensioners entirely supported by private families in the parish, except 14 or 15 old persons on Lord Mountsanford's property, but many householders are pensioners for a meal upon the inhabitants of the town. One shopkeeper of the name of M'Dermott gives 5*s.* a week to the poor; about three or four in the town of Castlerea give a half a crown each, and perhaps a dozen who give a shilling a week. Kelly, a labourer, being asked, said, "I would support myself and family on 4*s.* a week." Gaffney asked him how could a labouring man maintain himself and three children on such a sum, when it was well known that the beggars paid 3*s.* a week for lodging; no, 7*s.* a week was nearer the truth, with less than this a man could never have a sup of milk or a bit of a herring. When it was asked whether the farmers planted potatoes in portions set aside for the beggars, Coulon the potter said, "they plant more more potatoes in many instances than they require for their own use, that their hands may not be empty while their hearts are full, but I do not suppose they ever make a calculation as to the amount."

The relief of the poor falls chiefly on those holding from 10 to 50 acres, inasmuch as they and the shopkeepers are more open to the beggar; the shop-door is always open, and if the gentlemen's gates are not shut against the beggar, the hall doors are, so that it was thought the poorer and the working classes give much more in proportion than the richer classes. They will continue to give even after they themselves have begun to buy food; and they have been frequently seen to share the last basketfull of potatoes.

The effect of the indiscriminate mode of giving, often leads to waste with the "boccoghs;" they convert the surplus into whiskey, and thereby waste what is given; but the really poor always turn what they have over of food into clothing or money.

A farmer with 10 acres might give half a stone of potatoes in the day, but how much the good kind of shopkeepers give, it would be impossible to say; they will not tell you, nor those they give it to; many a one, that would sooner quit the country than be known to beg, has been kept, them and their families, by the secret charities of these men.

It has not been known to have done any injury to poor farmers or labourers that they gave profusely, though there was no doubt but many who beg during the summer, when they go home and dig their potatoes, share them during the rest of the year with those who are worse off than themselves. When Glancy was asked, "whether the farmers and shopkeepers would like to give a regular sum, and get rid of the annoyance of beggars;" he said, "I would rather give with my own hand to those I knew wanted it, than place it in the hands of others to distribute; this is the general opinion; and how could any one know as well as the well-intentioned neighbour what the poor man wants, and what would do him good; and even if I could subscribe in kind, I'd rather give twice as much my own way."

Importunity sometimes extorts relief, chiefly on the road, when a sturdy beggar meets a respectable person; but Kelly, the labourer, says, religion is the very thing, and their own good-heartedness besides; of course that actuates them to give. The farmer and the shopkeeper would still feel bound to give, even if there were an institution to relieve, while the people were opposed to such a provision; and the catholic curate, Mr. Boyd, said, "he had no doubt that at first it would be looked on by the mass of the people with abhorrence, but that would soon wear off."

Threats sometimes have succeeded as a means of obtaining relief; Captain Gray says, "a man has succeeded in extorting alms at my own house, by threats of helping himself;" as another cause of giving, too many are induced to give, to gain the poor man's prayers for themselves, and the repose of the souls of their relations in another world; some too no doubt are frightened into giving through fear of the beggar's imprecation.

They are believed to spread fevers. There are a number of wretched houses in a part of the town of Castlerea, called Arm, where the beggars are always sure of finding lodging. They sometimes pay for it, very often they do not. The payment consists in dividing the spoils of the day's begging with those who possess the cabin; the worst description of mendicants is known to congregate here. The vagrants who wander about are certainly less strict than the residents who give them relief in the way of shelter, and the latter become more reluctant to give them a night's lodging, according as they become more respectable themselves. The large farmers are not asked to give shelter, as the barn is cold, while the cottiers kitchen is warm, and they are generally put to sleep around the fire.

Kelly said, with regard to the conduct of the beggars, "that his mother was giving night's lodging to the poor for 60 years, and she never lost any thing by it; she lives in a country parish."

When Glancy was asked if the vagrant often returns to industry, mentioned the following case: "a man of the name of Quigly was in the habit of going during 10 years to England for work, and whose wife and children used constantly to beg sometimes in England and sometimes here, saved as much as enabled him to pay 7 l. fine for a nine acre farm; he pays 28*s.* an acre, and his entire family are well conducted, and doing well in the world."

The vagrancy laws have never been put in force, the threat of executing them has sometimes been usefully employed. To the question whether the repugnance to harsh laws against vagrants would not be removed if a provision were made excluding the chance of starvation, O'Connor Don replied, "there are many magistrates who would feel reluctant to enforce the laws against vagrants, though they themselves approved of the provision, if the poor were not willing to accept it." As to destitution being the cause of outrage, outrage is not immediately referable to destitution; but may be ten years after a man has been turned out, the house would be burned.

There is no house of industry in the parish; as to the feeling about going into a house of industry, the following are the views of the witnesses; "I would rather work all the year through up to my hips in water, than go in."—(Kelly.)——"I think there would be a strong reluctance to separation of families or confinement, but I think some would avoid privation by accepting a public provision."—(O'Connor Don.)——In reply to the question, would the personal confinement or separation of families be an objection? "The privation of freedom or the separation of husband and wife, or mother and child, would be a material objection, but I should say, not an insuperable one."—(O'Connor Don.)——"Quite insuperable," said a respectable man who was standing near; "if I was distressed, and had no food for my wife and children, I would take the provision, supposing they were as well provided for as myself, but I would not like to be divorced."—(Gaffney.)——"I think if a provision were made, many would refuse alms, and thereby contribute to obviate the necessity of enforcing the vagrancy laws; each man would give or withhold, according as he individually approved or disapproved of the provision."—(Dr. Blundell.)——" Whatever objections the conditions annexed to the provision might occasion, in a short time, when they became satisfied that the institution was properly managed, their reluctance to enter would give way before the pressure of want and wretchedness, that bear on them; there would be much less reluctance to it if the female children were left with their mothers."—(Mr. M'Dermott.)

IN every fashion, there are about 60 families in the parish of Killenvoy, all of whom are compelled to beg during some portion of the year; of these, about 30 or 40 persons support themselves altogether by charity, but there are many more whose spirit will not allow them to beg, that are far worse off than those who beg. There are many come to begging that never looked to it, from the undoing of the linen and flax and woollen trades. Mr. Byrne does not think there is less employment than formerly. Kenny's account of the cause of vagrancy increasing, is as follows.

" In my opinion the rise and fall of the prices of corn is what has done us so much mischief of late; 10 years ago there were not half so many changes as there have been ever since, and I do not know which is worse for the poor farmer, the fall or the rise; when the market tumbles, where is the rent; and when the price gets up in a hurry, where is the food. I would rather take my chance and have it steady, either at the top or the bottom of the line, than never to be sure I had a house over my head, or that the food in my hand would not make away with itself before it got into my mouth.

" The June and July vagrancy is most common, owing to the failures of food and the scarcity of work at that time. The persons relieved are in general strangers; people are delicate to be seen in ruin where they are known; this feeling takes them to many a wild road when they are come to nought; the men go to England and Leinster, the women and infirm of both sexes beg; there are fewer women with families than single. Three to one of the men who beg are unfit for work, as able-bodied strangers do not come into this part of the country, the wages being too low to tempt them; the fair average of wages in this district is 6*d.* a day without food. Those earning subsistence by labour on week-days are not in the habit of begging on Sundays; there is less of begging on Sundays, yet they are seldom seen at prayers. It sometimes happens that when the labourer is employed, his wife and children are begging. A man of the name of Moor is at present employed at 6 d. a day with diet, and his wife and children are begging. Rogers is a cottier in this parish, a decent man enough, he gets work as often as any man of the sort in the parish; his wife is dead, but his children beg, whether he has work or not. Mr. Byrne Glennon has four acres under me at 18 s. an acre; he worked part of a con-acre, rent of which was 5 l. 10 s.; six years ago his wife and children disappeared from this neighbourhood, and remained six weeks from home. They admitted afterwards they had been begging in an adjoining country, they never begged where they were known; I believe this to be the only case of 18 cottiers, who hold under me for many years. Mechanics are generally well off; a carpenter or mason will get from 1 s. to 2 s. with diet; none of them beg."

The cottiers, or any other class of able-bodied labourers, are not to be met with in any numbers as strangers in this district; the fact may perhaps be accounted for by the extremely low rate of wages. There is a practice very prevalent among the small farmers at an advanced age, of transferring their farms to their children, but the old people sometimes retain a small portion to secure their own support, yet they are, when poverty presses hard upon the children, in some cases turned adrift. Men on their way to England or Leinster do not often beg through the country. Mr. Byrne says, " I have frequently seen men returning, offered work at 10 d. a day, and refuse; they had a chance, but a slight one, of procuring higher wages elsewhere; they have not, however, applied upon any occasion for employment when on their return. One man came to me about four months since, and asked his breakfast; I offered him 6 d. a day and his food, which he refused working for, he was going to England, he said, for the harvest."

To the question, whether vagrants were generally natives of towns or of county districts; Mr. Fitzgerald, catholic clergyman said, " there are 10 to one more habitual vagrants in the town than there are in the county," and therefore, I think, as well as because the professional vagrants would soon be detected and resisted, that mendicity, that is, almsgiving to professional professional vagrants, might be put an end to, without making any provision for the industrious and able-bodied portion of the community."

The children of beggars are scarcely ever beggars themselves. The daughters go to service, or marry, the sons generally enlist; I think they are more apt to do so than the sons of other men, and that is very natural for them, as they have no little settlement or land to look to, besides they are not fixed by their affection to any particular place more than another.

When J. Rattigan, an able-bodied beggar, was asked how much he could collect in the course of a day, he said, "I am sure I might walk the country through and not get a meal, unless it might be somebody that would offer me share of his own, if I happened to be in the way at the time; but for any thing else it is better for me to keep out of sight; and I stay a mile generally behind my wife and children on the road; they beg, and the people are good to them; God reward them for the same. I never ask; I'd get nothing." Little can be obtained by beggars from carriages passing through the parish, as scarcely any conveyances pass through the district.*

The quantity of food given to vagrants depends on the number of the family. The long family gets most; there are few but look to the number; and after applying together they often separate, and apply again with success. Coniton saw a woman apply, and afterwards the children, to the same person, and both with success. As to whether an able-bodied beggar would not earn more than another, J. Rattigan states, "we are not afraid of wanting food, enough of potatoes is all we can expect; one day and another are very different; we can't travel more than from two to three miles in the day, for the children are young, and some of them weakly. I could do that of a fine day, not the half of it if it was wet; a stone and a half of potatoes is the most we could reckon on in a day; sometimes only half a stone; one day we got two stone."

Upon the management of their surplus funds by vagrants, James Rattigan, the beggar, says, "I would take as much food as I could get, for when I had used enough to stop the hunger, I could sell the rest as I went along."

"All I could put together in money would not do more than put clothes on my own and my children's backs; it would not be worth laying by. I might not get entirely so much if we were well clothed, but still I would be glad to be able to get some little comfortable decencies for the children, for they are very naked."

It was not considered possible for beggars to lay by part of their earnings in summer for support in winter, as they cannot get, one day with another, more than they actually want for present necessity.

Evidence of James Rattigan, a labouring man, out of employment, who supports himself, his wife and six children by begging.

Is a native of Ballingar, about 21 miles from this (the village of Licarrow); was a tenant under Mr. Young; held one acre of ground at 1 l. 15 s. a year, for 12 years; had a con-acre beside, for which he paid 8 l. an acre; lived on these, and got worse every year, till at last it sent me to beg; had always continued to pay this rent: was turned out because I could not register out of the land; was turned out at Christmas; all the potatoes I had were used by the end of March; was forced to go about the country in search of work till May; during that time my wife and six children begged; sometimes near the place where I could get an odd day's work, sometimes away from me; went to England; have gone over for work every year these last nine years; never took my wife or family across the channel; it is a poor place for them that are not well spoken in English; think they may be better off here, though they don't get bacon or cheese, or white bread from the farmers here; at home it is a rare thing not to be able to have a warm shelter; in England they are put into cold barns to sleep. I made 3 l. 10 s. by my last trip; have 1 l. 5 s. of it left still; must keep that to pay the rent of a rood of con-acre I have in Ballingar; I mean to go back in November, and live as I can on the potatoes I'll have out of that rood, through the winter; it would not do to begin at the potatoes so soon as this; did not look for work in Ballingar; there is a new road making there; could get 6 d. a day at it; would not work for that; don't like working for such wages in my own place, because my family would be about me in spite of me, and a short way 6 d. a day would go, unless they used the potatoes that we must save for the end of the winter. The winter is a starving time to beg, in wet and wind; have a good deal of friends that will help me to get on better through the season coming round, than if I was to be wandering then; never begged till this year; never begged in England; hardly ever ask any thing myself now; share what my wife and children earn; sometimes get a chance day's work at 6 d. and diet; know (that for this year) that is nearly now over; would not take six months regular work at 6 d. and diet upon the new road in Ballingar; would rather Coniton (the labourer, whose evidence is annexed, then present), would support me for nothing, than work, and have it of my own;† left the place where I was living with a friend in our own parish five days ago; when the people of the house were in bed, we started off; I would not have them, and others that know me from the time I was a child, see me setting out to beg my bread through the wide world. Between Tulsh and Roscommon some draymen carried us for nearly eight miles, and we walked the rest till we came here; have got one day's work to do in the neighbourhood with a farmer.‡

* The Union of Killenvoy lies chiefly between the road from Athlone to Roscommon, and the Shannon; there is no bridge across the Shannon nearer than seven miles, so that this district is completely out of the way; this will account for many striking statements in the following pages.

† Kenny, another witness who was present, when he heard this, exclaimed, with bitter scorn, "that is the worst word you ever spoke, unfortunate man!"

‡ Inquiry was made the following day, and it was found he had done the work without fault.

Beggars seldom offer themselves as ready to work; labour is everywhere known not to be too plentiful; but in hurried times they are sometimes offered work; some say they are sick, others refuse low wages; the most of them however take it and are thankful. It did not seem that decent clothing was any loss to a beggar, even as regards his chance of exciting pity; people rather imagine that one well clad is of a better caste, and not the practised mendicant. None present knew of any instances where the exposure of sores, by maimed or diseased persons, caused any injury to women with child.

There is but one, (a disabled servant,) who lives altogether upon charity that is ever seen drunk. Clothes have been frequently taken off of hedges by vagrants, and potatoe-pits said to be robbed by them. Coniton says, "I was left without enough myself last year, by having my potato-pits plundered; it was charged on the beggars; but I don't think it was the wandering man did it, for how could the beggar venture to be seen with much, and where could he put them? and it would have taken a whole gang to carry my twenty-five hundred weight out of the parish without having been seen." Beggars love their children as much as other people, if they comfort them equal to the rest; the mother will take the bit from her own mouth to give it to the child. They often also share with others more destitute than themselves. With regard to hoarding their earnings, it may be done by them in other places, but it was not thought they could manage it; one man was generally supposed to have had money by him; he died some time ago, and his daughter was married since; and on that occasion, (says the Rev. Mr. Fitzgerald,) "I know there was no money forthcoming."

Vagrants have generally four or five children.

With regard to the relative earnings of an able-bodied man begging or by labour, Mr. Elliott gives his opinion, "he could not obtain himself, by begging, enough to support himself; but, depending on what his wife and children are certain of obtaining, I should be inclined to say he might do as well by begging as by wages work. I have a man in my employment who can carry 50 stone on his back at a time, whom I only pay 3*l.* a year and his board; he went away not long since to seek better work, and failing, returned to me."

The knowledge of the character of those to whom relief is given must always be very trifling. The professional vagrant, except those impotent from age or sickness, always go away to beg; they would be soon known and resisted. It was not believed prejudicial to the morals of the labouring classes to retain the practice of private charity. As to whether vagrants are persons who prefer the wandering life, to that of the labourer with equal earnings, Coniton said, "the real sufferers are not the beggars but the miscrable tenants of half a dozen acres. Nothing but pride and shame could keep them from begging; and yet, in general, they do prevent them; I know this day 20 men more narrowly put, because they are overborne by the rest, than the strolling idler:"—and Kenny said on the same subject, "It is my opinion nothing will do us any good till an Act of Parliament values the land, and the landlords are kept from plucking one man and throwing him away, then taking up another and serving him in the same manner."

There is no effort ever made to ascertain from a beggar his previous earnings during the day, nor to discover his character, for you might ask and have a long story from each, but how could you know the truth; nine out of ten who get any thing were never seen before.

As to whether clothing was given to the poor, Kenny said, "we have not the means of getting clothing for ourselves; and poor as labourers are, we cottiers are called better off (though I do not imagine we are) than the beggars; but at the rate wool is going of late, the cottiers, small farmers and labourers may very soon go naked; high prices for wool, when there is no employment for the poor, takes the coat off of our backs, to put more money in the rich man's pocket:"—and Rattigan gives the following account of what beggars generally receive; "Since we left our place, and have been going about the world, the people have been very good to us; the children often get boiled potatoes and a good drink of milk each of them; buttermilk they get; new milk is never given away. We only got one penny since we left Ballingar (five days ago); I would rather have, if you gave me my choice, two stone and a half of potatoes, (that would give us all enough to eat,) than fourpence halfpenny, the price of one and a half stone; we could find use enough for the money if we had it, but I would rather have sufficient food, and a short way all the money we could get, would go without it."

There is no rule for charity, nor ought any great distinction be made; for though the real claims may be wide apart, no one who gives to many can tell it; an old person ought to have as much as an able-bodied man, and a child of seven years old will lavish as much as a boy of fourteen.

There are not in the parish any regular pensioners on the bounty of particular families; but many are propped by those who can afford it. Mr. Elliot mentions an instance:—"A man, named Higgans, came to me in the month of June last begging; I had known him when a comfortable farmer and possessing a dozen head of cattle, and not empty of money either. For several years he had been declining, owing to no misconduct of his own; he has still 25 acres, for which he pays 25*s.* per acre, but his stock have gone, one by one; and yet when the poor fellow came to me he seemed unwilling to ask for assistance; I gave him between five and six hundred of potatoes, two or three stone of meal, and about as much flour, besides other little matters; he offered me a few shillings in payment, which I of course refused. But he has worked every day since I would allow him without payment. I am sure he does it from gratitude, and if he could get hire-work anywhere else, I should wish and urge him to take it."

The relief of beggars falls chiefly on those who live near the road; the farmers give a deal, but they have not near as much to give as they used to have; but the poorer class give more by far than the rich in comparison; even the cottier and labourer give; it is a sin to ask them, but many of them do while they have potatoes of their own.

The mode of indiscriminate relief does not lead to any waste of provision, for they sell the surplus though they may not get as much for it as another.

To the question of how much a farmer of ten acres would give in a day? Kelly answered, "I hope God will keep an account of it, but I would not like to do it." And a small shopkeeper would give from a half to a quarter of a stone in the day of potatoes, in summer; less in winter. On the point, whether those of very small means gave so as to be afterwards injurious to themselves? Kelly said, "Bad as I am, I never turned a woman with children away from my door, such as it is. I have six children, and these three last summers I have had to buy potatoes for them; part is not paid for yet; and my children are not often, (thank God), but sometimes they are forced to look to some one else than their father for food:" and Coniton (to same question) said, "There is Egan and Gavan, and Connor and Fitzgerald, honest and good men, that never let the beggar go away empty from their doors, and their families beg now; and they get their dinner every Sunday from a shopkeeper in Lecarrow; they hold no land; I am sure they would work if they could get it."

Relief is generally given to vagrants through fear that the applicant is in great want. Kelly states, "two men of my own neighbourhood were half starved coming from England, this autumn; they had failed in attempting to get work, and it was well for them that the people are apt to think, when they see a poor fellow in a strange place, that may be he is in want, or I do not know how they would ever found their way back again." It was not considered that the fear of personal injury extorted relief; "but," said Kelly, "I'll tell you, Sir, the man that is in debt for the food that is eaten and gone, or the gale of rent before the last, is discontented, and I think is more apt to do harm than them that are not so." But Coniton said, "I do not think any thing of the sort; for if debt drove a man to be sinful, sure the best of us would be the worst; for I scarcely know a man that these last two years was not put in debt for his rent."

It was not thought that the dread of the beggars was a motive that frequently operated to induce the giving of relief.

The people are becoming more particular about giving a night's lodging to strangers than they used to be; the feeling is increasing against the practice, on the grounds of the vagrants being the means of spreading discontents and diseases through the country, and also on account of the frequent petty thefts committed in the houses of those who give shelter; within the last week a poor woman was robbed in this parish of her only blanket, by a woman to whom she had given lodging for several nights.

Those who have been for a long time in a vagrant condition sometimes return to industry; and their general desire is, to keep their children from following their own track.

There have been no punishments in this district inflicted for vagrancy; and the consequences of them as Kenny states, would be as follows:—"I know only one thing could come honestly out of it; that more would be anxious to leave the country than are now half inclined to go to America; what can a man do else? he can lay by nothing out of his work, except his work in England. I know many who have saved their English wages to enable them to go to America. There is no prospect of mending here, and the prime are gone or going these dozen years. My own brother went off three years ago; he is settled at Providence; he left his wife and child after him; the wife is at service, and her father supports the child. He went, I think, because he had a better spirit in him than me, and if I had not the long family I would take the same trip; but it is not easy often to make up one's mind to what is for one's good; I have a veneration for the soil, if I could get support out of it. I won't believe but it is the best in the world."

On the point of outrages growing out of destitution, it was not known to be so, but it did not seem unlikely, the way the poor were circumstanced now.

Touching a house of industry, Coniton said, "If I were asked now, I for one would go into it, if I was sure my family would be as well taken care of as myself; and I know that the most of us would rather starve than beg; would take your provision and be glad to get it; but I am not sure that a man would do much good when he came out of it, or that many would come out at all; and if I had work every day in the year that would give me my cabin over my head, and enough of potatoes and milk, and good coarse clothes for myself and my little ones, I would not go into such a house for roast meat all the year round." And Kenny said, "I would take it, though I would think it hard to be divorced from my wife and children; but the whole country will go in if you give them leave, as things stand now. I agree with Coniton, that once in, a man is in for life; for he would lose his land; and when he came out he would have nothing; for my part, I'll be glad to get it."

Persons who attended the Examination.

Rev. J. ANDERSON, protestant rector of Moore.—MICHAEL CALLANAN, smith.—WILLIAM CLEMENTS, weaver.—BRYAM CONOLLY, labourer.—PATRICK DOLAN, labourer.—PATRICK FLYNN, mason.—THOMAS HARRISON, dyer.—Mr. JOHN KELLY, farmer.—PATRICK KELLY, small farmer.—JOHN KILKENNY, bailiff on Mr. St. George's estate.—ALEXANDER LOWRIE, chief constable of police, Ballydaniel.—Rev. J. M'AVEELY, catholic rector of Moore.—Mr. JAMES MILLER, shopkeeper.—J. M'NAMARA, weaver.—PATRICK MITCHELL, beggar.—WILLIAM MURRAY, miller.—THOMAS POWER, esq. J. P., Falty.—LAURENCE WATSON, farmer and appraiser.

IN a circuit of 150 acres there are six families who should not perhaps be called vagrants, but whose means are utterly inadequate to their support, and who, during many months of every year, are maintained by charity.—(Clements.)——In another circuit of the same extent, there are 12 families so supported.—(Miller.)——And in a third circuit there are four families, besides four widows thus circumstanced; these are very far indeed from being the poorest parts of the parish. The number of poor at home, and of strangers who have come here from other countries to beg is increased to a certainty. I think I see the poor people plentier than they used to be. The rents are nearly as high as ever, and the markets are miserably lowered; we are now forced to refuse alms to half the people that pass along. I do not remember to have seen so many begging their bread for five and forty years that I have lived in Moore, as I have during the last two seasons.—(Conolly.)——I think the small holders are getting worse and worse every day, and there was not one-fourth so many beggars twenty years ago as there are now; I think the reason of it is, that the markets are so uncertain, that if a crop fails the poor man is broken: it may do for stock-masters to run the risk, but we do not want to have the chances of good or bad at all.—(P. Kelly.)——The wages of mechanics are lower by three-fourths than they used in many instances to be. I could get formerly 1 l. for iron mounting a cart, and it is not half so often I can get 5 s. for it now.—(Callanan.)——There is, in proportion to the population, a decided decrease of employment, especially for females. The weaving and spinning are almost extinguished. A woman may sometimes still earn three half-pence or two-pence per day by spinning yarn; but I know that they frequently have not money to buy the flax.—(Mr. Anderson.)——The men either stay at home or go to some distant parish, to endeavour to get work. It is a common pretext for the families to say that they are going to salt water, when in truth they never go there at all, but support themselves by begging during their absence from home.—(P. Kelly.)——Do not think that cottiers are nearly as often reduced to want as other landholders. Mechanics, when they are strangers and have families, are frequently known to beg; single men hardly ever do so.—(Flynn.)——Servants do not beg; if any class can save any thing, it is this; some of those, who come in summer into the parish, may be cottiers; but there is not a great number of cottiers belonging to this parish who beg; none of them, as far as I know, leave home; they are generally considered the best off.—(J. Kelly.)——There are only four or five labourers in the parish who go for work to England; from what can be ascertained, we should think that they pay their way. If they begged in England they would get nothing in the way of work. More have returned this year, failing to get work, than we remember ever to have seen. It is generally believed, that between the Irish who have settled in England and the hands they have of their own, that there are enough for all the work to be done there now.

Most of the strangers come from the counties of Galway and Mayo; a good many besides are natives of the upper end of Roscommon. The county of Mayo would supply all Ireland with beggars.—(Flynn.)——They all are, or appear to be from the country districts; almost all of them are agricultural labourers, and generally carry a spade or some other implement of field-labour on the shoulder.—(Mr. Mac Aveeley.)

The children of beggars are scarcely ever known to continue a vagrant's life. There is an instance of a man residing at a short distance hence, a field labourer, who has four sons and two daughters. For three years, the wife and children were obliged to beg. They have some time since left off begging, and all the children are now employed in various ways, respectably and well. Considering what they endure from privation and want, it can scarcely be believed that any beg, unless when forced to it by downright necessity. The people feel a spirit in themselves that keeps them from asking alms, and the poor housekeeper is poorer than the beggar; for the one goes to every one's door, while the other will only come in the way of the kindly disposed, and even from them they seldom ask directly.

An able-bodied beggar does, on an average, receive from one to two stone of potatoes each day. It is very seldom that they get meal, though, in a very plentiful season, they refuse potatoes, and ask for money or meal. There is no doubt but families collect more than they can always consume. There have been instances of even single persons doing so. Beggars receive scarcely any thing from coach passengers. I would myself give a family of six individuals half a stone of potatoes. I would diminish the quantity according to the number. I know I give whatever I can afford, because I feel for their distress, and I do not care whether they are discontented with what I give or not.—(Murray.)——They are often noisy, when they think they have not got enough. I have frequently seen them keep a few potatoes in their hand, looking at them, and then at you, as they walked away unsatisfied.—(Watson.)——It is not unusual, in the scarce seasons, for a family to divide when begging. I cannot recal any instance, except the following, when I detected this contrivance. The father and two children came one morning last summer to my house, and got relief; in an hour after the mother and three children called, and were assisted; and in the course of the day, two children, who said they were orphans, obtained charity. I happened to give each of them food myself, and that evening I found them altogether on the road, at some little distance from my house, and, on inquiring, discovered that they were all of the same family. I did not reproach them, and I should not refuse relief to them once in the day, if they were to apply to me again.—(Murray.)—— I think such cases occur two or three times in summer, but not at all periods.—(Flynn.)——If the able-bodied man comes in at meal-time, he will be made to take share; but excepting that, his chance is small, and upon the whole he gets less than any other kind of beggar. The sick, if they are able to look for it, get most; there is always something kindlier for them.—(Flynn.)——An able-bodied man must walk a great deal before he can have enough for himself and each of his children. If the single men do not get at one house, they will at another.* Those who collect more food than they can consume, exchange it for tobacco, soap, and sometimes for clothing; never, it is believed, for spirits. No one present recollects having, at any time, seen the poor who live by charity, in a state of intoxication, except those who stand in the streets of towns, and frequent fairs, who are frequently known to drink to excess.—(Watson.)——For my own part, I would sooner give to a person who was decently clad, than to one in rags and dirt; he is generally more respectable and well behaved, and one is apt to feel more for such as are discreet in manner. Those who will not beg from every one, are the better sort. Still I think, if you were to put decent clothes on the man who had, for any length of time, begged in the ordinary way, he would be the same man still, and he would ask relief from any one whom he imagined would be likely to give it.—(Watson.)

Some, when seeking relief, say that they are unable to get work; others do not make any apology at all. There are some, no doubt, who prefer idling and cadding about to regular work, though to be sure regular work is not to be had for them. But if there are any such people, it is because, when habit takes a hold of them, and it is hard to be broken off, that they become idle. Of themselves they are naturally inclined to labour. It is a common saying, that a father will not get leave to work by himself; his children will be about him, if they can, and will make out some useless work for themselves, rather than be looking on doing nothing.—(Murray.)——Every one has heard of persons producing sores for the sake of causing pity; but no one present ever saw it done. People attend more to the morals (i. e. manners) of those who ask relief than to their dress. The decently dressed are generally more respectful, and therefore get more.—(Miller.)——A fellow came to me not many days ago, asking alms. I challenged him for not working; he said he had received a severe hurt in the knee, that hindered him from working, and rendered him a cripple. I watched him longer than he imagined, and when he thought he was out of sight, he went as supple along as I would.—(Murray.)——Forged or falsely written statements are never known to be used in the country districts; but as for mere lying by word of mouth, it does sometimes occur. I cannot say that more than a few instances of this have fallen within my observation. One was this. It is a usual thing on state nights, such as Christmas and Easter, to have a general enjoyment, and the people who want at other times will strive to have something decent then. At last Christmas, a woman of my own neighbourhood sent to tell me that she and her family were doleful and sad for want of as much food as would enable them to celebrate that blessed night. I sent her some meal, and a shilling to buy tea and sugar; and I afterwards found that she was more plentifully supplied at the time than some of them that helped her.—(Murray.)——The respectable portion of the poor would be glad to have their diseased or impotent children taken care of and educated, when possible; but those who live by begging would never be inclined to part with them: they would not sell that charm.—(Macnamara.)——They subject them to great hardships in going about from place to place, but they do not care if they had only half of the persons left, so that they can make the money by means of them.—(J. Kelly.)

A man† with his wife and children were in the neighbourhood last night; they were leading about a sister who is idiotic and blind, for the express purpose of exciting compassion, and obtaining support.—(Harrison.)——Maybe the man did it through kindness, if he is not able to maintain her in any other way; maybe he is doing good, and expects his reward.—(Murray.)——No such thing; he does not pretend it, and if he did, it is plain enough why he does it. I will engage he would not part with that poor being if you offered to provide for her.—(Macnamara.)

I believe that of those who live by beggary, many are persons of immoral habits; but I do not think that those who are by circumstances compelled to ask aid, during a portion of the year, are liable to the same charge.—(Mr. M'Aveeley.)——I do not remember a single instance of a beggar being accused of any participation in outrage or murder.—(C. Lowry.)——They are frequently known to pilfer in houses where they have received lodging, but not to any extent.

All classes of the poor are anxious to emigrate, and would go with a light heart, if they had the means. Last year I sold my only cow, to enable me to let my daughter go to America. She had a higher and better notion than to always remain in the wretched state that I and my family was in; so after two years being unwilling to part with her, I made up my mind to let her go out with several relations who sailed about six months ago; and I sold my

* At first the witnesses seemed, with the exception of Flynn, to think that the married man with a family was best off; after some argument amongst themselves, they unanimously agreed that the reverse was the case.

† Neither Harrison nor Murray, nor Macnamara, were aware that the person alluded to (P. Mitchell,) had been examined in the earlier part of the day; how far their several opinions of the case were borne out by fact, will be seen by reference to Mitchell's story.

my cow to pay my daughter's expenses. I, nor the others that are here still, did not take milk or butter since.—(Harrison.)——There is as much affection amongst those who beg, but not so much obedience, as amongst other classes to the commands of the parents; the cause of which I think is, that their children are oftener let run ahead, without any restraint. When the family divide to beg, it is the rule for each set to take care of themselves.—(Murray.) ——I saw a very poor creature, who happened to have collected more food than she actually wanted for the day's subsistence, give away to another, who seemed, if possible, more wretched than herself, as much potatoes as is usually given at a time, at a farmer's house, to a beggar; but I believe such cases to be very rare indeed.—(Macnamara.)——The only instance known in the parish, of a beggar having hoarded his earnings, is that of a very old man, who is called "Forty Bags;" he has been begging since he left his service, 15 years ago. His plan is to say prayers for the people of each house he comes to; he repeats them in Irish, and it generally takes him a full quarter of an hour to go through them. The woman of the house can never understand the half of what he says, and I think they are mostly his own invention; and as to the quality of them, at least they are good for him.—(Macnamara.)——It is all fair, for he pays before he receives.—(Murray.)——He lives well; has a meat dinner three times a week. He would not take potatoes, if offered to him. He is healthy and joyous, and nothing ever went astray with him, till one day, by mistake, he left behind him, in a farmer's house, 25*l.* tied up in a bag. He got back the money, of course, and the people give to him still, though every one knows about the discovery of the money—(some of the witnesses seemed to discredit this)—but I know it, for I saw him at his old trade last week. Certainly the payers are a great help to him, and it would be a pity to stop him, he thrives on them so well.—(Flynn.)

In most cases they are married before they come to begging, and we generally see them having four or five children with them. They say that tinkers marry sooner than other people, but it is not known how or by whom married, or whether any ceremony at all is performed. It is believed there are twice as many bastards among the strolling beggars as there are amongst any other class. Can't give any reasons for the opinion, but yet such is the general impression. It is impossible for us to know whether those who are reduced to beggary die off quicker than other people or not, but we are convinced that such is the case, from the greater hardships and exposures they are subject to, and the miserable clothing they wear. The worst hardship of all is the want of covering at night.

A family that I gave shelter to the other night, were unable to procure straw for themselves, and I had none, so they were obliged to go out and cut a sufficient of sedge and rushes in the bog, and to lay themselves down upon that, wet and cold as it was, after a day's rain, with nothing between it and them but the sack, and the mother's apron.—(Macnamara.)—— An able-bodied man could certainly get more by begging than by working, for he can try one every day, and get something if he resorts to deception, or if he has a family, but he is never sure of having work.—(Macnamara.)——I think it is about six of the one and half a dozen of the other.—(Harrison.)——I think that there is less of the spirit of independence amongst the lower order than there ought to be, and that they sometimes resort to begging before they are compelled by distress to do so. They might and ought to endure greater privations, sooner than ask alms. I must indeed admit, that the employment which numbers of able-bodied men are able to procure is insufficient to support them; and that even then, although they have no resources to draw upon, they are very seldom known to beg. The wages given for female labour can contribute little towards supporting the family. Children may be said to earn nothing whatever; but still I am of opinion that there is a less disinclination to beg than there ought to be. I have grounded this opinion principally on the experience I have had of the operation of a system of charitable relief, called "The Benevolent Society of Balinasloe." It has been established about a year. Residents in the town alone have been offered any sort of work. Those who receive assistance are expected to work in whatever way employment may be had, as a means of requiting the service previously done to them. The working of this institution can furnish no precise means of judging of the disposition to idleness or industry that exists among any other than the population of the town.—(Mr. Anderson.)

Perhaps three families would come to me before I would have done my dinner; on a summer's day a dozen would apply, and they generally got half a dozen of potatoes, though that is the worst time for me to give, from the scarcity of provisions.—(Kelly.)——Murray is believed to be the only man in the parish who, on an average, gives away a quarter of a stone of potatoes each day in the year. We are forced to refuse many more than we can help. My house is on the public road, and 20 or 30 families will pass in the day. I generally give from two to six potatoes at a time.—(Callanan.)——For one who gives a quarter of a stone, there are three who give none; and the best of us must let the half of those who want pass by.—(Watson.)

The number of those who are supported by one family solely, is very few.

Sure I am, that the farmers do not give away any thing like enough to support an additional labourer; for we are forced to let them pass, and another pass, without any relief; and I may go often enough to the potatoes, to take up an alms each time, before I will have given away sixpence worth.—(Watson.)——There are nearly 20 shopkeepers in Athlone who give sixpence amongst the poor on two days of the week, but we do not know any in the smaller towns or villages doing so. These generally hold more or less land, and therefore prefer giving food; but town or country, there are none whose charity could afford to support another workman. It is not usual to plant potatoes with the design of appropriating the produce solely to charitable purposes.

I do not think it is by their means that mens' charity is measured; with rich and with poor it is according to the heart of the person, and the christianity of each rules him, not the extent of his ability.—(Macnamara.)——The cottiers and holders of from half an acre to five give most in proportion to their means.—(Watson and Kelly.)——The farmer of 20 to 30 acres gives quite as much as he who holds 60 acres, who might perhaps bid the beggar from his door, the other would not.—(Harrison.)——From what we hear from themselves we believe, that numbers are delicate in going to the rich man's house, lest they would be bid off. The poor have more charity than the rich; the latter do not feel so much for them, never having known the want of a bit themselves. At many gentlemen's houses they would not be let to come within the gate. The farmers are in general very liberal of their bounty, but yet those who rank lower are in truth more charitable; for the farmer never feels the hunger sticking to him as the poor man often does.—(Murray.)——The relief of the poor falls on us the real poor.*—(Macnamara.)——No man really gets more than he requires; the same family of strangers will often apply to us twice or three times in the course of the week, and be relieved; we would rather give even against our judgment than affront them. To tell the stranger to go to his own parish would affront him, for it is his discretion and decency that has made him leave it.—(Murray.)——Beggars obtaining more than they require does not cause a waste of provisions, for when they have a surplus they can always find many nearly as distressed as themselves, but who would not be known to beg.

We are not at home to see what is given, but from consideration I should think, that half a stone of potatoes a day in summer, and a quarter of a stone in winter, was as much as any ten acre farmers.—(J. Kelly.)——I believe there is not one (except the habitual beggar) who is maintained by charity in summer, that has not given away as much in proportion as the richest man in the parish while the potatoes lasted; but they do not make any sort of calculation about what they give, nor do they believe that they would have more for themselves by withholding alms from the pauper.—(Miller.)——I am sure the farmer would prefer a continuance of individual charity to paying one round sum for the support of the poor.—(J. Kelly.)

The shopkeepers would not like to pay for the maintenance of the able-bodied portion of the population, but they might be well enough satisfied to give a fair sum to get shut of the strollers.—(Miller.)——We know that the beggars are suffering from want, for we are close upon it ourselves.

Relief is never procured by importunity, the people are aware of sturdy beggars and resist them; I mean such as have forward manners, the majority of them are civil, and I oftener hear them say, when refused relief, "Well, God bless you, if you have not it for us now, you will have it again," than use any complaint.—(Miller.)——I would not give the beggar any thing, for I do not think he could be an object who would refuse to accept of the relief offered him by an institution.—(Harrison.)

Perhaps I would want it more myself, and if there was a house opened for the poor I would give nothing at my own door, because indeed a man's pride would not let him go into it.—(Murray.)——I would give them nothing, and I think that any one who was in real want would leap at it, and there are plenty who would be delighted to have it who now hold four or five acres of land, one family of whom, to my own certain knowledge, lived for two months last year on one meal a day.—(Murray.)——The fear of imprecations may possibly have some effect upon old and superstitious people, but certainly has no influence on the great mass of the people who are disposed to give without such motives.—(J. Kelly.)

I have for several years forbidden my people to give night lodgings indiscriminately, and as far as possible, I wish them to abandon the practice altogether. I believe it to be the constant method by which disease, disloyalty and immorality is propagated. It is no doubt hard to refuse shelter to the honest labourer's family; but in general it is fairer, I conceive, that the people should support their own poor; I also conceive that the trading beggars do injure, by their dissolute habits, loose conversation, and the circulation of stories, which it does not answer the people to hear, the moral state of the population; with regard to disease, I knew one instance of fever having been spread through a whole neighbourhood by one person having been harboured who was recovering from an attack of the complaint.—(Mr. Mc Aveeley.)

Persons are known frequently to turn to industry after having spent a long time begging; one instance lately occurred in a neighbouring town of a family, who for several years were mainly supported by charity; the father was by trade a basket-maker, the mother and three sons begged; the ages of the latter, when they left off begging, were from nine to thirteen, they were taken under the care of some benevolent persons, one of them is now an indoor-servant, and the other two are guards of coaches. In about a year after they obtained employment they were able to contribute sufficiently to raise their parents to comfort, and yet the father still works as often as he can get any thing to do.

From experience I am inclined to believe, that where the poor are from actual privation engaged in outrage, it is because they are more from their poverty exposed to the influence of others of a grade higher than themselves. I have not found that the poor tenant who has been ejected, has been the actual instrument of revenge; when crime is committed it is more frequently the result of an organized system of terror than of individual animosity.—(Chief Constable Lowry.)——I have but a trifle of land, and I would be glad to go into a house of industry, if I was sure that my wife and children would be as well off as myself, and that all of us would be better clad than we are out of it. Many of the married men would not take it, but the single men would go in, and if the door was open they would not come out. —(Dolan.)

(Dolan.)——If they had leave to go to prayers on Sunday they would think one day in the week enough to spend with their wives and families.—(Patt. Kelley.)——My opinion is, that none of them would go in, except the infirm.—(Kilkenny.)——The Irish are fond of their freedom, those who have families and no land would go in; but there are few who would agree to give up their land in order to avail themselves of the provision.—(P. Flynn.)——I would rather go to America if I had the means, and take my chance of being able to bring out my family afterwards, than depart from them and go into the parish house.—(J. Macnamara.)——I would prefer staying here and taking the provision, that I might be sure of seeing my family once in the week at least.—(Callanan.)——All we want is employment, give fair wages to all of us that are able to work, and we do not want any house in the parish. I think to let us live in our own houses, and give us a shilling a day, would be better than any other plan.—(Conolly.)——The whole country would volunteer for any wages that would give them two good meals of potatoes and milk, a house and clothing, and they would not object to give up their land; but they would not give up the land to go into the parish house.—(Dolan.)——Three bad meals are not equal to one good one. The working men, from 18 to 60 would be delighted to get it. Some time since Sir Richard St. George employed from 60 to 70 men for nine months in making roads through his estate; they were most willing to work at 8*d.* a day, and many a man would not be in his house to day if it was not for the relief so afforded him.—(Clements.)——This plan would be an estate to me compared with what I now have. I have a large family, and have not been able to afford to taste milk this year back; I work about six weeks at the road, the remainder of my time that was occupied I worked at my own land. I hold five acres these 30 years, paying 1*l.* per acre.* Two plentiful meals would be better than any five of the bad ones I now get.—(Thos. Harrison.)——I would be glad to have any thing near what is offered, and the people would not care to be employed out of their own parish, but they would not like to go for a length of time beyond the water (i. e. the Shannon.)—(Dolan.)——If we were sure that the work would be constant every man of us would be satisfied it could not be better than what you offer.—(P. Kelly.)

When asked would 10*d.* or a 1*s.* a day be enough to induce all the small holders to give up their land, the general feeling appeared to be that it would not. Considerable discussion then arose upon the point, and much pains was taken to make the witnesses clearly understand the amount of the change in their situation, which would be brought about by their ceasing to hold land, with all its attendant risks of failure of crops, &c. and becoming labourers at steady wages, and the security and real independence thereby attainable. When these statements had been laid before them, and when they were shown how by employment being given to the men, work must gradually arise for the women and children, they were requested to debate the entire matter among themselves. They did so, and finding that if a single man was able to feed and clothe himself respectably upon the wages proposed he must give double the employment that is now given to the weaver for his coat, &c. and that in short one could not be raised from indigence and partial idleness without, in some measure, benefitting those around him; they unanimously agreed that they ought to give up the land if they could be sure of 10*d.* or a 1*s.* a day; for the shilling a day would, in truth, be 3*s.* if every man had it that would work for it.

THERE are about 180 persons living in the union who beg at certain seasons of the year, and in June and July the farmers say there are twice as many beggars, owing to the influx of strangers; and also, that mendicancy is on the increase, from the farmer's inability to employ labourers, on account of the low price of grain. In fact, the holders of small farms, such as four and five acres, have to work very hard, and even then cannot avoid being obliged to let their wives and families beg sometimes.

The months of June and July are those in which vagrancy prevails most. At this season the potatoes run short; and when they set apart the quantity necessary for seed, they often find they "cannot keep the house;" the husband remains to plant the potatoes, and the family go to beg. Many of the men also go to England, to seek employment.

The greater number of beggars who come here are strangers, and they generally travel in families of about seven persons, chiefly women and children. The young men never beg themselves, and it is very rare to see them travel with their families in the begging season, as they either go to England, or remain at home to till the potato ground. There are many old and infirm men who beg, but the women are mostly young.

Hugh Gray, farmer, says, "the beggars very frequently are the wives and families of cottier tenants and unemployed labourers, who can get but 6*d.* a day and their food. I, myself, have a man this fortnight, digging potatoes at 3*d.* a day and his food; he is 60 years of age, cannot carry any burthen, and is only able to dig. Nearly half the strange beggars

* Flynn, on being asked what he would give for the land held by Thomas Harrison, said "I would not give 16*s.* an acre for it, if I could get any other."

beggars are the wives and families of cottier tenants, who are obliged to wander about begging, after the potatoes are planted; and many of the weavers, who since the failure of the linen trade have become day labourers, are in a very wretched state."

Mr. Denis O'Connor, farmer, says, "the wives and families of cottier tenants go to beg in strange parishes, in order to avoid being seen asking for alms by those who know them. And I have known three or four instances of people selling some of their remaining stock of potatoes, in order to pay the husband's expenses to England, and others, in order to obtain clothes, as they know they must go out to beg at a certain season, and have no other way of providing clothing."

Many of the small farmers have given up their farm to a daughter, in order to get her married, and thus prevent her from infamy; they also frequently give them to the sons, having no other provision for them.

Pat. Cuinan, labourer, states, that "almost all the beggars here are from the neighbouring counties; they all change places, as they do not like to be seen begging in their own parishes; there are very few grown up children with them, as they mostly go to service with the farmers when able to work."

By far the greater number of mendicants are reduced, in consequence of the price of produce being too low to remunerate for labour, while the rents are so high; but the principal cause is the want of employment.

Mr. Hugh Gray, farmer, says, "the able-bodied beggar may at this season collect from a stone and a half to two stone of potatoes in the day; but in bad weather he would not collect more than is necessary for consumption. In summer they are more numerous, and get little more (if any) than a mere support. A single person might be able to save something from what he would collect by begging, but families certainly cannot.

P. Cuinan, labourer, says, "the quantity of alms given to a family would be greater than to an individual, but not in proportion to the numbers. A family would perhaps get twice as much as an individual; and in some rare instances different members of the same family will apply, and receive alms from the same individual. The able-bodied beggar would probably be able to get more potatoes or meal in the day than any other description of vagrants; as many persons make it a point to refuse alms to no one who applied. But it is very rare to see an able-bodied man begging."

Francis Robinson, weaver, says, "the beggars generally sell their surplus collections to the tradespeople, and mostly buy tobacco, a herring, or sometimes a stitch of clothing; and some trading beggars that attend fairs, and are or pretend to be disabled, get whiskey, but these are very few."

"The generality of beggars cannot be better dressed, and, if they were, people would be more compassionate towards them, thinking that they would not beg if they could avoid it; but the trading beggars wear a dress on purpose, and are perhaps induced to squander their earnings. The woman usually wears the blanket or sheet with which they are covered at night."—(H. Gray, farmer.)

"The itinerant beggars go out to beg, in order to save their little stock of potatoes at home for the winter."—(P. Cuinan, labourer.)

Rev. J. M'Hugh, P. P., says, "the men who beg, invariably say that they have been unsuccessful in endeavouring to procure work; and the women, that their husbands are away in England at work. Men, too, will sometimes say they are looking for their families, who are begging through the country. The fair beggars often resort to lying and other expedients to excite sympathy; and there was a woman at Castlebar convicted of having worn a mask for many years."

"The habits of beggars in general are supposed to be very moral, and no objection is made to them on that head; and they are scarcely ever known to steal anything."

Francis Robinson, weaver, says, "the beggars are very kind to their children, and will often feed them before they eat any thing themselves, and frequently stint themselves for that purpose; they are as fond of them as if they had thousands to give them. They will often share their food with each other in times of scarcity; and there is an old saying, of 'beg from a beggar.'"

Begging, with borrowed children, used to be practised a good deal formerly, but it is very seldom known to be the case latterly. I know of no case of death from starvation amongst the beggars; but many of them die of a lingering sickness, brought on by bad food and hardships, and it is always remarked, that after a year of scarcity the fever is most common amongst the poor people.

Rev. Mr. Tyndall thinks a single man would procure more by labour than by begging; but that a woman with a child or two could certainly support the whole family better by begging than the man by working.

The parish priest and the farmers thought even a single man could live better by begging than by labour.

Those who give alms seldom know anything about the character of the beggars, but relieve them in honour of God.—(Hugh Gray, farmer.)

The prevalence of private charity is found to increase the number of beggars, as many old men, certain of support by begging, give up their farms to the children, to enable them to marry; then the children have families, and the ground being unable to support them, in all probability the wives and children must beg. Thus indiscriminate charity makes the old man a beggar, and most likely the families of his children.

There are scarcely three beggars in this parish who would not prefer a life of industry to that of begging.

Mr. Denis O'Connor, farmer, says, "the people never ask the beggar any questions as to what what he may have got before during the day; but if they see his wallet very full they will refuse him an alms. The farmers give them a night's lodging, and sometimes a 'bit of clothes,' but generally they give their alms in potatoes; and the years the potato crop is scarce they will give a little meal."

Rev. W. Tyndal says, "the farmers never give money to beggars, and, indeed, that there is no class of farmers here able to do so; but he thinks the beggars would prefer it to food."

Rev. Mr. W. Tyndall, parish curate, further says, "there is no limit to the quantity of alms given by the farmers in the day. It is regulated by the number of beggars who call. Some days a good many call, and some days none. I think the quantity given is regulated also by the abundance or scarcity of the crop. When good, the farmers think potatoes of very little value, and give them readily to every one."

Patrick Cuinan says, "there is no fixed quantity; we give them the full of their hands to each beggar. Some of the large farmers, such as hold about 50 acres, give as much away in charity as would support an additional labourer."

Every person who keeps a house gives something to the beggars, farmers, labourers, and sometimes even those who buy potatoes themselves give part, and more, according to their means, than the richer classes.

Some few beggars may get more than a sufficient quantity of food for their support, from the impossibility of the givers detecting what the previous collections may have been; but it is in very few instances that it will occur. No families ever get much more than enough one day with another.

A farmer holding ten acres of land, will give about half a stone of potatoes in the day. Some seasons they give much more, but at others are not called on for weeks. The farmers would prefer the present mode of relieving the poor to paying a tax, as they do not feel what they give now, and always have a potato to give to the beggar, and may not have money to pay the tax-gatherer. They are burdened enough already, and would not consent to any compulsory assessment.—(Hugh Gray, farmer.)

Mr. Denis O'Connor, farmer, says, "alms are given by the people in honour of God, not alone that they think the beggar is hungry and in want of food, for, after giving him to eat, they will give more to provide for the next meal. Relief is never given, through importunity, to the sturdy beggar, as there are very few such, and they would very likely get nothing. People do not wish to refuse alms to any person whom they do not think an imposter, and who asks for charity in honour of God. Even if there was an institution for the beggars to go into, many of the farmers would continue to give them charity. The people would not wish to be under the beggar's curse; but one who took such a mode of getting charity might as well give up the trade."

In seasons of fever the people always fear that it will spread by giving a night's lodging to beggars; but no instance is known.

Cursing and swearing is prevalent to some extent among the lower orders, but less perhaps (certainly not more) among the children of the beggars, because it is considered necessary that such should have some pretensions to religion. The clergymen would not admit that mendicancy had any effect on morality.

Mr. Hugh Gray, farmer, says, "the generality of beggars spend a great part of the year at home; and there are many in this parish that are comfortable now, who spent part of their life begging, to which they were driven by necessity."

W. Jones, esq., and Miles M'Donnell, esq., say, "no attempt is ever made to punish vagrancy, and if there was it would be effectually prevented by the opposing influence (in the absence of any regular provision for the poor), by public opinion; nor would the repugnance to punish for a man's begging be removed, as it cannot be considered a crime. People would wish to be rid of the burthen, but not by punishment."

John Robinson, weaver, says, "a great many would go into a house of industry if it was established, every man willing to work would readily go in if their liberty was not too much restricted. I myself would readily go in."

IN this parish there are of resident beggars 100 heads of families, and in June and July there are three to one strangers additional. Vagrancy has increased very much of late, owing to the general depression of prices for agricultural produce, from which the farmer is unable to give employment. The number of wandering beggars is not so much (to appearance) increased as considering the great increase of property it should be, because provisions have been very cheap and plenty during the last four years. H. M'Donagh says, "a great increase in the number, and sure it must be, when they have in the year but two months of employment, one in summer and one in winter;" and Charles Miland says, "the great cause of the increase is, that there is a class of men who have no ground, nothing but a hut in which they huddle together and depend entirely on day labour; this they cannot get of late years, and therefore have no other dependence but begging. Many also have three or four acres of ground which will give them potatoes alone for not more than seven or eight months; for part of the rent of this land and support during the remainder of the year they must depend on work, and when they cannot get it their families must beg. The farmers now are not able to employ them."

Vagrancy is most common during the months of June and July, owing to the scarcity of food and of employment. C. Miland says, "because the potatoes are out then, and the men go to look for work, and the families shut up the house and beg."

The vagrants in towns are mostly resident, they are generally old and infirm heads of families, who beg to support the rest.

The beggars in the country in June and July are strangers who are ashamed to beg where they are known. Mr. Orr says, "but this shame is wearing off, owing to the generality of begging; so that many who a few years ago would be ashamed to stay in their own place, now have no such feeling."

The strange beggars are mostly women and children. H. M'Donagh says, "the man takes his spade and the woman a bag, and they go along the road. If he can get employment he will work, if not, his wife goes up to the farmers' houses to beg, while he loiters behind on the road."

The men who beg permanently are old and infirm. None of those employed during the week beg on Sunday.

Few beggars of any kind go about on Sunday, as the farmers have an objection to relieving them on that. "An old reduced neighbour may perhaps get a dinner, but no others."

The wives and children of employed labourers are supposed but rarely to beg. Reverend J. Garrat says, "I do not think they do if the men are employed. Begging is a thing they have no fancy for, and I do not think any of them would beg if they could get work." Many people who have been turned out of their land plant a "spot" of con-acre, and go to look for work, leaving their families to work until their return. Since the decline of the linen trade the weavers are by far the most wretched part of the community, because they cannot earn at their trade 3*s.* a week, and are unable to work hard at out-door labour.

Mr. J. Garrat said, "there is little work for any one, but when a man is wanted a weaver will certainly not be selected."

When cottier tenants beg they usually go to parts of the country where they are not known; and J. Garrat says, "I think those who trouble us are not our own people, except the poor housekeepers who come privately, and are by far the most wretched (but this I do not consider begging.) Many of our people I fear go to other places to beg."

Instances have been known of old men having given up their holdings to their children and gone to beg. Rev. J. Garrat says, "they never give up their land with the intention of begging, but from the inability of their children to support them, they must do so in the end." And C. Milmo says, "I am sure that many a man, when he finds his holding will not support the whole family, and that he himself is not strong enough to cultivate it, then gives his ground to his children and goes to beg himself."

They come here from all the neighbouring counties, particularly from Mayo, and are mostly from the country districts, "as the towns people stay about the towns."

The proportion of them who are the children of beggars, and who have never known any other mode of life, if any such there are among them, is very small. Rev. B. O'Kean says, "they are very seldom, if ever, the children of beggars, as their children when grown up go to service to the farmers." By far the greater number are persons who formerly earned their own subsistence, but were reduced. They all attribute their misfortunes to "high rents and low prices for produce, and the consequent want of employment." Rev. J. Garrat says, "the misfortune of every one of them is owing to the high rents and heavy charges on the land; the rents are as high as during the war; I pay the same rent (and many around you do) which I paid when I got 40*s.* a sack for corn." And C. Milmo said, "the small farmers holding four or five acres are by far the most numerous class, and are reduced by high rents and taxes. I know of farms in which five or six sets of tenants were broke and turned off in five or six years; I could name them. I am perfectly certain that very many persons take land with a clear conviction that they cannot keep it more than two or three years; this they must do, as they have no other mode of life, and are sure of a miserable existence for a few years." Scarcely any adopt a life of begging through idleness. "Not one will do so than can avoid it."

The beggars get no meal, as Mr. Keen says, "the people have no meal themselves, it must go to the rent," and of potatoes will get about a stone a day. The farmers said, "they get enough for their families, but if potatoes, which are now at 1*s.* 4*d.* per cwt. come up to 2*s.* 6*d.* the beggars would not get half enough."

When a family of beggars, consisting of five or six, comes to a farmer's door, something more will be given than would to an individual, but not much, not at all in proportion to the number. Rev. J. Garrat said, "they are supposed to borrow children, and therefore do not get credit for all they may have with them; a common question is, 'Are these your own?'"

Sometimes different members of the same family apply and with success, to the same persons. C. Milmo says, "it is often done, particularly in distressed years, they use every shift to get what they can."

In endeavouring to estimate the comparative earnings by begging of an able-bodied and an infirm man, the farmers said, "very few able men beg, and when they do they get very little, and though an able man may travel more, and call at more houses, yet considering the small quantity he would get at each, the infirm man would have more at the end of the day; but but a single woman, who could travel further, would have much more than one encumbered with children."

When they obtain more food than they require for their own consumption "they sell a little to buy tobacco, which is considered an absolute necessary,* but they can sell very little, as they must keep some for a bad day when they cannot go out.

They sometimes, with the price of their surplus food, purchase clothing. Rev. J. Garrat said, "I knew a beggar who, by selling potatoes, endeavoured to make up the price of a blanket; he left the money in my hands as he collected it; I bought the blanket for him, and paid 9*s.* for it; he was a year collecting the money."

Beggars have no objection to being well dressed. "If a person came well dressed people would readily relieve him, as they would think nothing but the height of necessity sent him out, regular beggars may not wish to be well dressed, but in general they could not."

Beggars do not save in summer for their support in winter, as summer is the scarce and winter the plentiful season. C. Milmo says, "they cannot save in summer, that is the hardest time with them."

The men mostly beg under a plea that they cannot get work, or that they have some disease which disables them; the women say that their husbands are away at work, or are dead.

The habits of fair beggars, ballad singers and persons called "Boccoughs," are supposed to be dissolute, but those of the rest are not.

They are never supposed to be connected with outrages on persons or property; they do commit some thefts, but to no extent worthy of notice; the people considered the number of thefts to be ascribed to beggars as very trifling, saying, "there is a distinct class of pick-pockets who steal in that way."

The confirmed vagrants would not be willing to emigrate to America, but these are not numerous; the beggars by necessity would be most willing to do so. B. Morrissy says, "some of those whose families beg for them would willingly go; I would for one;" and John Finn said, "if their families were sent with them they certainly would go."

The confirmed vagrants are not known to go to England in search of work, but the others go in great numbers every year. C. Milmo says, "the men whose families beg go there in shoals."

The beggars treat their children with as much kindness as any other class. Mr. Cogan says, "I have often seen them carry two children at once; one on their back and another in their arms."

Beggars do share their earnings with those more destitute than themselves. B. Morrissy says, "I give them lodgings, and often see them share with each other; they often share with me, and I often want it;" and the farmers said, "it is a general thing for them to share with those who give them lodgings; some few regular beggars may save something, but very little."

They have in general families of four or five, sometimes even eight, and mostly obliged to have recourse to begging, as the only mode in which their families can be kept alive. Rev. Mr. O'Kean says, "I never married persons who were absolutely beggars; they never beg until the family becomes too large for their means."

He further adds, that the number of illegitimate children among them is very small.

Deaths of absolute starvation do not occur, potatoes are so plenty in general, and every person is willing to relieve the destitute; but deaths from the slow effects of the bad quality and insufficiency of the ordinary food are very frequent. Rev. Mr. O'Kean says, "since 1822 there have not been deaths of starvation, but I am certain very many die of bad food, cold at night, and hardships. I knew two landholders of three acres each, who two years since had but one meal of potatoes a day for the whole summer."

The farmers considered "that an able-bodied man could support himself at least as well by begging as by labour, such as is to be had, but that a woman with children could support her husband much better by begging than he could support them by labour, and that many men were so supported." The Rev. Mr. O'Kean said, "a man living by labour cannot have better than dry potatoes, but by begging, if milk be at all plenty, he will always have some."

Those who give in general, know nothing of the characters of those they relieve; never ask any questions, and judge of their poverty by their appearance.

The people do not consider the prevalence of private charity in any way prejudicial to the morals of any class. B. Morrissy says, "the children may curse at times, but the mother will correct them for it; I have no fear of my children getting any bad morals from them;" and Mr. Cogan says, "they are all religious, as they consider that poverty in this life will get them mercy hereafter."

Vagrants are never persons who prefer that wandering life to one of labour. "No one ever goes to beg that can avoid it." Beggars are not known to refuse work when offered to them. James Davy said, "I had a man working for his food and a halfpenny worth of tobacco a day; he would stop during his life with me if I could support him."

No precaution seems to be taken against deception, through the conviction which is generally felt that no one would beg who could avoid it. "They never ask any questions; if they saw a large bag full with a person, they would not give any thing."

The custom of giving lodgings to beggars is very common among the lower orders. The farmers said "they get the warmest corner in the house. In winter they get straw from the farmers, as a bed; in summer they cut rushes, but are often prevented, as rushes are food for cattle, and must lie on flaggers (the flags which grow in the bogs); they get old clothes also at times."

The usual food given is a potatoe of the worst kind, called the lamper, which the people themselves live upon in general, as they grow upon poor land, and without much manure. C. Milmo says, "I tried to fatten pigs on the lampers, and found they would not thrive on them."

There is no limit to the quantity of food to be given each day, it depends entirely on the number of those who call. C. Milmo says, "in general they give something to every one, and even people who may have to go out themselves next month, will give to the beggars this month."

There is no fixed quantity given to each person; they give according to the distress he seems to be in; and some of the farmers give more than would support a man all through the year. Rev. B. O'Kean says, "I am sure if a man could keep an account of his alms, it would be very considerable at the end of the year, considering his means."

It is the custom in this town of the shopkeepers to give their alms generally, one halfpenny each to the beggars, on Monday only; it is not the custom for the farmers to plant some potatoes purposely for the beggars; "every man plants as much ground as he can, and makes no such calculation." The relief of the poor falls entirely on the middle and lower classes, the farmers, shopkeepers and labourers. Rev. B. O'Kean says, "I think that in proportion to their means, the poor and working classes give three times more than the rich. Many of the gentry will not permit beggars to pass through gates. At times they give some clothing in winter, but others will give scarcely any thing."

Charity is so universal among the poor themselves, that the farmers declared, "every man who has a potato will share it."

Some seasons of the year much more is given in charity than at others, because there are more applicants, but on an average a farmer of 10 acres would give away, one day with another, one quarter of a stone, that is, one and a quarter barrel in the year, which, if sold in May, would be worth 25 s.; this calculation was made under the direction of the people, who could not believe their charities amounted to so much. Rev. Mr. O'Kean said, "I am sure it is correct." It is to be noted that potatoes are more than double the price in May which they are at this season, so that this calculation is made at the very highest price they could bring in ordinary years. When the sum was declared, there was a great murmur among the people who thought they had been "trapped" as they said into an admission of the amount of their charities, in order that it may serve as a guide for which to tax them for a poor law; and so great was the terror of such a tax, that next day scarcely any of the farmers attended at the inquiry.

With regard to the willingness of the poor to assist the more destitute, Rev. Mr. O'Kean says, "I am sure that many persons give charity in the early part of the year, and send some of their family to beg in the end."

Relief is given to beggars for "God's sake, and to keep them from starving," and never because it is the custom to do so; nor is it ever extorted by mere importunity, for "when refused, they go quietly away." Religious feeling would never cause a man to give to a beggar whom he thought was not in want; the farmers say, "if we considered him not in want, we would keep it for the man we knew was so;" and charity is never given through fear of violence to the donor's person or property; charity is not given through fear of the beggar's curse, who very seldom resort to such means of extorting relief. The people said, "we would not like to have the beggar's curse, but would not give them any thing to avoid it;" and Rev. Mr. O'Kean said, "they very seldom curse in that way, and if they did, there certainly would be a prejudice against such persons."

There is no house of industry or mendicity nearer than the town of Sligo. Some of those who beg would be willing to go into such a house, if established in the parish, but the great majority would be most unwilling to do so, so much so that Mr. Cogan said, "you would have the house full of beggars here to day, but that a report was spread that they would be all put into a house, and kept from roving about the country;" and John Davy said, "when I was coming into town just now, I met many of them running away, lest they should be taken up."

M'TUCKER, farmer.—JAMES MULLEN, labourer.—Rev. MICHAEL O'CALLAGHAN, P. P.—Rev. Mr. SAUNDERSON, presbyterian minister.—C. SYMPSON, farmer.

THERE are about 30 resident beggars in the parish, and about three or four strangers to one of the residents. M. Fenny, labourer, says, " I remember this parish many years, and do not think the number of beggars has increased of late years, owing to the cheapness of provisions of late."

Vagrancy prevails most in June and July. The labouring classes plant their potatoes. The father goes to look for work, and the families shut up their houses and go to beg in strange places where they are not known.

The beggars mostly consist of women and children; sometimes they have a 'straggler,' an old man, with them, but rarely; the men are almost always aged or infirm.

Rev. Michael O'Callaghan, P. P., says, " there is not one beggar on Sundays for ten on the week days. There is but one instance in the parish of a cottier tenant sending his wife and family to beg in their own neighbourhood; this man has a house and a bog garden, for which he gives five days' work in the fortnight to his landlord as rent. The garden is not half an acre, and the ground is very moist.

" There are many cottier tenants from other parishes come here begging, and there are many weavers who, since the decline of the linen trade, are very wretched. They are the worst off, as they are too weak and delicate to beg. Those labourers who go to England to look for work, usually bring some food with them, and are not known to beg as they go along through Ireland."

The vagrants mostly come from the inland parts, from Mayo, Leitrim and parts of Sligo. The resident beggars here come from the outlets of Sligo, but the strangers from the country.

There are very few beggars who are themselves the children of beggars, as the child of 16 years of age will take wages of 3*s.* a quarter and diet. By far the greater number become beggars through the want of labour, high rent and taxes. Many are ruined by having taken land at high rents during the war, and from the fall of prices; being unable to make the rents, they lose their capital and are turned out; there being no employment they become destitute.

Rev. Mr. O'Callaghan says, " though the people are poor, they are not poor in spirit: I do not know one beggar who begs from choice; and the neighbourhood will not let him out as long as they have a potatoe to share."

Meal is very seldom given to beggars at this season of the year; any person could get plenty of potatoes, " if they could walk far, perhaps three stone." Summer is the scarce time, but they may get about a stone, as they can walk then further. They are sometimes able to lay by of their surplus collections of food, or else they would starve, as they cannot go out in winter often for a week together.

When there is a family of beggars, they will get more than the single beggar; but not in proportion to their number. Sometimes different members of the same family obtain alms from the same person; but if it was discovered, they would get nothing.

Rev. Mr. O'Callaghan, P. P., says, " the infirm beggar is considered an object, and on that account will get more than another; and the able-bodied man excites sympathy, as people think he begs only through want of employment; such a man will get a dinner or a breakfast."

Men are seldom seen to beg, the wife and family beg for them, and of course the children cannot travel far.

Rev. Mr. O'Callaghan says, " beggars often sell their surplus collections of food, and sometimes exchange them for tobacco, but scarcely ever for spirits. I never saw one of them drunk, and I think they would be ashamed to be seen paying for spirits. The resident beggars would have no objection to be well dressed; it would keep nothing from them, as people would know their poverty. The strange beggars mostly go out with the view of bringing home some money for the landlord to pay the rent. The first visitor the poor man has after returning from England is the driver, to collect the rent."

" The women who beg say that their husbands have been turned out of their land, and that they have gone to England or America; others, that they cannot get employment, or are away at work. There are some few beggars who exhibit sores to excite pity. I had a quarrel with one of them who had a disgusting appearance; he abused me, and said he would turn, and not be a catholic any longer. This description are seldom seen except at fairs."—(Rev. Mr. O'Callaghan, P. P.)

The Rev. Mr. O'Callaghan adds, " the beggars are not of drunken or dissolute habits, nor are the petty thefts of the parish ever imputed to them, except to the tinkers' wives, who are also beggars. They are very fond of their children in general: they are as dear to them as to any class."

Mr. Fenny, farmer, says, " the beggars used formerly to lay by some money, but latterly I never hear of them doing so. I once knew a beggar, about 10 years since, who lodged in my house, and he gave 30*l.* each to three daughters."

The Rev. Mr. O'Callaghan says, "the beggars frequently have large families, on an average three children. I never heard of beggars marrying; they are never beggars when married."

"The strange beggars mostly look young; but the residents are all aged and infirm. I did not baptize more than two bastards this year. There certainly are not any bastards amongst the resident beggars, as they are all old; nor do I think there are any even amongst the strange beggars."—(Rev. Mr. O'Callaghan.)

Rev. E. Alward, protestant curate, says, "I did not baptize more than one bastard these two years."

There is no instance known of a death from actual starvation, but many deaths are caused among the poor from bad food and hardships.—(All concur.)

Rev. Mr. O'Callaghan says, "as far as I know their feelings, I think the labouring classes would prefer to have but half enough at home to being obliged to seek for alms; but in point of food, the labourer could be better off by begging, if so many did not go out."—(All concur.)

"I do not think the habits of vagrants seem to have any bad effects on the morals, except that the children are as well brought up or educated as others are."—(Rev. Mr. O'Callaghan.)

"I have often asked able-bodied men why they did not work; and their invariable answer is, they are willing to work if they could get employment."—(Rev. Mr. O'Callaghan.)

The beggars are never refused a night's lodging, when there is any accommodation for them. Mr. P. Fenny, farmer, says, "there is no turning them out in this country. The farmers give a great deal of straw; two loads does not save me in the year. We give them potatoes and sometimes milk; but it is seldom the farmers can give them milk, except the butter-milk, in summer; and we do not eat meal ourselves, as all the oats goes to the landlord. Money is very scarce with the farmers; I believe the beggars would rather get it than food."

Rev. Mr. O'Callaghan, P. P., says, "there is limit to the quantity of food daily given to the beggars; it is generally according to the number and necessity of the applicants. In the harvest season the quantity depends on the hour of the day at which the beggars call; if in the morning, when potatoes are dug for breakfast, they will get them, or at dinner-time; but when there are not potatoes in the house, they will not often take the trouble to go and dig them. Very many of the farmers give away as many as would keep an additional labourer. In many houses they get in potatoes for the beggars in the morning; no fixed quantity, but not to let themselves run out."

The relief of beggars falls most disproportionately on the farmers and working class; and even the labourer, who purchases a few stone of potatoes from his day's hire (and who is himself nearly as great an object of charity as the person he relieves) will give alms, even more in proportion than the farmers.

"The feeling of charity is so strong amongst the farmers and working classes, that if they had but one potatoe, they will share it with the beggar, and will not see a fellow creature hungry."

The shopkeepers and farmers would certainly prefer the present mode of giving alms to paying a regular sum in the shape of a tax: 1st, because they do not feel what they give; 2dly, because to give money, their provisions must be sold, sent to market, &c. at expense; 3dly, they think the cost of collecting and administering such a tax, would very much increase it; 4thly, many heartburnings would arise in the collection; and their burdens are so great they could not undertake any additional ones. All the farmers declare that they will not be able to pay their rents this year, the prices are so low.

The motives which induce most people to give alms, are a strong religious and charitable feeling; a dread that the applicant is in want, and a hope of a reward from the Almighty for their charity.

M. Fenny, labourer, says, "I would not give alms unless a person who I was sure was in want; and if there was a house of industry, many beggars would be sent there, as it is the case in Sligo, where there is such a house; but many persons would relieve them still at the door. The beggars never curse people, as if they do, they certainly would get nothing. They are often refused for not asking in a becoming manner, and in the name of God."

"The habits of vagrants are not considered to be immoral. Many who give them lodgings say they would have no objection to allow their children to associate with them, as they are mostly milder than ourselves; and when they go out to beg, understand they will get nothing but for the love of God and their own necessities."

The children of beggars generally return to industry; they themselves do not. When they become old and infirm, they return to their own parishes and die in the house of some neighbour. The wives and children of labourers seldom beg more than three months in the year.

The people would be anxious to have strange beggars kept out of the parish, but not by violent means; and a law to punish for vagrancy, without a provision for beggars, would be considered inhuman; as one man said, "flesh and blood could not bear it." Another man said, "you cannot get in the parish six men to give information, so as to have them put in stocks;" but this dislike to give information would be removed if a provision were made for beggars.

There is one house of industry at Sligo, but it is not large enough for even half the town beggars.

Mr. P. Fenny, farmer, says, "the beggars would be willing enough to go into a house of industry; if you feed them well you will soon have large barracks. A man this year offered me to work for his diet and clothing. A man with constant work at 6 d. per day would not go in; but half the labouring class, or less, if kept constantly at work would do all the work that is to be done in the parish."

Rev. WILLIAM GROVE, rector, J. P.—Dr. HOMAN, dispensary surgeon.— —— HYLEAS, esq. J. P.—JAMES MAGEE, parish clerk and farmer.—JOHN MULLOWNEY, blacksmith.—JOHN TENPENNY, farmer.—Rev. —— WHITE, parish priest, &c. &c.

THERE was a diversity of opinion as to the number of vagrants in this parish; one man said 150, and another, "I think there are more than 480." It was explained, that the smaller number was about the estimate of the resident beggars, and the number of the strangers who at some seasons come into the parish, may be about the greater.

There is scarcely any change to be seen as to the numbers of late years; they continue about the same, and depend entirely on the plenty or scarcity of provisions.

During the last two years there has not been an increase, as potatoes have been plenty, but there is some dread for the next, as in many places the crop has failed.

The periods of the year at which vagrancy is most common, are June and July, owing then to the want of employment and the dearness of provisions, or rather because the winter stock of potatoes is then run out, and the labouring men who have then no employment cannot purchase any kind of food, and must send their wives and children at last to beg for their support until employment begins again in harvest, and the new potatoes come in; it is said too, that many infirm persons come into this parish (which borders on the sea) in summer for the purpose of sea-bathing, and support themselves by begging. These vagrants are in general strangers, as those who are so reduced to the necessity of begging, leave their own parish, there being a strong feeling of shame at begging where they are known; they chiefly consist of women, children and old men, and are mostly in families.

The reason of the much greater number of women than men is, that the men go to England to look for work, and the families beg till their return; but able-bodied men very seldom beg themselves, "they would get very little." It is not a general custom that labourers who have employment should send their families to beg, but some do, particularly those who live in the mountains; but it is very general for cottiers to plant their potatoes and go to England; some take their families with them to beg while they are employed, but the greater number leave them to beg in the neighbouring country till their return.

The most wretched part of the community are certainly the weavers; for since the decline of the linen trade they do farm work; but being in general rendered unfit for out-door work by their trade, and while there are so many stronger men seeking for employment they get scarcely any thing to do; their families most frequently beg.

Very frequently the small farmers, when advanced in age, transfer their holdings to their sons "in order that they may get wives and fortunes," and in many cases go to beg, but not always.

The mountainous districts are those that produce the greatest number of beggars, because when estates are "cleared" of the small tenantry they mostly get settlements among the mountains, from whence they are driven every summer to beg, as the ground will not produce enough for their support during the entire year.

The great majority of the beggars are persons who have earned their own subsistence, and were driven out to beg by absolute necessity, which is caused chiefly by want of employment. The farmers employ as few as they can, as they cannot afford to pay for labour, rents are so high and prices so very low. John Mullowney said, "I know farmers who used to employ many people who now do the work themselves."

It is believed that not one adopts a vagrant life through idleness, "which," John Mullowney said, "I think it is most wonderful, for the most industrious people are the most wretched, because 5*d.* or 6*d.* a day will not support five or six children."

An able-bodied woman may get at some seasons about two stone in a day. At this season, when they are just dug, a single woman could get much more than she could consume, particularly as there are but few beggars now.

The beggars are most numerous in the beginning of summer, the very season at which the farmers can least afford to relieve them.

If a family of six or seven came to the door there would be something more given than would be to an individual, but not at all in proportion to the number; for instance, a woman with six children may, perhaps, get twice as much as a single one; different members of the same family apply to the same persons, but this is rarely done, except in scarce seasons.

An able-bodied beggar would not get as much from each person as an infirm one; but he could travel farther. "Such a man could not live by begging alone; if he was hungry he would get something to eat, but no more."

When beggars obtain more food than they require for their own consumption they sell it, and procure tobacco, snuff, and very frequently soap to wash their clothes with; they have no objection to wearing good clothes, nor would such be an obstacle to relief, as it would be thought such persons begged only from absolute necessity.

Beggars are not supposed to save any thing in summer; their object is to spare their potato gardens for their support in winter.

The pleas under which they beg are,—the men say, that they cannot get work; the women, that their husbands are dead, or away in England at work. Rags, filth and such deceptive means of exciting pity, are used at times by the "trading beggars," but never by the strangers, who are by far the most numerous; and there is no such thing known now as producing sores for the purpose of exhibiting them.

The strangers cannot be better clad than they are, and would not object to be so. "Sure," observed a witness, "a person would not beg if he could dress himself well."

In many cases the "trading beggars" are dissolute, but the strangers in general are not. Beggars are never concerned in outrages; they are not capable, even if willing, of committing such crimes: there are some thefts chargeable to them, but not many.

The women in general treat their children very kindly, and seem as attached to them as any class.

Vagrants have in general large families, as they do not go to beg until they find they cannot support the family by any other means; and therefore they are very seldom beggars when married.

There have not been cases of absolute starvation of late years, but many lives are certainly shortened by bad food and want of covering, particularly at night. Many families have but a coarse sheet as a bed covering for the whole.

In comparing the states of the beggar and labourer together, Mr. Hyleas thought "a man could live better by begging;" and some of the farmers said, "the beggars are better off than many who are endeavouring to keep the house over them."

Very little is ever known by those who give, of the characters of those whom they relieve; "they scarcely ever ask any questions."

This indiscriminate charity is not found in practice injurious to the morals, as those vagrants are mostly well-conducted people; "they pray for those who relieve them, and if they did curse, the people would admonish them and refuse to lodge them again." No attempt is ever made to ascertain what a beggar has already got within the day. When potatoes are plenty, they gather no more than they can consume, as very little money can be had for them then, and alms, a man said, would be given to an utter stranger, "in the honour of God."

Lodging is very commonly given to vagrants, as a man said, "in every house;" but any kind of clothing is very seldom given, and the food given is potatoes, never meal. "The farmers do not use it themselves;" they give milk in summer and never give money, which beggars never expect to get.

There is no limit to the quantity of food to be given every day; that entirely depends on the number of the beggars, and there is no fixed quantity to be given to each; there are some few supported by certain families, but very few.

Some of the farmers give in charity more than would feed an additional labourer, but it is not the custom to plant any ground with potatoes specially to be so given away.

The relief of the beggars falls almost entirely on the farmers, and even the poor and working classes give as much as they can possibly spare, and often give some what they want for themselves. Mr. Hyleas said, "I think the poor give twice as much as the rich in fact, the poor support the poor." The system of charity is so universal and extensive, that the farmers declared that the very poorest, and even those who had been out of their provisions, and were obliged to get some on credit, are willing to share with the more destitute.

A farmer of 10 acres would at some seasons give perhaps a stone, but at others may not be called on for weeks.

The farmers would much prefer the present mode of giving relief to paying a fixed sum, as now they do not feel what they give, and would not at all wish to have any compulsory tax imposed; in the present mode, each can give as much as he pleases, and as one man said, "if the beggar comes to my door, I can stint myself and give to him."

The principal feeling with which relief is given is a religious one, the wish to assist the destitute, but the chief object is, "the honour of God;" they think they have done their "duty" when they have given charity with that object; one man said, "I would give to a beggar for the honour of God, even though I knew he was not in want, and I did not care if he threw it away, for any thing given to God is never lost."—(John Mullowney.)

If an institution was established for the relief of the destitute, some would tell the beggars to go there, but many would give to them still.

With regard to any dread of the beggar's curse, it was said, "they do not like to be cursed by them; but beggars do not curse, as they know that when refused, it is because the person cannot give."

It is not thought that any bad effects arise from the constant intercourse of the beggars with the lower orders of the people; diseases may at times be spread by the habit of giving them lodging in every house, but instances are very seldom known; and they do not consider that any injury arises to morality, as the beggars are always well conducted, and are obliged to put on a show at least of religion before the people, who would not tolerate bad characters.

It is by no means the custom, with the vast majority of the vagrants, to beg the whole year; they only beg during the summer and return to their houses in winter, to live on their stock of potatoes; and formerly no grown-up children were ever seen begging, as when able to do any thing, they invariably went to the farmers to work for their support; but now many young persons do beg, as the farmers are become so poor, they cannot afford to maintain them.

There is no punishment inflicted here for vagrancy, and the feeling of those who give relief would be very much opposed to any punishment for what they consider misfortune, not fault; they said themselves, "we would consider it too cruel to prevent begging, as they have no other mode of life."

They would not assist such a law in any way, and would much rather prevent its operation, which would not have the slightest chance of being efficacious.

The repugnance to an institution for the relief of the destitute, would be removed if the funds for its support came in no way from the people themselves, but they dread such an institution institution very much, lest whatever the law may be, the tax for it would in some way be put by the landlords on the land.

There is no house of industry or mendicity nearer than Sligo; if there was one in the parish, a great many of even the landholders would go in at some seasons of the year, and great numbers would send their families in during the scarce time of summer.

Persons who attended the Examination.

Rev. M. ARMSTRONG.—Right Rev. Dr. BURKE, roman-catholic bishop of Elphin.—Rev. J. DUNLEVIE, parish priest.—R. FEENERY, labourer.—JOHN HARTE, shopkeeper.—FRANK KENNIT, labourer.—JAMES KENNY, esq., M. D. dispensary.—JOHN MARTIN, esq., M. P.—JAMES RAFFERTY, labourer.—WILLIAM STOPFORD, farmer.

IN the town there are more than 100 beggars, estimating by the applications for admittance into the Mendicity; there are about 60 in the Mendicity; it could not maintain more. In the country 50 families are frequently seen begging in one day.

Vagrancy is increasing as there is less employed, because in the country the farmers cannot afford to employ any one from want of capital, and will over-work themselves to avoid it. In the town there is less employment, because there is a stagnation of trade. The periods at which vagrancy are most common are July and August, because these being the dead season of the year, many strangers come in who are the wives and children of labourers who have gone to England or Scotland to seek for work. The town beggars are natives, but in the country they are strangers, as they are ashamed to beg in their neighbourhood. It is common for people in the town to go four or five miles into the country to beg, and they are principally composed of old and infirm men, women and children of every age; "but able-bodied men," Mr. Martin, J. P. says, "very seldom beg." The wife and children of labourers beg, and the labourer himself frequently accompanies them, taking with him his spade, &c., and works if employment can be had, if not, he depends upon his wife's "gatherings;" this commonly the custom; cottier tenants almost invariably go into parts of the country where they are unknown for the purpose of begging, there being the strongest repugnance to seek at first for charity where they are known. Small farmers frequently at an advanced age transfer their land to their children and adopt a vagrant's life. Mr. Martin, J. P. said, "I knew instances of the father's having given up his lands to his son, who then refused to support him, though able, but through my influence did so. Poverty has always something to do with the refusal, and there are thousands who would share their last potatoe with their parents rather than let them have the name of beggars." The regular beggars belong to the towns; such are very seldom met with in the country; the strangers all belong to the country; there are but few vagrants children of beggars; some may, but they are by no means numerous, as grown-up children are scarcely ever sent to beg. "I never," said Mr. Martin, M. P., "saw a child able to work with a beggar; at some seasons 500 children may be seen gathering shell fish to sell or live on." The majority of beggars are those who formerly earned their own subsistence, and have through misfortune been reduced to begging; very few (if any) of the strangers beg through choice, but after a time the habit may become strong, though in the beginning all would work if they could obtain employment. The quantity of potatoes or meal daily obtained by a woman and her children may be about two stone; but men rarely beg, except when labouring under some disease that may excite pity. "A single woman, able-bodied, by exerting herself for some hours during the day, may obtain somewhat more food than she could consume; during the potato-digging season a beggar is never refused a basket of potatoes by any person," said William Young.

Very little is to be obtained by beggars in town from passengers in coaches, cars, &c.; very little too can be had on Sundays at the chapel or church doors, as, since the establishment of the Mendicity, beggars have been prevented from begging at such places. Should a family of beggars, consisting of father, mother and three or four children, apply for relief, the quantity of food given would be increased, but not in proportion to the number of applicants. An able-bodied man, accompanied by children, seldom gets much, but if accompanied by them always gets a larger portion, as those to whom application is made always imagine, in the latter case, that necessity alone urges him to beg. Different members of a family apply frequently to the same persons for relief, and with success. "Every shift," said one, "to get through life." An infirm man is always sure of receiving more than an able-bodied person. A man without children will get very little; if accompanied by children he can travel but little. A single woman, able-bodied, can undoubtedly get more than if she had children, being able to travel much further without them than with them.

When beggars obtain more food than they require for their own consumption, they often sell, but mostly exchange it for tobacco, of which they are very fond, often declaring they would prefer it to food; their petition to gentlemen is mostly "for money for tobacco." They have no objection to being well clad, because that it may prevent their obtaining charity. One man said, "it is the spirit of them to put clothes on them if they can." Good clothes are no obstacle to their being relieved. There is a woman in this parish who is always relieved, because she is clean and well dressed.

Some of the wandering beggars are supposed to lay up something from their savings, but, the people said, "it must be little, as they can scarcely save enough on Saturday for Sunday."

The men mostly beg under the plea that they cannot get work, or are ill, or otherwise disabled. The women say, their husbands are dead, or away at work in a distant part of the country, or in England. Rags, dirt, and such appearances, are not fostered for the purpose of exciting pity; "it is not at all necessary, as their own appearance bespeaks their misery." Vagrants, of that class called fair beggars, who attend fairs and such places, are supposed to exhibit at times pretended sores, but not to produce them in reality. A farmer said, "there is too much of that; every man that has a sore shows it." A man was tried some time since at the sessions of Sligo, for exhibiting a pretended sore; but Rev. Mr. Armstrong said, "it is not near so common now as formerly it was." Beggars have not been known to refuse to have their sores cured, but has frequently refused to go into hospital, not lest they may lose the advantage of exhibiting them, but because they are afraid of their limbs being amputated.

These exhibitions of their sores are sometimes at fairs very disgusting, but not frequently now, as the police prevent them.

Some of the regular beggars are drunkards; none other can afford it. T. Taite says, "I often see them come to my next neighbour's (who sells spirits) to drink."

There are some thefts chargeable to them, but to no extent, and they never are considered in distress.

The women treat their children very kindly. "They mostly look strong and healthy, and many of them are kept clean and well dressed."

The beggars often share with each other. One man said, "I am sure they do; they are more disposed to feel for poverty than other classes." Rev. Mr. Dunlevie did not recollect instances of beggars hoarding up money, but two instances were mentioned; one of a man called "Blind Cavaugh," who, about two years ago, gave a woman ten sovereigns to live with him as his wife. Having lost his sight, he has no resource but begging, and seldom leaves the immediate neighbourhood of the town.

Another well-known mendicant, with a wooden leg, who begs constantly on Ballinode Hill (within half a mile of the town), not long since gave his daughter, on her marriage, two cows and two acres of land, and to his son, on the same occasion, one cow and one acre of land; his wife lives with him, and he has been a confirmed beggar for many years.

With regard to borrowing children for the purpose of begging, it was said that there is no certainty upon it; but it is supposed, that when two women have each two children, one will go out one day with the four, and the other the next.

Beggars have in general four or five children each with them, but they are never beggars when married; they never begin housekeeping with the prospect of begging; they think that when married they will be well off. The number of illegitimate children is very small. Rev. Mr. Dunlevie says, "it is very small in any class."

Cases are not now known; but D. Kenney says, "I know that lives are very often shortened, by the insufficiency and bad quality of their food and hardships. In 1822, I often attended people who were so weak from abstinence, that when food was given, it was more an injury than otherwise, as their stomachs could not bear it."

An able-bodied man, without children, would get very little by begging; but considering the great want of employment there is, it is agreed to unanimously, that a woman with two children could support her husband better by begging, than he could support her by his labour. "There are instances of men going with their wives and seeking for work, but when they find that she can get a sufficiency for their support, they neglect to look for employment."

Those who give in general know nothing of those whom they relieve; they are mostly strangers, and the people did not consider this indiscriminate charity had any bad effect on public morals.

Very few, if any, of those vagrants are persons who prefer that wandering life to one of labour; "but when once they begin to beg, and lose this shame, the habit grows strong with them." They have been known at times to refuse work when offered to them, but such persons say they are prevented by some bodily injury.

There seems to be no caution against impositions; no attempt is ever made to ascertain how much a beggar may have got that day already, "indeed it is impossible to know, for when they get a stone or more of potatoes they put them to hide somewhere and go on; they bring all home at night, but cannot carry much, as they mostly have children on their backs."

Lodging is very commonly given to beggars, in the country particularly it will not be refused at any cabin, and many who beg in the town go into the country to sleep every night. The food given is always potatoes; the farmers cannot afford to use meal themselves, the oats are sold to "make up" the rent, and they live on potatoes alone; they never give money, beggars would not in general prefer it, but they beg for some "for tobacco."

There is no limit fixed to the quantity of food to be given daily, it depends entirely on the number of those who call, nor is there any fixed quantity to be given to each; about a stone or a stone and half of potatoes. There are some few who are mainly supported by certain families, but very few.

The chief burden of supporting the beggars in the country falls on the small landholders, of four or five acres. The majority of the farmers hold less than 10, and there is no doubt but the poor and working classes give, in proportion to their means, much more than the rich, as the Rev. Mr. Dunlevie said, "from the little they have they always give. The beggar cannot save much; they may get more one day and less another, but there is very little to spare at the end of the week."

A farmer of 10 acres in the summer season may give away (one day with another) one stone a day, but at other seasons weeks may elapse without a beggar calling; the shop-keepers in town give very little at their doors now; all subscribe to the mendicity. The farmers would much rather give the beggars food, as they do at present, than pay even less in a round sum for the same purpose; but the shop-keepers do readily subscribe to the mendicity, and consider it a great advantage to their trade, as the beggars are kept out of the streets. Rev. Mr. Dunlevie says, "some reflecting men may prefer to pay a round sum, but the majority of the farmers even if an institution was established, would still give to the beggars at their doors, and would therefore consider it of no advantage to them."

The feeling with which relief is given is purely religious. Those persons are in the habit of praying for those by whom they are relieved, and the people have a kind of dread of "putting a beggar empty from their door." They also expect to be rewarded for their charity hereafter; the people would not consider themselves bound to give to a person they did not think in want. Rev. Mr. Dunlevie says, "if an institution was established many would give still to beggars at their door, but if they paid for the support of it themselves they would soon tell them to go there, and would consider their charity properly disposed of." Charity is not given through fear of the beggar's curse, there is no such fear, but it is not general; "people would not wish to have their curse." Diseases are often spread through the country by the custom of giving lodging to beggars; the cholera was almost invariably introduced by beggars.

There was a great diversity of opinion as to whether the morals of the labouring classes were injured by this association with vagrants; the general opinion was that they were not, because these were in general moral and religious people who were driven to that mode of life by necessity, and who abandoned it as soon as they were able. William Stopford said, the beggars and those with whom they lodge are addicted to cursing and swearing, but he could not say it was owing to the evil habits and example of the beggars.

The old people when they become long inured to begging, seldom endeavour to live by any other means, but the young ones frequently do, and the children invariably quit it as soon as able to work.

There is no punishment here for begging, and the opinion of those who give relief would be most strongly against it. The magistrates did not think they could justly punish for begging until they had provided a place for the beggars. Since the establishment of the mendicity they had persons to clear the streets, and for a time had succeeded in preventing that begging; but it has grown up again, as the funds of the institution are limited, and will not admit of any more being taken in.

There is a Mendicity Institution in the town but not sufficiently extensive; its annual income during the late two years did not amount to 250 l. collected chiefly by charity sermons at the places of worship of all denominations. The number of persons relieved by it at present is 51, 30 of whom go begging in the house. There is an unwillingness to go into this establishment, but it may be owing to the way in which the inmates are supported; they get each three pounds and a half of potatoes twice in the day, and half a pint of buttermilk at each meal. Dr. Kenny did not consider this sufficient. On Sundays they get a breakfast of "stirabout," and at times soup or meat when any may be sent in by the market jury. They are all infirm men and women, and are able to do very little work of any kind; some few of the women spin, and are allowed to have what they can earn to buy tobacco and snuff; but the men are all so infirm that when a short time since the committee had contracted for sweeping the streets, they were obliged to hire four men to do it. The clerk of the house said, there is a reluctance to go in, they prefer stout begging, but if punished for it many would crowd into the establishment; some who were reluctant to enter became well content with it afterwards. He thinks that 300 l. a year would enable them to take in all their own poor.

Rev. GEORGE DAWSON, impropriate curate of Aghade, and vicar of Ballin.—Rev. Mr. KINSELA, P. P., of Ballin.—Mr. MICHAEL LENON, miller and farmer.—Mr. THOMAS TOMLINSON, farmer.

THE number of beggars in this parish is about 20, and no accession to that class has been recently observed.

The scarcity of provisions which there is in the months of May, June and July, previous to the harvest, is the signal for the commencement of their wanderings. Amongst the number of vagrants above indicated, there are but three males; the remainder are females, for the most part of from 40 to 70 years of age, who having been left widows and finding it impossible to procure employment, have recourse to this mode of life and take their children in general with them; nearly one-half of them are infirm through old age; but Mr. Tomlinson "knows three or four stout women of this class who are the mothers of illegitimate children and who accompany them." Begging is altogether confined to those who either cannot or will not procure employment during the week. We could learn but one instance to the contrary: a labouring man had contracted a debt with the farmer who employed him, and who stopped his wages in repayment; the unfortunate man, to save his family from destitution, was compelled to send them out as mendicants. The barony of Forth is but thinly inhabited, and there is not any instance known where cottier tenants or their families have turned vagrants, either in this parish or elsewhere; not more than five or six are in the habit of annually migrating to England, and these being possessed of the few shillings necessary for their expenses, cannot in any way be looked upon as beggars. There are so few villages in this district, that reduced tradesmen are rare; mechanics there are none. In justification of the few male vagrants whom we have mentioned, Mr. Tomlinson states, that he knows them all to have been industrious whilst their strength lasted, and that they are now completely worn out; none of them having adopted their mode of life through preference, or after having ceded their property to their children.

The country districts are unquestionably most productive of mendicancy; all the beggars in this town have originally come from various parts of the country.

The roman catholic clergyman informed us that about one-fourth of them were born of parents who had followed the same course, and in this assertion, Mr. Tomlinson so far concurred, as to say that the number of persons so born was considerable. Fully one-third are accustomed to plead in excuse of their habits, the loss of husbands, or some other relations on whom they had depended for support; and very few are notorious idlers whom the facility of gaining relief induces to adopt this line of life, and those few are from another neighbourhood or mere passing strollers.

Very little or no meal is here given in charity, the usual practice in this barony being to give some boiled potatoes, and sometimes a little buttermilk; about a stone of potatoes may be assumed as the average collection of a beggar. An able-bodied beggar, however, though such are not often encouraged, will decidedly be able to collect more than he can consume. Few travellers pass through this country; little therefore can be expected from such a source, and as to what is given in money by the charitable at places of worship on Sundays, the share of each beggar does not often exceed 3*d.* or 4*d.*

The possession of a family is a source of wealth to a mendicant, as he is almost sure to receive in proportion to their numbers. Strangers in particular take advantage of the knowledge of this fact, and father, mother and children often appeal successfully to the same person in succession, who gives as readily and as much to the able-bodied, if known to be distressed, as to the infirm.

Whatever remains after the supply of the vagrant's wants, is usually sold at less than the market price; with the money he purchases tobacco, fuel, soap and other necessaries. It may be said that dissipation and drunkenness are seldom the result of this acquisition of money, and persons of this class being well known to all the inhabitants meet with encouragement and further charity, in proportion as they appear to have made a good use of what they have previously obtained. Though thus to a certain degree provident, the stationary beggar can only provide for his present wants, and winter finds him destitute, and surrounded with a starving family.

The mendicants who reside here, and whose destitution is well known, are not obliged to have recourse to the common falsehood of being unable to procure work in order to obtain charity; but this is a common plea with the itinerant. We have just mentioned that rags and dirt are not here deemed essential to the exciting of sympathy, and the Rev. Mr. Kinsela recollects but one case which would disprove this assertion. He had given a woman the means of procuring good clothing, who, nevertheless, preferred continuing shoeless and miserable. Equally rare is the assumption of infirmities; for though the reprehensible practice exists of terrifying the timid, and especially pregnant women, with the display of diseased and disgusting limbs, &c., Mr. Tomlinson alone was able to quote an instance in which a man who feigned lameness, and thereby received alms, was afterwards discovered to be perfectly sound. Neither has the immorality of parents, or their want of feeling, ever permitted them to retain in misery their maimed, blind or otherwise afflicted children when any offer has been made of placing them in a better condition.

The beggars belonging to these parishes cannot be considered as a dissolute class, and but few instances are to be met with where they have been concerned in outrages either on person or property, further than occasional depredation in the theft of potatoes in the field or on wearing apparel left incautiously out to dry. Having already stated what description of persons they are, it could not be expected or indeed denied that they should show any inclination to emigrate to America, or even seek any employment in England during the harvest. When it is found that their natural feelings towards their children are much blunted and enfeebled, we need not look for any display of kindness between the parent and child further than the sharing of surplus food. Their charity does not extend to their fellow paupers, yet do they sometimes accumulate sums considerable for persons in their circumstances, amounting often to 2*l.* or 3*l.* A woman died lately whose life had been devoted to mendicancy, and on her death her savings, consisting of 12*l.*, passed through the hands of the Rev. Mr. Dawson for the benefit of her relatives.

The beggars of this district are not observed to be particularly premature in their marriages, but their families are in general large, many possessing six children. Amongst them are considered the greatest number of illegitimate births. Their circumstances are usually better than those of cabin keepers in general, and the mortality amongst them is simply that of the lower orders; death from starvation is unknown.

The gains of an able-bodied vagrant can never equal those of an industrious labourer, because the former meets with discouragement.

The better acquainted a farmer or other person is with an individual subsisting on charity, the more likely the latter is to be successful in his application for relief, and this is not found to have any bad effects on the morality of any class, so far as this district is considered; nevertheless, although few can here live by begging who are capable of supporting themselves selves by manual labour, it is thought that the confirmed vagrant prefers his mode of life to that of the industrious labourer, with equal earnings; and "once," said Mr. Dawson, "I was present when my steward offered work to a sturdy vagabond, who refused to accept it; but he was a stranger."

Previous to giving alms, it is not usual to inquire whether the applicant has already received sufficient for his daily support; and charity is frequently given to those of whose character the giver is wholly ignorant.

Potatoes constitute the ordinary food given to beggars, who not unfrequently are admitted to a night's lodging, and even sometimes receive articles of clothing; in summer buttermilk is always afforded. Relief assumes the shape of food rather than of money with the farmer, merely because he is better supplied with the former. The beggar would invariably prefer the latter; and Rev. J. W. Dawson stated that a common experiment of his was to offer a mendicant two pennyworth of potatoes or a halfpenny. The result was always a preference for the money.

The charitable are only limited in the quantity of food which they bestow by their own discretion. A double handful of meal is called "a charity," and in some houses a measure is kept of about the same capacity, which is given away according to the number and distress of the applicants. Large and respectable farmers often give away in the course of the year to the value of nine or ten pounds, what in short is equivalent to the maintenance of an additional labourer. None of the mendicants residing in this parish are supported as pensioners by individual families, nor have the shopkeepers acquired the habit of allowing them any weekly stipend or pay.

There is not one resident landlord in these united parishes; consequently the burden of supporting the poor falls almost entirely on the farmers, the shopkeepers being very few and only to be met with in the village of Ballin. The poorer classes thus contribute much more than the rich; even the cottier, whose condition is infinitely worse than the beggars, and who not unfrequently shares his supper with him when he can, though his charity in most cases cannot exceed the accommodation of a night's lodging. Though more food is occasionally given to an applicant than he may require, it does not follow that any waste of provision ensues, the surplus being exchanged for other necessaries as before described.

The quantity given away by a farmer holding 10 acres of ground, may be rated at six pounds of potatoes one day with another, whilst the amount distributed in money by shopkeepers (who prefer such mode of relief) would not be too highly estimated at a penny per diem. However no instances were adduced where individuals had extended their charity so far as to injure themselves. On the important question whether the farmers and shopkeepers would prefer this irregular drain on them to a fixed annual payment for the poor, there was a considerable discrepancy among the witnesses. Mr. Dawson was of opinion that they would, whilst Mr. Kinsela said he knew some instances of a contrary feeling, and Mr. Lenon decidedly thought that a poor rate would meet with their approbation.

A mere stranger will be often successful in eliciting alms by his importunity, but the usual motive for giving is the supposition that the demander is in a state of want, though not absolute privation, a condition not common here. The custom of this district may have some influence on the donor; but both the Rev. Mr. Kinsela and the Rev. Mr. Dawson concur in attributing to religious feeling the greater part of the charity which exists among parishioners, and assert that this feeling would be productive of the same effects were even a legal and accessible source of provision open to the poor. Little is procured through fear of violence, and only the most illiterate dread the beggar's curse consequent on refusal; many however attach much value to his blessing.

Many instances are known where disease has been introduced into the house in which a vagrant has received a night's lodging, and the moral effects of such intercourse are frequently as bad. The Rev. Mr. Kinsela said "I knew a mendicant who was employed to offer a bribe for the seduction of a farmer's daughter; fortunately the intrigue was discovered in time, the young woman was saved and removed to America. The feeling of the neighbourhood afterwards compelled the beggar to quit the country." He mentioned other instances where their busy interference and tale-bearing had produced quarrels between (previously) well-disposed neighbours.

Those who have been long accustomed to a life of vagrancy, seldom or never change it for a better, yet they cannot be looked upon actually as a distinct class.

There is no punishment for vagrancy in this district, nor is it probable that a starving man would fear any punishment; as it is not considered a crime to beg, the feelings of the inhabitants are repugnant to any coercive measures for checking such practices, and they would not have recourse to any laws having such tendency. Such laws would therefore be inoperative under existing circumstances, and could only be rendered effectual by removing the necessity of soliciting relief. Instances have occurred here where potatoes have been stolen and sheep killed without any further outrage, and merely through the pressure of impending starvation.

There are no houses of industry or similar institutions in these parishes, and it is therefore difficult to ascertain whether the paupers would prefer the certain maintenance they would afford, coupled with personal restraint, to the uncertain support derived from begging accompanied with liberty. It is however suspected that they would prefer the latter condition.

THE number of beggars in this parish amounts to from 100 to 150; but on the ground of increase or decrease there is a difference of opinion among the witnesses. Those who contend for the increase attribute it to the policy of landlords consolidating their small farms. One of the witnesses stated his knowledge of two or three families thus circumstanced in town. One in particular, who had a good farm and was well off, now in a state of the greatest poverty, and must beg in a few days.

The particular periods when vagrancy most prevails are winter and midsummer, and the causes then are, in summer, the increased price of provisions; and in winter, their wants being more numerous, requiring fuel, clothes, &c., and they have no alternative but to beg. The beggars relieved are generally residents, wandering beggars being discouraged, and in some instances being expelled by the officers of health, under a recent statute. The powers of those officers are considered of great benefit in preventing idlers from settling here. As to age and sex, they are mostly aged and middle-aged; three-fourths females, one-tenth children under 15 years of age; and the reason why the females are most numerous is, the greater difficulty of getting employment; the labouring man getting at least occasional employment. In the town 40 or 50 beg about the streets, most of them singly, and of the one-fourth only beg, from being incapable of working. There is no instance of those earning support by labour in weekdays, begging on Sundays. The wives and children of employed labourers are known to beg; Mr. Butler said, "I met a woman doing so yesterday;" another instance in the country, the wife and children begging while the husband and son were working at home and able to maintain them. The tradesman is more reluctant to beg than the labourer or cottier, from his being in general better educated, and in a degree more civilized; if they should by circumstances be reduced, their friends are better able to relieve them, and do so; disabled or unemployed servants also beg; they generally get alms from those with whom they lived; cottier tenants also sometimes beg, when provisions are very dear, at the end of spring and midsummer. Mr. Johnson knows several instances of cottier tenants coming from the adjacent counties, who work here now at the canal, and their wives and children go about the country begging, and these get more in charity than their husbands do by work. Occasionally too, the small farmers of the parish make over their farms on their sons and go to beg. They do not emigrate from this parish to England for work.

They come from various parts, but are generally the natives of towns; many also who were dispossessed of their houses, by their landlords, come into town for refuge. Lynch, the carpenter, states, "I believe that half the people are driven to becoming Whitefeet, and other illegal bodies, from destitution." One man, who was dispossessed of a farm, 80 years in the family, and showed me the receipt for his last half-year's rent; he was thrown out of his plot of ground, without any consideration; he was an industrious man, and had letters as to character from the most respectable men; one from the late Doctor Doyle; he was in such agony of mind, he asked me should he join "the Whitefeet." Kenna, the labourer, knows instances too.

The proportion of those brought up as beggars was not known; but there were many such; but one half certainly are reduced by circumstances over which they have no control.

The following instances were given by witnesses:—A shoemaker of good character, who earned five or six shillings a week, whose family, on his death, were reduced to beggary. A woman of the name of Rice, who is now a beggar, from the sickness of her husband who is "bedridden;" he was a hair-dresser, in good business, and of sober and industrious habits; a labourer in the employment of Captain Battersby, an industrious man, on his death his family were immediately obliged to beg, and collect the price of a coffin for him; also a labourer being sick, his family, to prolong his life, were obliged to beg; and many instances were known of families being obliged to beg, on the death of the fathers or husbands. This class were considered proverbially improvident. Numbers also are induced to beg from the facilities of subsistence it affords. This was universally allowed.

A beggar would collect on an average two stone of potatoes in the day; scarcely any meal; an able-bodied beggar could not obtain more food than he would consume, such persons not meeting any encouragement. There are at least 20 sturdy beggars, chiefly women, with bastard children, who being able to work, yet obtain the means of support, by crowding round the stage-coaches, importuning the passengers for money, which on being given to be divided amongst them, produces constant quarrelling and drinking among them; one woman was transported some time ago as a vagrant, for using obscene language.

The quantity given to beggars does not seem to be guided by any reference to the number of the family, except that the able-bodied do not get as much, not having the same claim on the the feelings. Beggars sometimes after applying in a family, separate, and beg again from the same persons with success. Dr. Stone has detected many instances of this himself; it is a common practice.

They have been known to sell the surplus collections at the market; and though they would be inclined to purchase really useful articles, they seldom are able.

They usually beg under the plea of a fruitless search for work; and it is considered to be the truth; there being no work many months in the year.

They encourage dirt and rags, in many cases, to excite pity. Dr. Stone mentions his knowledge of the following:—A beggar, at Leighlin Bridge, whom he has frequently seen intoxicated with the produce of his begging, when he may buy clothes with it; and also a man, who used crutches to excite the compassion of passers by; but on very wet days, not expecting to see any one, he has seen him sturdy and well, without crutches, whitewashing his house.

The spectacles and exhibitions of sores they sometimes make, are most disgusting and painful. Mr. Butler states, he knew two or three instances of injurious effects being caused by such exhibitions. Those who have maimed or diseased children have not been known to refuse to allow them into asylums. On the contrary, Dr. Stone gives an instance, where the mother of an insane child was extremely desirous of getting it into a lunatic asylum; but in consequence of its being an epileptic subject, it could not be received. But he has known a woman, not the parent, taking a blind orphan about the country to excite pity. Those women have not been known to carry children in the wet and cold with bad clothing. But Dr. Stone states, that he has seen them pinch the children to make them cry, so as to excite pity; and has even heard them ask the children, why they did not cry, when they were desired; thus creating a state of mind quite incompatible with morality.

Vagrants are in many instances very dissolute. Dr. Stone, says, "several of both sexes have often called for my professional aid in diseases which are produced by illicit intercourse." The extent of thefts committed by vagrants is not very great; but when it occurs, it is considered to arise from very great distress. They are not inclined to emigrate. They have not been known to share their earnings with others more destitute than themselves, nor do they hoard them, as they seldom get enough to do so. It was not thought that they were equally kind to their children, as other people are; nor have the children the same respect for their parents; their indolent and immoral life renders it impossible.

They have frequently large families; some in this town five or six children each; yet the number of illegitimate children amongst them is not so great as amongst labourers. There has been no death amongst them from actual starvation; but in many instances life has been greatly shortened from want of food and care.

An able-bodied man begging would be sure to be rejected.

The persons who give generally know the characters of the beggars in town, but not in the country; and the prevalence of private charity has not been known to be prejudicial to the morals of the labouring classes. Vagrants doubtlessly prefer the wandering unsteady life to that of a labourer, with equal earnings. Mr. Butler, says, "I, as a magistrate, confined a female sturdy beggar, three times, at the request of her family, who were ashamed of her avocation, and were willing to support her. I saw her begging this day." Still very few adopt such a life in preference to remaining labourers; and though there are instances of beggars in the country refusing to work at the ordinary wages, yet such cases are very rare.

Those who give, make no endeavour to find out the character of a vagrant before they bestow charity, particularly strangers, which frequently leads to most injurious effects. "I have seen," said Lieut. Battersby, C. C., "numerous instances of beggars thus relieved expending the money in whiskey immediately afterwards."

In the country a night's lodging is given, but not in towns; they have to pay one or two pence a night for it. Clothes are not given to them; for if given, they would be pawned. In the country they get potatoes principally, and in town a bit of bread at the door. The farmers prefer giving them food to money, requiring all the money he can "scrape together" for the rent; but the beggars would prefer money, it being easier carried; and as they want it to buy coals, turf being scarce here, as well as to pay for their lodging.

There is no precise limit as to the quantity given, but something is given to each person; generally two handfuls; in some houses a small measure kept for the purpose.

It was considered that there were many farmers who give away as much in alms as would support an additional labourer. There are a few also supported by families, as pensioners. Some shopkeepers likewise give weekly allowances. Mr. Coffey, a respectable shopkeeper, distributes every week four shillings among the poor; (as he states the annual value of his premises to be 50 l., he is actually charging himself with a poor rate of 4*s.* in the pound.)

It is customary for farmers in this parish to plant some potatoes exclusively for the beggars. Mr. Butler, states, it is "habitual" for a farmer having fifty acres, to plant one of potatoes for the poor. A farmer, a tenant of Colonel Bruin, told Mr. Butler he planted two acres each year for the purpose.

The relief of the poor falls principally on the farmers in the country, and in town on the shopkeepers, they being the most easy of access and of course the most annoyed.

Even the labourers give, though they cannot give much beyond a night's lodging.

Mr. Butler considers 10 acres of land would not enable a man to give much; they seldom have more than supports life and pays rent; but the small shopkeeper gives 3*d.* or 4*d.* a day.

As to which the farmers and shopkeepers would prefer, the present mode of giving, to a regular sum, it was considered by the witnesses, that the shopkeeper would prefer a regular sum; but the farmer would prefer voluntary charity, to get a blessing from the beggar, and also from from habit. But Mr. Vigors, M. P. for Carlow, states, that he is quite satisfied if it was explained to the farmers they would prefer it.

Relief is often given by travellers from fear of the applicant suffering great privation. The practice of the district, too, is often a reason that induces to give, and occasionally it is extorted by mere importunity. Religious feeling, too, as a duty, greatly operates; but certainly if relief, in an establishment precluding the possibility of the applicant being in want, would diminish that feeling.

Fear of violence is not often a motive, but Mr. Haughton states, that in 1831, during the time of the snow, some beggars, accompanied by labourers, amounting to 200, came to his gate and sent up a deputation of five demanding relief; except, however, in such scarcity, no instance is known; neither is it given from fear of the beggars' curse; their curse is disregarded, though their blessings are desired.

The system of giving a night's lodging is often the means of spreading diseases among the people. Mr. Butler states an instance of a family, five in number, getting typhus fever under such circumstances.

The morals and habits of the labouring classes are injured by the association arising from giving them a night's lodging. Dissolute females have been known to have produced immoral habits in the families of labourers, seducing their daughters, &c., and farmers have been obliged to drive them away from their houses for using obscene language; besides, they are in many cases the means of spreading discontent, by repeating stories calculated to breed ill-will.

No instance was known of persons following a vagrant life returning to industry. The Rev. Mr. Vernon tried to reclaim a boy and his father, by sending the former to school and giving the latter food, but failed. To another, a shoemaker, he gave 10*s.* to buy leather, and although a good workman he is still begging. Mr. Haughton often offered work to those sturdy beggars who crowd about the coaches, and they never accepted it; they congregate in parties and generally in the end become a separate class.

Sturdy beggars are presented by the grand jury, and in default of bail the judge of assize transports them for seven years; three or four have been thus treated within the last 12 years. This punishment has had no visible effect in checking vagrancy, inasmuch as the feeling of the people generally is against these rigorous laws and prevents prosecutions: for though they could be applied in 400 cases, they have not been acted on in four. Persons stealing provisions are seldom, if ever, prosecuted, from the supposition of their being in want; but this repugnance would probably be removed, if a provision were made that prevented the chance of starvation. No outrages have been attributed to actual destitution.

There is no house of industry in the parish, nor even if there were would more than one-third be willing to go into it; many refused when a mendicity existed here before. Some beggars were seen, the day it was opened, going away from the town to Naas.

THE Rev. Mr. Phelan states, that there are about 100 professed beggars in the union of parishes, and that the number has been increasing owing to the low prices of agricultural produce.

The Rev. Mr. Kehoe says, "there are in the protestant parish of Wells about 150 beggars, making a total of 250."

Rev. Mr. Phelan states, that they have increased 50 per cent. within the last ten years, in consequence of the consolidation of farms as well as the low prices of produce.—(All concur.)

The Rev. Mr. Andrew Phelan goes on to state, that "within the last five or six years 190 families have been ejected from the estates of the landed proprietors in the barony of East Idrone, amounting in the whole to 626, of whom 152 are widows and orphans." He further states, "I recollect in one instance of 10 or 11 families who were driven off one town-land; three or four persons perished in most melancholy destitution. A few of the dispossessed families erected temporary huts in the dike of the road opposite the land from which they were removed, by placing a few sticks covered with stubbles of straw and potatoe stalks as a shield against the trials of the weather, but the rain flowed in, and some who had not strength to bear up against the trials they had to encounter sank beneath them. Among these were Stephen Cummins, his wife and Mary Prendergast. The two former were old and feeble; the latter was confined in the hut. She got cold during her confinement, of which she died; after lingering sometime the infant also died."

The part of the year at which vagrancy prevails most is in June, July and part of August, and in the months of December and January, owing to the high price of provisions and want of employment. At those periods about three-fourths of the beggars are natives or residents, but there are many wandering through the town from other districts.

Mr. Magee says, "they are chiefly females between the ages of 30 and 60. There is one old man whom I recollect begging these 10 years; he is upwards of 80 years of age; he lives very well and is drunk every day, and would average, on a good day's begging, 10 glasses of whiskey."

Mr. Corrigan states, "that there are 25 beggars come to his house every Saturday morning, whose ages vary from 30 to 80; they are all females, with the exception of three old men and an orphan boy."

The labourers are obliged to send their wives and families begging at these periods, as they cannot support them from want of employment.

The average rate of wages being 10*d.* per day and the average employment seven months in the year, the labourer cannot be considered able to support himself and family without getting some assistance in that way.

Rev. Mr. Atkinson states, "that he has known several instances of the wives of labourers last summer begging while their husbands were employed, and that they often sold the collected potatoes at the dear periods for 6*d.* per stone."

Mr. Corrigan states, "that he has often employed men, and has known that the families begged during that period."

The Rev. Mr. Kehoe says, "unless the males are fortunate enough to obtain constant employment, the families are almost unavoidably found begging."

There are very few servants seen begging in the town. It is supposed that those who get married to tradesmen, &c. while in service, are supported by the families they live with.

The cottier tenants are seldom known to beg, except in seasons of great distress.

Rev. Mr. Phelan states, "that he has known several instances in the year 1826, when provisions were dear, of the cottier tenants going begging in the Queen's and other adjoining counties."

Mr. Corrigan knows an instance of a sawyer who went to England for employment, but was unsuccessful, and was obliged to cut off and sell his wife's hair, in order to support and bring them home.

There are only fifteen labourers who annually go to England in the harvest, and they always pay their way.

Mr. Corrigan knows seven or eight labourers in town who would migrate, and saw an instance of a labourer yesterday endeavouring to sell a small portion of potatoes in order to pay his passage to England, but was prevented by his wife.

The beggars are all from the country districts.—(All concur.)

The proportion of beggars who are themselves the children of beggars is very small. When the children grow up, they generally give up begging; and no instance is known of an adult beggar continuing so from infancy. Three-fourths of them are reduced by circumstances over which they have no control; namely, want of employment, and loss of health. A very small minority are reduced to beg from the facility of obtaining relief.—(All concur.)

About two stone of potatoes is the daily average which an able-bodied beggar, it is supposed, could collect in the day. Meal is scarcely ever given, except to the aged and infirm.

Mr. Corrigan states, "he knows an able-bodied beggarman who has not collected less on an average than five stone of potatoes per day for the last six months."

Very little consideration is given in plentiful seasons to the quantity of alms bestowed. Mr. Little states, he has known several instances of beggars refusing white potatoes, called lumpers, because they would not get so good a price for them in the market!

The quantity of potatoes given by the farmers in alms would be increased in proportion to the number in the family or group who apply. In some few cases, different members of the same family apply with success for relief to the same person, but this is generally done by strange beggars. There will be a larger quantity given to the infirm or aged beggar than to the able-bodied, unless the latter is known to be in great distress.

The beggars sell their surplus collections of food, and frequently it is an inducement to the distressed cabin-keeper to give them a night's lodging in exchange; they also obtain tobacco, tea, soap and other necessaries, sometimes whiskey, in exchange for their surplus collections. They are generally unable to obtain clothing.

Mr. Bagnall, however, states, "I know a beggar who was given a new suit of clothes, who in a very short time sold them for whiskey."

The itinerant beggars are not generally able to make any provision beyond the next day, and scarcely ever have an opportunity of being well clad.

The able-bodied usually beg under the plea that they are looking for work, and sometimes beggars will encourage the appearance of dirt, rags, &c. to excite sympathy.

Mr. Turney states "his having once remonstrated with a beggarman in a fair, who exposed a very ulcerated arm; he replied, 'Would you, sir, shut your sheep up in the pen, and not expose them?'"

The Rev. Mr. Kehoe says, "he knew an instance of a beggarman who frequented fairs, and acknowledged to him, that he burned his ears and face with vitriol to produce sores."

"This gentleman also stated an instance of a beggarman to whom he gave a suit of clothes, two shirts and stockings; he never wore any of them but the coat, and that only for three weeks, which he sold with the remainder for whiskey."

Mr. Bagnall has known some beggars who have been detected in telling lies, by stating their husbands, parents and other relatives were dead, when such was not the case."

The Rev. Mr. Kehoe states, "that nothing was more common than for beggars in the barony of West Idrone carrying about, in the most inclement weather, children afflicted with sores and diseases, in order to excite sympathy, and that they are remarkable for immorality."

The habits of vagrants are not generally supposed to be dissolute; although Mr. Little states, "that he knows an instance of a female in this town who is supposed to be cohabiting with a young man, and supporting him by begging, he having no visible means of earning his bread."

Mr. Tierney has known several instances of beggars stealing clothes, &c. from farmers who gave them lodgings; one man stole the blanket given him to sleep on; and states, that on this account farmers are latterly very unwilling to give a night's lodging to beggars, and they generally are given it by labourers who have nothing to lose.

It is supposed the confirmed vagrant would not on any account be induced to emigrate; but the labourer would be most anxious to do so, and is only prevented by want of means.

Beggars are as attached as other classes to their children, but their children are very often ungrateful towards the parents. They are not often known to hoard their earnings; though Mr. Little says, "there is a beggarman in town between fifty and sixty years of age who is considered to have money laid by."

Vagrants frequently have large families, occasionally as many as five children, and of these children a much larger number are illegitimate than amongst those of the labouring classes. The mortality is supposed to be much greater amongst the former than the latter; and though there cannot be any instances of their dying from actual starvation, yet death is very often hastened by a want of proper sustenance.

The able-bodied man could not collect more by begging than by working, as he would not be considered an object of compassion; but it is thought that an able-bodied woman could collect much more by begging than working, their average rate of wages being 6*d.* per day, and the average employment one day and a half in the week.

The characters of the town mendicants are known, but not of those strolling about in the country. Private charity has been found injurious to the morals of the labouring classes in this town; in proof of which, Mr. Bagnall states the two following instances:—

"The first was an able-bodied man who obtained charity from him under the plea that he was starving through the impossibility of obtaining work, but whom he afterwards found out to have had 40*l.*, and who has at this moment masons employed to build a house for him within two miles of the town. The other was an able-bodied man who sought charity from him, and to whom he offered work, breaking stones for the road, at about 7*d.* per day; and he refused." Mr. B. further states, "I have frequently offered work under similar circumstances, and it has been always refused."

Vagrants do not take to a life of mendicancy from choice, but when once driven to it, they seldom give it over.

Alms would not be generally given in towns without some knowledge of the beggar's character; but in the country charity is bestowed indiscriminately, without any reference to the character of the mendicant.

A night's lodging is always given in the country, as the farmers and labouring classes think it would be "unlucky" to refuse it, but in towns they will not lodge them without payment.

The relief given to beggars in the country consists of potatoes, and sometimes a little meal, but very rarely any articles of clothing or money. In fact the farmers seldom have any money, except at certain periods to pay their rent.

Rev. Mr. Phelan says, "the quantity of potatoes given in alms at the farmers' houses is unlimited, but regulated according to numbers; although the calls are very frequent during the day, the last applicant may get an equal quantity with the first. The measure of potatoes given to each applicant varies according to the means of the donor. Four pounds is considered a good 'charity,' and two pounds may be taken as the average. Some of the farmers occupying about 200 acres of ground give away as much food in the year as would support an additional labourer."

"It is not the practice with the shopkeepers here to give regular weekly allowances to the resident beggars, although there are six here who do so, averaging a shilling a week each person."

The relief of the beggars falls more particularly on the farmers, working classes, and shopkeepers. Mr. Tierney states, "that there is scarcely a day that there are not from 10 to 12 beggars at his shop. If the poorer classes are at all able they give much more in proportion than the richer; but they are sometimes more in need of relief themselves than the mendicants, and when they have nothing else they give a night's lodging, but in general the difference between them and the mendicants consists in nothing but name."

"It may sometimes happen that the mendicant will get more than the exigencies of the day require."

Mr. Tierney and the Rev. Mr. Phelan, are of opinion that a farmer holding 10 acres of land, will give alms in meal or potatoes to the value of 1*d.* per day, and shopkeepers about 2*d.* daily.

"Rev. Mr. Phelan thinks, that relief is given from a dread that the applicant is suffering from privation; there is also a strong religious feeling on the part of the donor, but which however would not induce him to give, unless he believed the person to be in want, and if there was any provision for him, it would be completely removed. The Rev. gentleman further states an instance that came under his own observation at Ballyellan in this parish, where in the absence of the husband, the wife and children were alarmed by the threats of a beggar, and gave whatever he required." Relief is occasionally given in the country under the influence of the beggar's curse, although Mr. Phelan states, "I do not at present recollect an instance, but I have frequently heard the beggar's curse when they were refused, and have heard of one instance where the beggar knelt down and uttered curses."

Disease is often spread through the country from giving the beggars a night's lodging. Mr. Phelan says, "he knows in Bohermore and Kildrina four or five families who were infected by fever in consequence of giving lodging."

Beggars are sometimes the means of producing feelings of enmity between persons, and sometimes bring about clandestine marriages. The Rev. Mr. Phelan remarks, "I have known five or six instances, where young boys and young men had, under such circumstances, improper intercourse with those depraved beggars." I also know an instance within the last half year, of a beggar-woman in the parish of Ballinakill, being the medium of improper communication between young females and gentlemen, and thus carrying on an illicit intercourse in the neighbourhood. I gave directions against giving lodgings to this woman and caused her to be removed."

The general feeling is against repressing vagrancy, by severity of any description, but this repugnance would be entirely removed if there was any regular provision made for the poor.

There is no house of industry in the parish, and even if there was the beggars would not like to go in, unless their food and lodging were better than those of the labourer, both at present being equally as good; independent of which, however, they would refuse to give up their liberty.

VAGRANCY has kept pace with the increase of poverty, and of the population of the parish of St. Mullins. It has been observed to have advanced more particularly within the last four years, and at the present moment there are at least fifty mendicants.

They are for the most part strangers, and the number is always augmented in summer, owing to the general dearth of provisions at that time; many poor persons, whose circumstances have been reduced to beggary, are ashamed to be seen in that state in their own parish, and leave it, to solicit charity in another. The mendicants who are to be seen here are chiefly women, of from 40 years of age to 60, and upwards, and have been rendered infirm by years and other causes. This preponderance of females, is to be explained by the difficulty which they experience in procuring employment; their children also are unable to find profitable occupation, and always accompany their mothers, who conceive that their chances of receiving relief are increased in proportion to the number of their families. Those who earn their subsistence during the week, are never to be found begging on a Sunday; but there are times, when potatoes are at 6*d.* or 8*d.* a stone, that the labourer's daily wages are quite insufficient to purchase food for his family; and then he is of necessity compelled to allow his wife or children to supply the deficiency by temporary mendicancy. There are a few cottier tenants who after having planted their potatoes, resort to the same practice, but their numbers are very small, and do not exceed a dozen at the utmost. There is not a single mechanic or artizan among the vagrants of this parish. It is a practice among small farmers, when they have become too aged personally to cultivate their land, to transfer it to some of their children, with an understanding that they shall be maintained by the latter, for the rest of their days. Disputes and quarrels not unfrequently arise between the parties, which end in forcing the parent to leave the cabin which he had surrendered to an ungrateful child.

child. An old person under these circumstances has no resource but begging, and accordingly some mendicants are to be found in this parish who were once occupiers of land. Mr. Whitney is acquainted with three instances of the kind; there are about 10 or 12 labouring men who annually leave the neighbouring catholic parish of Borris, and pass over to England to assist in making up the harvest there. These poor people generally beg their way as far as Dublin or Waterford, at either of which places they embark. No persons go to England from the parish of St. Mullins in search of work.

The Rev. Mr. Welsh and Mr. Whitney are of opinion, that the greater number of vagrants are natives of rural districts, and that they have generally been residents of small villages.

As far as the parentage of the resident mendicants is known, none of them are the children of mendicants, or at least none of them have been beggars from their infancy. They are generally people who at one period or other of their lives, have earned their subsistence, and who through misfortune have been reduced to destitution. They have been either small farmers or labourers, or are the wives or widows of such; and none of them can be considered as able-bodied.

The amount given as charity to a family of vagrants depends entirely on the number it consists of. If there be several children the proportion of relief will be calculated accordingly. Though this rule must be known to the mendicants, it does not appear that they have adopted the fraudulent practice of dividing their families into various parties, with the intention of thereby collecting more alms.

Whatever food they have to spare, after satisfying their wants and those of their families, they sell, and the money thus obtained is laid out in the purchase of fuel, bread and sometimes, though not often, of clothes. They have never, in any instance, been known to lay by any thing in summer so as to enable them to live in winter, without having recourse to begging.

When a vagrant applies at a house for relief, it is generally with the plea that he is in search of work, and has been unable to find any. Rags, dirt and the appearance of being crippled or diseased, are never assumed for the purpose of exciting sympathy; so much the contrary, that it is the opinion of the witnesses that decent clothing would be gladly worn if it could be procured. Forged recommendations are quite unknown.

The mendicants are here a well-conducted class. No instance is mentioned where they have been convicted of any outrage either on person or property. They are however extremely slothful, and there is no reason to suppose that any could be induced to avail themselves of any facilities which might be offered for emigration: they are unwilling to leave the country, and never go even to England in search of employment. Mr. Whitley remarks, that their behaviour to their children does not exhibit the same affection as is to be observed among the labouring classes; I have more than once seen them ill-treating their offspring when they fancied they were not perceived. Some of them are kind to those whom they know to be more destitute than themselves, and will even share their collections with their companions who have not been successful, but none have ever been known to hoard any money for their own advantage. In no instance has it been discovered that the children which they carry about with them have been hired for the purpose of exciting compassion. It is thought that they are always their own.

The mendicants of this place have in general but few children. The Rev. Mr. Kavenagh states, that he has not married a person in a state of mendicancy during the four years that he has been connected with the parish. He adds, "they are generally past the period of child-bearing before they take to begging; and that for that reason illegitimate births are more rare amongst them than amongst other portions of the lower orders. The mortality amongst vagrants is not greater than the ordinary mortality of the district." Mr. Kavenagh recollects no case of actual starvation amongst them; but he mentions at least 10 or 12 within the last four years, where individuals had died from protracted exhaustion or caused by the want of sufficient food.

The characters of the resident mendicants are well known to all those from whom they solicit relief; and it is thought that the extent to which private charity is prevalent, so far from being prejudicial to the morals of the poor, is rather productive of good effects, in diminishing the numbers of those who would otherwise become confirmed vagrants through parts of the country where they were not known, and where there would not be any check on their conduct. There are a few beggars, however, who are supposed to have adopted their present mode of life rather through a preference of it to that of a labourer with equal earnings, than through the pressure of actual necessity. This opinion is confirmed by the fact, that such persons have been known to refuse employment when offered to them at the ordinary wages of the country.

A vagrant who is aged and has the appearance of poverty, easily obtains charity without any inquiry being made into his real condition, or without an attempt to ascertain whether he may not already have obtained more than his wants require. It is quite unnecessary that either his character or his habits should be known.

It is an established custom with farmers to give to any vagrant who solicits it, a night's lodging in their barns, which are often cleared out for the purpose. Old clothes are also not unfrequently given. Where a beggar asks only for food, he seldom gets any thing but potatoes. Butter-milk will be added by those who keep cows, and if he has young children he will perhaps receive a little new milk. Money is never given by the country people; food is more convenient to them, and they think that it ought to answer the purpose of the necessities as well if not better. Mendicants, however, prefer money, because it is easier carried than a bag of potatoes; and they show their anxiety to become possessed of it by their endeavours to dispose of their surplus collections for ready money.

In the houses of the country people there is usually no definite limit to the amount which is bestowed as alms during the day. What is called a measure of charity, equally about two handsful, or from 4lbs. to 6lbs. is given, at the discretion of the donor, to each vagrant who calls, and who appears to stand in need of relief. The witnesses are not able to enumerate more than three or four poor persons who are supported as pensioners by any individual families; and it is not thought that there is a farmer or shopkeeper in the parish who gives away as much as would be equivalent to the support of an additional labourer or workman. The practice is not current here of setting apart the produce of a particular portion of ground for distribution among mendicants, neither do any of the shopkeepers give regular weekly allowances to the resident poor.

Farmers, shopkeepers and the middling classes in general may be said to contribute almost exclusively to the relief of the vagrant. While the gates of the opulent are closed against the approach of beggars, the poor man is not only more open to and more annoyed by their solicitations, but both absolutely and in proportion he gives them more. The labouring people, who are possessed of only a cabin and a potato garden, and who can but badly afford any thing, do not refuse their mite, and the mere day labourer admits him at night to lie down by his fire-side.

It follows, from the impossibility of ascertaining how much each beggar has received during the day, or rather from the want of endeavours to ascertain that quantity, that many receive more than is necessary for their own consumption; but still it does not appear that any waste of provisions ensues, for the surplus is either sold, or, as frequently happens, shared with those who receive the mendicant at night.

It is computed by the witnesses, that a farmer holding 10 or 12 acres of land, gives away about five pounds of potatoes, one day with another, (such persons never give either oatmeal or money.) The amount of what is given by any of the few small shopkeepers who reside in the parish is estimated at a penny daily, which is about equal to the value of what is given by a small farmer. Both descriptions of persons declare their preference of the present inconvenient and wasteful mode of relieving the poor, and say they would rather that things should remain as they are than that they should be obliged to pay any fixed annual sum, although they were at the same time to be freed from the annoyance of vagrants.*

The usual motive in those who give relief is, fear that the individual seeking for it is labouring under great destitution. Where this impression, coupled with a certain religious sentiment of the necessity of assisting the distressed, exists, the beggar has but little occasion to resort to importunity. The Rev. Mr. Kavenagh expresses a conviction that religious feeling would cease to operate as a cause of giving alms to the undeserving, if the people had reason to know that those who really stood in need of relief could procure it by applying to a charitable institution or house of industry. Sometimes, but not in this parish, the same gentleman has known alms to be extorted by threats of violence: "I could mention instances," says he, "where females have been frightened by a beggar, and forced to get meat and fry it for his dinner, and afterwards to give him a glass of whiskey to wash it down."

Inquiries were made of the witnesses, whether it had ever come to their knowledge that diseases had been spread through the country by the system of giving lodging to vagrants; but they were unacquainted with any such result. Neither had they ever had reason to think, that the morals of the poorer class had in any way suffered by their frequent association with beggars.

The existing vagrancy laws have never been put in execution in this parish. There is no workhouse to offer to those whom it might be wished to withdraw from wandering habits, and it is suspected that no one would voluntarily enter it or consent to give up his liberty. They would, as the Rev. Mr. Kavenagh expresses it, prefer to run their chance. It appeared to the Assistant Commissioners, that an estimate could be formed of the amount annually given away in charity within the parish by ascertaining the number of shopkeepers and of persons holding each more than one acre of land who entered into the population. The Rev. Mr. Kavenagh stated, that there were but three or seven shopkeepers in the parish, but he was able to count 662 landholders of the nature mentioned (of these 88 reside in 45 town lands situated in the county of Wexford, but embraced within the union of parishes); supposing each of those to give on an average but one penny a day, their contributions would reach the sum of 1,012*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* at the end of the year.

* On examining the three following witnesses, John Finn, Pat Murphy and Thomas Byrne, farmers, a most violent and unbecoming scene was exhibited, they having entered the room with a determined spirit of resistance to any thing in the shape of a "Poor Law," and no reasoning could convince them that the present commission was one of mere inquiry into the state of the labouring classes. They had persuaded themselves that Government were their enemies on all occasions, and that under the cloak of an intended amelioration of their condition, some mischief always lurked. Nothing could appease them: Murphy swore he would not submit to any more laws of any kind; and Finn, also swearing, lustily declared, "I will lose the last drop of my blood before I pay any poor or other rates, and I will beat the bloody brains out of any fellow who would pay or encourage them." After such manifestations of the desperate and lawless spirit of the landholders, it would have been useless to attempt procuring any further information from those classes in the wild barony of St. Mullins. Finn had previously declared to a resident gentleman, "That he would desire no better fun than shooting the Commissioners."

THERE are about 20 vagrants, as Messrs. Johnston and Doyne supposed. The Rev. Mr. Nolan estimated the numbers in the parish of Tullow seeking alms in the town to amount to about 60; their numbers continue always about the same; but Mr. N. thought they were monthly increasing, although every effort was made to keep strangers out of the parish.

Vagrancy is most common from April to August, which is caused by the scarcity of provisions till the new crops come in. Those relieved are generally natives, and all residents; they are for the most part females of about 50 years of age, and travel singly, and but seldom with their families, as there is less employment for them; the majority are mostly able-bodied, and those who can earn subsistence during the week are never found begging on Sundays; neither the wives nor children of employed labourers ever beg. Very few cottier tenants wander through the country seeking alms after having planted their potatoes; but Mr. Nolan knew many with small plots of ground who had done so. The small traders are much more reluctant to beg than the cottiers. Very few mechanics, although frequently much distressed, are mendicants; but their families sometimes do so. Messrs. Johnston and Doyne did not know any instances of servants disabled or out of work begging; but Mr. Nolan thought that the greater proportion of the females had been formerly servants. The cottier tenants never go where they are not known to beg, neither have any farmers transferred their property to their children and gone out as mendicants; very few migrate to England for work, and none last year; but Captain Whelan said, when they do go they usually provide a little means to reach England. The Rev. Mr. Nolan has relieved eight or ten who came to him for aid before they went, and supposed they must beg their way if they did not procure one or two days' work on the road. They are natives in general of the adjoining counties, but, as Mr. Nolan thought, of the county of Carlow and from the country parts, although Captain Whelan and Mr. Doyne supposed they came from towns.

The proportion of vagrants who are themselves the children of beggars is very small; they are generally reduced to begging through misfortune, or sickness, loss of parents, &c.; about one-twentieth part adopt it from the facilities of obtaining relief.

An able-bodied beggar would obtain in a day about a stone of potatoes, but very little meal; at seasons of plenty they might obtain more than sufficient for their support; but a strong feeling exists against the able-bodied mendicants of either sex. Captain Whelan mentioned an instance of a boy, 13 years old, whom his mother threatened to turn out of the house if he did not bring home two stone of potatoes a day; and a brother of his was similarly employed. The mendicants procure a good deal from passengers in public conveyances, but very little, if any, at the doors of places of public worship on Sundays.

The quantity of provisions is always increased in proportion to the number of applicants, but different members of the same family do not apply to the same persons; a distinction is made in the quantity given between an able-bodied and an infirm person.

They sell any surplus food they have received generally to obtain firing and common necessaries. Captain Whelan knew cases of women accumulating a good sum from the surplus of what their children procured by begging, and one was constantly able to assist her son, who was the holder of a small farm of four acres of land. If they exchanged the surplus for articles of real comfort, as clothing or furniture, they would destroy their power of exciting compassion; but they are seldom able to make those purchases, and almost never provide for any thing beyond a day.

The strangers usually beg under the plea of want of work, but those at home seldom give a reason. Travelling mendicants frequently put on the appearance of poverty and disease for the purpose of exciting sympathy, but not those in towns. Vagrants are frequently supposed to produce sores for such purposes, and Messrs. Doyne and Roache and Captain Whelan all said they heard of persons tying pence on their legs to produce gangrene. They are quite unwilling to be decently clothed, and Captain Whelan said he saw the wife of a cripple dressing him for the occasion in dirty rags. Lying or forged recommendations are not resorted to; the state of mind created is incompatible with morality. They have not been known to refuse to have their sores healed, though Mr. Roache heard such a report, but did not personally discover the fact. There is no doubt that the exhibition of sores and maimed limbs has been frequently the cause of great danger and pain to women who are enceinte. Captain Whelan knew a lady who from such an alarm had a child born an object, and who is now in a public institution. He also knew two other instances of great alarm and pain, although not attended with ultimate bad consequences. It is not known whether persons having blind or deaf and dumb children have ever refused to allow them to be taken to public institutions, but it is an invariable custom to take such about with them dressed in bad and insufficient clothing. The habits of vagrants are supposed to be dissolute, dissolute, and some few of them meet at the close of the day to drink and smoke. They are sometimes concerned, from great distress, in attacks on property, but not person; their thefts are not carried to any extent, neither are they ever concerned in assassinations; they are decidedly unwilling to emigrate to America. They show as much kindness to their children as labourers do; but Captain Whelan and Major Eustace and Mr. Doyne affirmed that the children, on arriving at maturity, show a degree of contempt for their parents. Rev. Mr. Nolan said, that, taking them in the aggregate, they have not the same kindness subsisting between them, being a demoralized class. They never share their provisions with others more destitute, and seldom hoard their earnings. Children are never hired, and seldom belong to others, as they generally have enough of their own. Captain Whelan stated, that two families travelled frequently together, and while the parents of one remained at some distance, the others travelled with both sets of children, to give the appearance of a large family.

They frequently have large families, but do not marry earlier than other classes, prostitution being more common, and more illegitimate children being among them than in the labouring class. Neither is the mortality greater among them, starvation never taking place, and their health being generally as good as the labourers.

There are very few able-bodied men begging, there being no encouragement for them; but females certainly could collect more by begging than by work.

The character of the beggars is generally known by those who assist them. The prevalence of private charity is not found to be prejudicial to the morals of the lower orders. Mr. Roache stated, "three men preferred working for him at 6*d.* per day and their diet to 3*s.* a week from a charitable fund raised to provide for unemployed labourers during a scarcity of work." Others have declared that they would rather work than take one penny from a charitable fund, and had made several efforts to obtain employment. The Rev. Mr. Nolan was also aware of many who would not consent to be placed on the public list, and who were afterwards privately relieved.

Vagrants generally prefer their life to that of the labourer, but do not beg in preference to remaining labourers; they have not been known to refuse work. Captain Whelan and Mr. Roache have themselves offered work to a few who have refused 9*d.* per day, saying, "that they could earn more begging."

No endeavour is made to ascertain what relief a beggar has previously received. When assisting them, beggars whose characters are unknown are not assisted by residents, but often by strangers. A night's lodging is often given to them; clothing is not usually given, but they get some occasionally from the convents. The usual relief given is potatoes, and meal very rarely. In towns sometimes broken food: buttermilk, and, in cases of sickness, first milk is also given. Rev. Mr. Nolan stated, that the late Mr. Doyle gave last year 12*l.* for shoes to the poor; and the Rev. Mr. Kinsela, P. P., annually gives 10*l.* for clothing them. The farmers prefer giving food to money, the latter not being always at hand; but the beggars like money best, as with it they can procure lodging, fuel and other necessaries.

The daily quantity of food given is not limited, but depends on the numbers applying; the usual quantity given is about four pounds of potatoes and very seldom meal; there are none supported as pensioners on particular families; a few of the farmers give as much as would enable them to maintain an additional workman, but it is not the custom for shopkeepers in country towns to give a regular weekly allowance to resident beggars. It is not the custom for small farmers to appropriate to charity the produce of a particular plot of ground; but they usually plant a sufficiency of potatoes to guard against the effects of a scarcity or failure of crops. The relief of beggars falls in particular on the farmers and shopkeepers, who are much more annoyed and open to access than the richer classes, who give much less in proportion than the poor, who have nothing almost to give. Those possessed even of an acre or half an acre assist the beggar; but their own condition is not much better. Mere cabinholders and day-labourers can give nothing but a night's lodging. The Rev. Mr. Nolan stated, that to his own knowledge beggars have taken a night's lodging, and shared what they had begged with the tenants, such was their miserable condition; and that they were consequently desirous of admitting the lodger, which all present corroborated.

There is no doubt that more than necessary is frequently given to beggars, from the impossibility of ascertaining the quantity already received. Such uncertainty does not lead to waste. A farmer holding 10 acres gives, on an average, about six pounds of potatoes a day, and a small shopkeeper about 2*d.* None from giving too much have afterwards left themselves in destitution; a feeling of charity has never led to pauperising a labourer, who, but for the calls of those in need, would have continued comfortable. The farmers and shopkeepers would prefer giving a regular sum annually in preference to being subject to the annoyance of beggars.

Relief is generally given from the fear that the applicants are suffering from privation and occasionally given from custom and often from mere importunity. The religious feeling which, from a sense of duty, induces the people to assist mendicants, would be greatly reduced, if not removed, if there were any institutions to relieve them; fear of violence to the donor's person or property never extorts relief, and the supposed dread of the beggars' curse but rarely. The Rev. Mr. Nolan stated, that it more frequently occurs from the fear of abuse than the effects of a curse, and from the hope of getting the beggars' blessing. He has known two or three instances within the last four or five years.

By the system of giving a night's lodging, diseases are frequently spread. The Rev. Mr. Nolan stated, that a tenant of his sister's, by giving lodging to a beggar, took a fever himself as well as his entire family of five persons, and subsequently communicated it to Mr. N's. sister, who unfortunately sunk under it and died. Dr. Payne also knew a case of a whole family being diseased. The morals of those giving lodging suffer very considerably from the custom.

Vagrants are continually the origin of and spreading discontent. Mr. Nolan observed, he knew two particular instances at the present time of persons who are in the constant habit of carrying messages for the purpose of seduction from persons in the higher classes who have often been successful. Mr. Germain stated a case where he was instrumental in the discovery of such a person, and believes he was the means of saving a young girl from ruin.

Vagrants very seldom return to industry. Mr. John Nolan knew one instance; they ultimately become a separate class.

There have been no punishments for vagrancy for the last nine years. Such severity would have no effect in restraining those absolutely destitute or starving from begging; the general feeling is against punishing vagrants really in want, and there is no probability, under such circumstances, of the giver of relief sanctioning severe measures against them. If any provision were made for their wants, such repugnance would be removed. Outrages are not immediately attributable to actual want.

There is no house of industry or any mendicity institution in the neighbourhood. Mr. Doyne overheard persons, at a period of great distress, last June and July observe, that "if relief was not given they could not starve, and must help themselves by taking from those who had plenty." Those who beg would not be willing to go into a house of industry, as they are at present better fed than the labourers. One woman, Rev. G. Dawson said, living on the poor-box of the parish, and blind, refused to enter a house of industry unless she was allowed the amount of her own earnings in spinning and knitting; another woman who likewise refused, is now a beggar in the streets. The Rev. B. Johnston stated, "that there are 350 landholders who are rated without including holders of small plots. There are about 60 shopkeepers of various denominations, making a total of 410 small farmers and shopkeepers collectively, the average daily distributions having been calculated on the aggregate in money and provisions at 1*d.* per diem from each house, 623*l.* 10*s.* 10*d.* will appear the product annually expended among the poor in the Protestant union of parishes, comprising, by the census of 1831, a population of 3,217.

JAMES BAYNE, publican and farmer.—Very Rev. Mr. FLANAGAN.—EDWARD MARKS, labourer.—PATRICK MULVANEY, tillage farmer.—J. H. NANGLE, esq., J. P., resident country gentleman.—Rev. EUGENE O'REILY, catholic curate.—Rev. Mr. PALMER, protestant rector.

THE Rev. Mr. Flanagan, P. P., states, as nearly as can be computed, the number of vagrants in the six parishes amounts to 200, including children. Mr. Bayne and Mr. Mulvany compute them at 600. Mr. Bayne says, 30 call on him in one day, of whom only six are natives of the parish. Vagrants are more numerous in summer and harvest than in spring and winter; they are at present more numerous than in former years, in consequence of the late scarcity of provisions in other parts of the country. The greater number of comfortable tillage farmers in this part of the country induces them to come here. Mr. Mulrany states, that the poor travelling to England all beg in this neighbourhood.

The season when vagrancy most prevails is during the spring and summer, owing to the greater scarcity of provisions and employment at that time. The vagrants relieved here are almost invariably strangers; many come from Connaught and the other counties, and fix themselves in this barony, taking daily a certain circuit in quest of alms in money or provisions. Messrs. Bayne and Mulvany say, the poor of the neighbourhood are always relieved in preference to strangers. They generally consist of women and children under 14 years of age and some old men past labour. Mr. Bayne says, they sometimes borrow children to excite sympathy. When a labourer dies and leaves a family, they have no other means of subsistence than begging.

Many of the female beggars have been seduced and discarded by their friends, and have to seek subsistence where they are unknown. Very few able-bodied men are beggars; the men who beg are either cripples or infirm, through age or accident. Many of the women are strong and able to work. Cottier tenants and labourers in agriculture are the most reluctant to beg. Mr. Bayne says, a labourer would suffer great distress before he could bring himself to beg. Many tradesmen passing through the country from town to town beg. Mr. Bayne says, the wives of tinkers and sweeps all beg. Mr. Flanagan has known one instance of a man having 14 acres, who allowed his family to manage and enjoy it, and sought money by begging on the high way. He amassed the sum of 20*l.* which he gave as a marriage portion to his daughter. Mr. Bayne concurs. All those who go from these parishes to England pay their way; they would be ashamed to beg. Some of the Connaught labourers passing through on their way to England beg. Messrs. Bayne and Mulvany add, that the Connaught labourers also beg on their return from England, and are a great annoyance to us.

It is difficult to ascertain where the vagrants come from. Messrs. Bayne and Mulvany say they are chiefly from Connaught. Seldom or never is an able-bodied Leinster man seen begging; they are generally the natives of country districts. Town beggars seldom go far in the country.

There are few who have passed their lives as beggars, with the exception of these born cripples or blind. They are reduced to it, some by drunkenness, some by infirmity, death of husbands husbands or children, and others by idleness and mismanagement. The number who adopt a vagrant life, owing to the facilities of subsistence it affords is not great; but many continue in it when their friends and relations are willing to support them. The characters of the mendicant being seldom inquired into, persons of this class receive the same aid as deserving objects.

The Rev. Mr. Flanagan knew a man to have collected four stone of potatoes in a plentiful year, when potatoes were worth 2½*d.* per stone, and 3½ lbs. of oatmeal in one day; a woman with five children might generally get two stone of potatoes. Mr. Mulvany says, a woman may not get five pounds of potatoes except she was known to be an object of charity. Mr. Bayne says, some beggars only ask for dinner or breakfast, and refuse raw food.

The quantity given is in proportion to the number of persons in the beggar's family. James Marks, Messrs. Bayne and Mulvany say, that no distinction is made. There is nothing more common than for beggars to divide the family, and then beg from the same persons. An able-bodied man in distress who is not an habitual beggar only asks a meal. Infirm persons are looked on as special objects of charity, and better treated, as are also women with large helpless families.

Beggars generally sell their surplus collections, and buy tea and spirits whenever they can, and enjoy themselves. They are never worse treated for being decently clothed, as they are then looked on as reduced persons of a decent class; people of this kind make a proper use of the surplus, they are not the most numerous class. Messrs. Bayne and Mulvany say, a stranger well dressed would not be relieved, he would be considered an impostor.

Able-bodied men who beg assert that they are in search, men who are obliged to leave their homes in consequence of bad character, being reduced to distress, allege want of work as the cause.—(All concur.)

Beggars who frequent market towns and fairs try to excite compassion by exposing sores, and are unwilling to be decently clad, lest it may diminish pity. James Marks has known beggars to put off good clothes, and put on the rags; and says further, that they sometimes refuse to have their sores cured. Beggars are divided into many different classes, this is certainly the worst. The parents frequently take the children about in cold and wet to excite compassion; and Rev. Mr. Flanagan says, "the parents of dumb children use them to impose on the ignorant by leading them to think they can see into futurity."

All the witnesses concur in saying that the habitual beggar by trade is in general dissolute; occasional beggars are moral and religious. Beggars often commit thefts of linen or wearing apparel, or any small commodity they can lay their hands on. James Marks has known of a beggar who having obtained a night's lodging murdered the woman to whom the house belonged in order to plunder it.

When the children of beggars grow up they become labourers, and usually are not industrious or well conducted; such persons are not likely to emigrate. The Rev. Mr. Palmer observes, the idle and reprobate seldom emigrate except from fear of punishment. The Rev. Mr. Flanagan states, with whom all the witnesses concur, "within my experience I have generally known them to be the worst conducted persons in my parish." The parents among beggars are kind to their children, but the children are not so kind or dutiful to their parents as those of labourers usually are. Rev. Mr. Flanagan related, "two beggars died since I came to the parish; one of them had 10 l. concealed on his person, and the other 6 l."

Having given birth to a bastard is often the cause of vagrancy; it is therefore presumed there is a greater proportion of bastards among vagrants than among labourers; some of the female vagrants continue their immorality, others are penitent and well conducted.

Messrs. Bayne and Mulvany say, an able-bodied vagrant would not be relieved; if an able-bodied man begged, he would not receive as much as if he worked; the farmers would not give to an able-bodied beggar any thing beyond his dinner or his breakfast. James Marks says, "persons are very unwilling to relieve such beggars, they are looked on with disgust."

The character of beggars is seldom inquired into; old persons, or those reduced by accident or misfortune, and known to be of good character, are always treated more kindly. James Marks says, "a beggar will not work even when work is offered." Mr. Bayne has offered them work in busy times, and it has been refused.

If they are known to have received much alms during the day, less is given, if any; but a vagrant would receive charity though his character was quite unknown, if he appeared an object of compassion.

A beggar has never been known to want a lodging; some of the beggars get clothes when they seem in great need. The farmers prefer giving food to money, not always having money. Provisions are preferred by the beggars as being of more value. Mr. Nangle says, "that they wish to obtain money from those who can give it, to procure tobacco or whiskey."

Farmers on an average give the same quantity daily, except in cases of urgent distress; all who apply are not relieved. The usual quantity given is about 10 potatoes to the old and infirm; they usually give two hansdful of meal, about half a pound.

The Rev. Mr. Flanagan says, "There are some farmers of 100 acres give as much as would support two additional labourers; many of the large tillage farmers give much more; I know farmers in this parish who daily feed six poor persons through the year; I think I underrate it at that number." Mr. Mulranny holds 170 acres, thinks it costs him 1 s. per acre; Mr. Bayne holds 30 acres; it costs him 4 l. a year, sometimes more.

The farmers chiefly support the poor, being more exposed and annoyed. The poorer classes give more in proportion to their means than the rich. James Marks, labourer, says, "the labourers in employment also relieve the poor to the utmost of their means." The poorest householders occasionally give whenever they can afford it, and never refuse lodging when they have nothing else to offer.

Some get more than they require, and this certainly leads to a waste of provisions.

Some holding ten acres are better able to give than others; some are more charitable; all give something. Mr. Bayne, says, "an industrious man with 10 acres at a fair rent, might give 3*l.* a year." Mr. Mulvany and Rev Mr. Flanagan say, that they give much more in proportion than the large farmer or gentleman; Mr. Flanagan has known some shopkeepers to give to the amount of 13*l.* in the year; as to whether the present mode of giving would be preferred by the farmers to a tax, opinions are divided. Mr. Bayne would willingly pay a small sum to prevent beggars coming to his house. Mr. Mulvany would prefer the present mode of relieving the poor. A farmer does not miss the provision he gives to the poor; he would find it hard to convert it into money; the same amount given in money would be very distressing to the farmers. Mr. Bayne concurs in that.

Relief is given sometimes from fear that the applicant is suffering great privation, and sometimes from a charitable motive. Mr. Flanagan says, "some who have a mistaken view of charity would give, although the poor might be provided for by applying at an institution."

Sometimes importunity extorts relief, and all concur in saying, that there are instances where women being alone in their houses have been compelled to give through fear; frequently alms are given to avoid the beggar's curse.

Typhus fever has been much spread by giving lodging to vagrants. James Marks knew an entire family to die of a fever brought on by giving lodging to a beggar; and the Rev. Mr. Flanagan says, "the morals of the labouring classes are much injured by associating with beggars; they are the means of causing discontent by fabricating and spreading stories, and produce ill-will in families by the same means."

Those once driven to vagrancy seldom, if ever, return to industrious pursuits. Mr. Flanagan does not think them sufficiently numerous to rank as a distinct class; but Messrs. Bayne and Mulvany and James Marks all say they are a distinct class, because no one wishes to associate with them.

Laws against vagrancy, without providing for the poor, would cause unusal horror; and the supposition is absurd, that the givers of relief would act on them. Messrs. Bayne, Mulvany and Marks say, they have been so long accustomed to give, that they would not wish to see any law that would deprive the deserving poor of relief; they think it better for the poor to remain as they are than be subject to restraint.

Mr. Flanagan thinks the beggars would prefer their liberty and their present state to a house of industry, in which the fare was the same as that used by the labouring classes. Messrs. Bayne and Mulvany, and James Marks, think the poor would prefer their liberty to any such provision.

THE Reverend Mr. Dunne estimates the number of vagrants to be about 250 in the Catholic Union of Castledermot and Timolin; of these 150 have professedly no other means of support than begging; these numbers have remained stationary, on the whole, for a considerable length of time.

The general amount of mendicancy is observed to be annually increased between the 1st of May and the 20th of August, owing to the scarcity of provisions, which takes place previous to the coming in of the new crops. The greater number of these mendicants are residents, and from half to two-thirds are natives; there are but six old men amongst them; about two-thirds of the whole are children, and the remainder consists of females, from the age of twenty to that of seventy, but for the most part under fifty; five only are without children. The great preponderance of women is explained by the difficulty they experience in finding employment; many of them are the wives of labourers out of work; and most of them are themselves well able to work. The Rev. Mr. Dunne remarks, that the rate of wages is nine-pence a day; and the average number of days that a man is employed during the week, not more than three. Under these circumstances, if provisions become unusually dear, he conceives that the families of the labouring population must inevitably have recourse to begging, as a means of existence; none, however, who are employed during the week are ever known to beg on Sundays; and very few cottier tenants or persons who possess a crop of potatoes in the ground are to be observed soliciting alms. There is no mechanic in the parish at the present moment in a state of mendicancy; and it is admitted that mechanics evince a peculiar reluctance to commence begging, and are only driven to it by extreme necessity; none of the vagrants are servants disabled, or out of employment, but most of them have been in service previous to their marriage. The cottier tenants of these parishes are not in the habit of going elsewhere to beg; neither are there any instances of farmers, when when advanced in life, having transferred their property to their children, with the intention of adopting a vagrant life. A few labourers annually go to England in search of work during the harvest; and they generally take as much money with them as pays their way to the place of their destination.

Of those mendicants who are not natives the greater proportion comes from the adjoining counties, and rather from the country parts than from the towns.

Amongst the adult mendicants who reside in the parish, the witnesses agree that there is not one who is the offspring of a beggar, or who has followed a vagrant life from childhood. Misfortunes of various kinds are supposed to have reduced them to their present state, and though the women generally give themselves out as widows, and date their destitution from their husband's death, the prevailing opinion is, that in many instances they are the victims of seduction, and having become pregnant and lost their character, no other resource has remained open to them than begging. Some few however are known to have placed themselves in their present situation from a knowledge of the facility with which relief is to be obtained, being well aware at the same time that their propensity to idleness would escape detection.

In ordinary times the collection of an able-bodied beggar averages from two to three stone of potatoes daily; "but at periods when potatoes are plenty," Mr. Kehoe observes, "that he has seen a mendicant with six or seven stone in his bag, and at that period, adds he, I have offered potatoes to a beggar woman who disdained to accept them." Meal is never given but to aged or infirm people who are unable to carry potatoes; but if an individual be capable and willing to exert himself for several hours during the day, there is no doubt that he would obtain much more than sufficient for his own consumption. There are a few persons who attend at the coaches that pass through Castledermot in order to solicit alms, but they do not meet with much success at places of religious worship, there is very little given to beggars on Sundays.

When a vagrant family consists of several members, the practice of the country people is to give relief in proportion to their numbers; "knowing this," says Mr. Kehoe, "beggars do not come in large bodies, but generally divide themselves in order to obtain two or three charities, and thus different portions of the same family frequently procure relief from the same persons." At the same time that the necessities of several children elicit the largest alms, the Rev. Mr. Murphy observes, that most compassion is felt for an old or infirm person, and that he gets most as an individual.

When beggars obtain more food than they require for their consumption, they generally sell the surplus. It usually happens that potatoes are thus offered for sale; but Mr. M'Dowell has had beggars coming to his house with meal to dispose of; when potatoes are plentiful and cheap it is hardly worth the while of a mendicant to collect them, as there is difficulty in finding a purchaser for them; at such times they express dissatisfaction if meal be not given to them. Mr. Pat. Magrath states, "I recollect once in a plentiful season that a beggar refused to take potatoes from me, and when I had insisted on filling his wallet, he went off, and in a few minutes after he emptied them all into a ditch." The money obtained by the sale of their surplus provisions is applied to the payment of their weekly rent, or to the purchase of turf; it is sometimes expended on tea or tobacco, and in very few instances it is laid by; however there are some mendicants known to the witnesses, who have saved as much as has enabled them to buy a pig.

When a vagrant applies for relief he has seldom occasion to resort to any plea whatever, deceptive or real; the witnesses observe, "that he is seldom asked any questions;" most of the resident beggars are poorly clad, some from necessity and others from a sloathful disposition, but it is not thought that any of them expressly exhibit rags or dirt for the purpose of exciting sympathy, though it is suspected that several refuse to wear good clothes, fearing that they would thereby weaken their claims on the charitable. Mr. Thomas M'Donald knows an instance where a beggar woman who had got a cloak and other necessaries, subsequently pawned them in order to get tea and sugar. The Rev. Mr. Murphy knows the case of another beggar who sold the blankets which were given to him in charity. There are not any mendicants here who make a trade of exposing their sores or their natural infirmities; some of them have deaf and dumb and crippled children, whom they carry about as a means of appealing to the feelings of the inhabitants, who naturally pity them, when they see them exposed to cold and wet without sufficient clothing, but there is not an instance known where the parents have refused to surrender their children so afflicted when the offer of a place in an asylum has been made to them; even as it is, however, the state of mind produced in a parent, who in any way trades in the misfortune of his child, is considered to be quite incompatible with morality.

The habits of the mendicants of these parishes cannot be considered dissolute. They do not often congregate or form merry meetings; "but," says Mr. M'Donnell, "I have seen 10 or 12 of them together at the close of the day, and potato cakes before them, and better tea than I drink myself." Thefts are uncommon amongst any class, and they have been very rarely traced to beggars; such persons are never concerned in outrages upon the person. The witnesses are not acquainted with any vagrant who has had industry enough to go to England or Scotland in searching work, and it is the general opinion that none of them would be willing to emigrate. A vagrant shows not much disposition to assist those who are in a worse condition than himself; if he gives any thing it is only as a loan, of which he strictly exacts the repayment. When it was asked whether it had ever been discovered that the children who accompany mendicants were hired or borrowed, it was quickly answered, "that they had no occasion to resort to such tricks, as they had but too many children of their own."

The beggars of these parishes have in general large families, many of them have as many as seven children, at the same time there is no reason for supposing that they have been more premature in their marriages than others; and the Rev. Mr. Dunne states positively, that during the 13 years that he has been in the parish, he has not married more than three persons who at the time followed a vagrant life. The proportion of illegitimate births is however much greater amongst them than in any other class of the community; and although there has not recently been any case of death from starvation, a disproportionate mortality has been observed among mendicants when compared to the labouring population in general.

In making a comparison between the profits of mendicancy and of labour, the witnesses agreed in making an essential difference between male and female able-bodied vagrants; they stated that the former would seldom be relieved, but they were unanimous in saying, "that the latter would always collect more in the course of a day than a labourer would earn in the same time."

The greater number of beggars who are to be observed in these parishes are residents, and their faces are generally well known. They have not originally, at least to any extent, taken to their present mode of life in preference to earning their subsistence by industry, but there is every reason to suppose that after a time they prefer it, as being easier to a life of labour with merely equal earnings; and instances are not wanting in which, when work has been offered to them, they have refused it. A woman, to whom Mr. M'Donald offered a shilling a day for binding corn, impudently declined it, and drawing out a reaping hook, said, "that his head ought to be whipped off of him for such an offer." In other cases, however, they have shown themselves willing to accept of employment.

Very little precaution is adopted against imposition on the part of those who solicit charity. It is never attempted to ascertain before giving alms, what a vagrant has already received in the course of the day; and it often happens that relief is extended to persons of whose character the giver is entirely ignorant.

A night's lodging is freely given to vagrants in the houses both of labourers and of farmers; and clothes they also get in the same places when they can be spared. The relief given in the shape of food usually consists of potatoes, unless where the applicant is too aged or otherwise too infirm to carry them. Butter-milk is also given by the farmers, and mendicants usually provide themselves with a vessel for the purpose of receiving it. The country people prefer giving away food, because, as they express themselves, "it comes readier to them;" and though beggars would in most cases rather get money, although they do not ask for it, and in times of scarcity or dearness they would certainly prefer provisions.

The quantity of food which is given away at any house in the course of the day is quite without any fixed limits, and depends entirely on the number of "calls." Mr. Kehoe states that 170 beggars have been relieved at his house in one day; each applicant receives about a handful of potatoes, or in some instances about a pint of meal. The Rev. Mr. Hamilton gives a shilling a week to each of five indigent people; and this is the only instance where persons are mainly dependent for their support, as pensioners, on the bounty of any one individual. It is supposed, however, that there are some farmers of fifty acres and upwards who dispense in charity nearly, if not altogether, as much as would support an additional workman. The smaller farmers also give according to their means, although it is not customary amongst them to allot the produce of any definite portion of ground to the relief of vagrants. The shopkeepers do not make weekly allowances to the beggars of the town, but relieve them occasionally as their discretion guides them.

The relief of vagrants falls with particular severity on the class of farmers; they are more open to their solicitations, and consequently more annoyed by them; as Mr. Magrath remarks, "a beggar will pass by the gate of a gentleman, and will not dare to go up there, when he will come and demand alms from people like me." The poorer and working part of the agricultural population give more in proportion than the richer orders; and whilst the man possessed of only an acre or half an acre does not refuse his contribution of food, the mere labourer, who possesses nothing but his cabin, gives, what alone he can afford, a night's lodging to the mendicant, and goes to the farmer to procure straw for the purpose. Mr. Macgrath says, that "he know a man who held half an acre of ground, for which he paid 2*l.* 10*s.* (but it has since been taken from him), for six months at a time he did not know what the taste of milk was like; his diet was a dry potato, and at an odd time a salt herring, yet he never allowed a beggar to leave his door without getting something."

It is calculated by those present that a farmer holding ten acres of land cannot give less, one day with another, than from seven to fourteen pounds of potatoes; and, taking into consideration both the food and the money that a small shopkeeper bestows upon the poor, it is thought that he spends about two-pence a day in charity. Frequently those whose means were barely sufficient to meet any sudden emergency, have given away to such an extent that on the failure of their crops, they have themselves been obliged to purchase food at as dear a rate in the market. "I cannot," says James Payne, a farmer of 12 acres, "afford to give away a pound of potatoes in the day if I would do myself justice; if I gave it away to-day, I might want it in ten days more myself; in scarce seasons when I have given ten shillings a barrel for potatoes, I have been obliged to divide them with those that were poorer than myself when they'd call at breakfast hour, not having the heart to keep it from them, the creatures." The farmers and shopkeepers are so convinced of the inequality of the burden, which the present practice of giving relief imposes upon them, that they declare unanimously that they would view with satisfaction the introduction of a system which would allow them to substitute the payment of a fixed annual sum, to the annoyance of remaining open to promiscuous mendicancy, and to the risk of their property, incurred at present.

It

It is the prevailing opinion that relief is given to beggars under an impression on the part of the donor that they are in a state of starvation. Religious feeling is also supposed to have considerable influence on the extent to which charity is given, but there seems to be little doubt that this motive would cease to exist in a short time after it was known that relief could be procured by the destitute in an establishment for the purpose. Threats of violence, in order to extort alms, are seldom if ever resorted to; and the supposed effects of the beggar's curse are no longer regarded by any one.

The system of giving a night's lodging to mendicants contributes not a little to the spreading of disease through the country. Mr. Ivers states expressly that he has known an entire family to have been visited with fever after having harboured a beggar at night. The evidence given, however, does not tend to show that the morals of the labouring classes suffer to any extent by contamination in this manner. Vagrants sometimes, but very rarely, make mischief by tale-bearing and the spreading of discontent, but in general they find it more their interest to become the retailers of extraordinary or unusual intelligence. "The beggars frequently," observes Mr. M'Donnell, "tell wonderful stories to excite a good charity; for instance, one came in last week and told me that the steeple of Carlow had fallen down; another, that the King was broke: our wives give more to such fellows." Corcoran adds, "that the beggar who brought the news of the Parliament Houses being burned, got the most charity that day."

Those who have followed a vagrant life for any length of time are never known to return to industrious habits; even those who have resorted to mendicancy under the pressure of temporary distress are slow to relinquish it when their necessity has past by. Charles D'Arcy remarks, that "once they got the habit of it, they never gave it up;" he knows several that took to begging in the scarce season, and they never have refrained from it since.

In this district, it has never been attempted to repress vagrancy by any severe or coercive measures, and in the present state of opinion on the subject, whilst there is no provision for the destitute, there is no chance that any laws directed towards such an end could be rendered efficacious. The repugnance, however, in the public mind to a strict vagrancy law, would be completely removed, if any means of support were provided for those who now subsist by begging. Vagrancy is the less a subject of complaint at present, because no outrages can be traced to it, at least none arising immediately from destitution.

There is not a house of industry in either of the parishes, and the witnesses would anticipate much antipathy on the part of the mendicants to enter such an establishment. "If they were put up into that kind of a place," observes C. D'Arcy, "the grocers would lose a great deal of their benefactors; they leave more with him than the poor labourer; the labouring classes never taste tea or sugar, except on Gregory days, at Christmas's and Easter."

In order to obtain an approximation towards an estimate of how much was given in charity by the industrious classes in these parishes, an endeavour was made to ascertain the number of shopkeepers and of farmers within them; the result was, that there were about 60 of the former, and nearly 500 of the latter, holding not less, in any instance, than one acre of land.

THE number of vagrants in the parish is about 60, and seems on the increase; the Rev. Mr. Hely says, "I daily see strangers coming here and suffering."

Vagrancy prevails most in the months of June and July; Pat Cullen says, "you will have two for one at those times of the year;" at that period the wives of those who have gone to England for work come here to beg, and the greater part of them have families; sometimes too, while the men remain at home, they send their wives and families to beg; the Rev. Mr. Hely says, "it is a common custom, when the men cannot get work, for the wives and children to beg;" but you will never see a young man beg at all; men, except old, will not beg; cottier tenants sometimes go into places where they are not known, and beg; but but those who go to England do not beg, being, as Mr. Gilligan states, "good able-bodied labourers, and taking something of their own with them."

They come from all the surrounding counties: Rev. Mr. Hely says, "I do not know a town or county I could name, they no not come from." They are generally natives of towns; Mr. Hely says, "I am conscious they are generally expelled from their own towns, and take shelter here."

There are not many among them the children of beggars, but there are certainly some few; but being principally strangers, no trace of their habits before they come is discoverable: the Rev. Mr. Hely observes, "I think they are mostly dissolute characters, but their general excuse is loss of husband and relatives."

A stone and a half of potatoes, or about two quarts of meal, is about the quantity an active beggar would make out in the day; they get more food certainly than they can consume, so that sometimes they even sell it; they likewise get money from passengers in coaches: Mr. Hely says, "gentlemen changing horses at the inn often leave a couple of shillings among the beggars;" Mr. Power estimates about 2*s.* per week given in this way to the beggars.

The quantity given is in proportion to the number in family of those who apply for relief, and sometimes the strangers divide into two parties, and the two parts of the family will thus apply for relief separately.

Beggars generally sell their surplus collections for tea, soap, candles, &c. &c.: the Rev. Mr. Hely says, "I know one old woman of 60 years of age, who never drinks less than three or four glasses of whiskey daily:" Mr. Hughes states, "a beggarman scarcely able to move with rheumatic pains, and upwards of 50 years of age, came into my shop yesterday to buy 2*s.* 6*d.* worth of tea and sugar; he remarked, 'It is all my worldly store; I have been during the summer in the county of Meath, where the people were very good to me; now that the cold season has come on, I am trudging on to the bog, where I will have firing cheap, and this tea and sugar will put me over the winter, when I will go back to Meath again;' the beggar pays from 6*d.* to 10*d.* a week for his lodging, but never thinks of making any provision of clothing or furniture." In this district the beggars never save any thing: Mr. Walker says, "They let every day provide for itself."

The strange beggars usually make the plea of not being able to procure employment, but they do not preserve their rags for the purpose of rousing compassion; on the contrary, Mr. Hely says, "I have 8*l.* or 10*l.* a year given to me to distribute in charity; I always buy clothing, and the beggars are most importunate for that relief." Beggars who have children often expose them in wet and cold, and annoy them in various ways, to make them greater objects: the Rev. Mr. Hely says, "I have often heard of their making their children cry to excite pity, and I believe it;" and Mr. Walker says, "I have known a woman who came to me and said her child was dead, and I discovered, after I had given her money, that she had left it in the avenue, and took it away as she returned."

Vagrants are in general dissolute characters. Mr. Hely observes, "I know four families at least who were banished from their homes and friends in consequence of their bad habits." Beggars steal fowls, potatoes and corn out of the fields and linen off the hedges, but are not concerned in any assassination or violent outrages;" being, as the Rev. Mr. Hely observes, "old and infirm, and mostly females." Beggars would not be willing to go to America. Mr. Power says, "they would rather skulk about the town, half starved, than go." The same kindness is shown by beggars to their children as other people show; but not so on the part of the children to their parents; they generally leave them after 14 or 15 years of age. The Rev. Mr. Hely states, "I know several who have gone into farmers' houses, and got from 10*s.* to 15*s.* per quarter." The beggars will not share their earnings with one another. Mr. Hely says, "there is a great deal of jealousy among them when a sixpence is given to them to divide; there is mostly a fight, and the one in possession generally keeps it." Some beggars hoard their earnings. Mr. Hely says, "I know a beggarwoman a most provident creature; her name is Coghan; she has accumulated money; I should not be surprised if she has 20*l.*;" and Mr. Wade states an instance of a beggarman having three or four cows at grass unknown to any one, but the person on whose land they grazed.

The Rev. Mr. Hely states, "that beggars are remarkable for not having large families, as they are for the most part aged;" and as to illegitimate children, it was supposed, that the younger beggarwomen being so much exposed to temptation must in many cases fall into vice.

The mortality among beggars is less than among the labouring classes, as they have better food. There has been no case of starvation here; but the Rev. Mr. Hely says, "many old people die from want of sufficient nourishment."

As to the comparative earnings of an able-bodied man by begging or by working, nothing can be stated, for such persons very rarely beg; they would not be countenanced as beggars.

The principal portion of those who are relieved are known to all persons; perfect strangers would only be relieved if they appeared to be in absolute want. Vagrants generally prefer their wandering life to that of labourers; yet there are not many instances of persons taking to begging except from sheer distress. Captain Brennan says, "a beggarwoman in town was offered 1*s.* per diem during harvest, which she refused; that is, she went out two days, and then she cut."

There is no inquiry made as to what a beggar may have received previously, during the day. Captain Brennan says, "they would not tell you, if you asked."

The Rev. Mr. Hely states, "when the poor have nothing else to offer, they invariably offer a night's lodging, and desire the beggar to provide his own straw, when the cabin keeper has has none himself." The beggars in general have their own blanket; potatoes, and sometimes buttermilk, are given to them by the farmers, who seldom give them money, indeed they seldom have any.

There is no exact limit to the quantity given, but the usual donation to a family is about 4lbs. of potatoes. There are three or four shopkeepers in the town who on Monday morning give the beggars a halfpenny each.

The relief of the beggars falls chiefly on the farmers and shopkeepers, inasmuch as they are most exposed to them. Mr. Hely observes, "there is an iron gate or closed entrance to the richer classes, and they can go no further;" and Mr. Hughes says, "they have access to our doors, and not to the nobleman and gentleman. The poorer classes give far more than their proportion; even those who have but the bare cabins." Mr. Power says, "it is the only home the poor have, if they are out in the cold day. It is to them they creep for shelter at night."

As to beggars getting more than they want, Mr. Hughes says, "if I can judge from their miserable condition, I should say they do not get sufficient; they use the surplus potatoes to buy other things;" but nothing goes to waste. A farmer of ten acres would give about a stone and half of potatoes in the day; as to meal, Mr. Hughes observes, "it is but little or no meal a farmer can give now; first, because there has been a deficiency this season, and next, because the high price of land makes him give all his corn to his landlord." Mr. Lube says, "many of them cannot give any thing but a share of their own victuals."

The labourer often leaves himself scantily off by dividing among the poor. About 3*d.* a day is the value in food and money that a shopkeeper may give away in the day; and both he and the farmer would prefer some small regular tax to the present mode of giving.

Relief is given, not because it is the custom of the district, but through fear that the applicant is suffering under great want; and as religious feeling can only be influenced by the wish to relieve the necessities of the destitute, if a suitable institution were at hand, of course the feeling would cease. Importunity sometimes extorts relief. Mr. Hughes says, "this being a great thoroughfare for passengers, they are continually annoyed, and give to the beggars to get rid of them." In the country places, too, a sturdy beggar will sometimes terrify a female into giving; but the fear of the beggar's curse does not avail.

Diseases are not brought into families here by beggars; because, as Mr. Hughes states, "if they were looking sickly they would not be admitted; and it is usual, in such cases, to make up temporary huts by the side of a ditch for beggars; they are frequently seen alongside the road."

The morals, however, of the labouring classes are injured by mixing with beggars. Mr. Power says, "because those travelling beggars are generally driven out of their own town for immorality."

Those who have been vagrants for any length of time never are known to turn to any industry; and as to whether they in the end become a separate class, Mr. Hughes observes, "where is the man can answer this. Such is the poverty and wretchedness of the working classes that it is impossible to distinguish them from beggars." It would be a great hardship to punish persons for begging when they have no means of living, nor any asylum to go to; and the people think it would be very cruel to use harsh measures against destitute forlorn persons for wandering about in search of food, and that but a bare existence. Many outrages have been attributed to actual want; a destitute person cannot be in a worse condition, and is easily exasperated.

There is no house of industry in the parish, nor would the beggars be willing to go into one; because, as Mr. Hughes says, "they get more meat and drink, more tea than the labourers, and in every way live better, such is the miserable condition of that class."

On the labourers being asked would they go in, Thomas M'Dermott said, "I would not go to be separated from my wife and children; I would rather have our own mess, supposing it to be a bad one, than go in to eat a better one." The following is an estimate of the charity of the parish:—

There are 463 persons holding not less than one acre of land, and allowing half of those persons to hold not less than 10 acres of land, there will be 231 persons producing, at 3*d.* per diem each, the sum of 1,053*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.*, allowing the average charity of those holding from one to nine acres to be 3*d.* per week, the remaining 232 persons will contribute 150*l.* 3*s.* There are about 60 shopkeepers at 3*d.* per day each; this will bring 273*l.* 5*s.* Total amount thus will be 1,477*l.* 6*s.* 9*d.*

THE number of vagrants in this parish amounts to about 250, and all the witnesses say that they have increased within recollection even to the amount of 100 per cent. Mr. Hardy says, "within the last three summers the sum I give away weekly at my door has increased from 1*s.* 6*d.* to 2*s.* 6*d.*, and I only give in like proportion as formerly to each." He further states, "that the beggars assemble at the shop doors of the town every Saturday morning, amounting in numbers to above 100, of all ages; these are residents, and they receive a half-penny each from about nine or ten shopkeepers, who prefer a regular weekly allowance to being annoyed daily."

From the 1st of June to the middle of August, and from the beginning of November to March, a great number of labourers are unemployed, so that during these periods their wives and children are forced to beg; but not a tenth of them are natives or residents, they are ramblers from all parts of the country, consisting mostly of females from twenty to forty years of age, with families of children. Mr. Finamore observes, "and if they have not children of their own they get them from others, by dad, they do." Mr. Currie says, "there are some old women among them, seven or eight come to me every Monday morning, and they are about sixty years of age." The reason why females are mostly driven to beg, seems to be that they have less employment, and there is, besides, more sympathy for them than for men; besides able-bodied men are reluctant to beg; although Mr. Currie says, that able-bodied men, out of employment, have come to him to beg. When labourers have large families, even though they have employment themselves, the family often beg. Mr. Hardy says, "I have known a man in employment whose family often beg; I have often supplied them." Mechanics do not often beg, except passing through the town. Mr. Currie knew two weavers who became beggars. In this parish cottiers do not appear to become beggars at any periods of the year; nor do any small farmers make over their holdings to their children and become beggars themselves; only one such case can be remembered for many years. Mr. Finamore says, "they are wiser now, and have their eyes open." Those who go from this parish to England in search of work, amount to about forty or fifty yearly; they do not beg their way, Dublin being so near.

The greatest number of vagrants come from the country districts; many of them are from Connaught.

Witnesses felt convinced that many beggars are persons who have been all their lives in the same condition. Mr. Hardy states, "I have known four or five families who have been begging from infancy, and there are three males among them." In this district beggars are considered not to be reduced from misfortune, but begging from idle habits; they usually attribute their distress to want of employment, but very many of them were supposed to adopt that mode of life from the facilities with which relief can be obtained.

An active beggar would obtain in the course of the day about three stone of potatoes, so that certainly he must receive more food than he can consume. Mr. Lalor says, "the go between, 'bouthy,' or match-maker, would collect double that quantity, their business being to carry messages from the farmers' daughters to their bachelors, and look out for husbands for them." In this parish beggars get a great deal of money from passengers in coaches. Mr. Lalor says, "I average their receipts at 6*d.* a day through the year, and occasionally at 1*s.* 6*d.* among six beggars who regularly attend the two coach offices, and will not allow others to interfere with them."

The quantity of food given to beggars is increased in proportion to the number of persons in the family; but if a family be very large, they divide into two parties, and call at the same houses. In case of a person applying singly for relief, an infirm beggar would get more than an able-bodied one.

Vagrants neither waste nor exchange their surplus collections, they sell them and buy tea or tobacco, and sometimes whiskey, but never clothes, inasmuch as good clothes would destroy their power of exciting sympathy. Vagrants seldom save anything, they spend every farthing they get as soon as possible.

Some vagrants give as their excuse for begging, that they are out of work, others that they have large families, and have lost their husbands. Mr. Finamore says, "I believe the true reason is they cannot get work." Although vagrants are not known to have produced sores, or to have refused to allow them to be cured, yet they retain rags and dirt, and affect the appearance of disease for the pnrpose of exciting compassion. Mr. Haydon states, "I gave a beggar a pair of pantaloons, and in three or four days after met him, and on questioning him, he would give no account of what had become of them; he was then in perfect rags."

Mr. James Byrne states, "a beggar, appearing to be blind, with his hat drawn down over his eyes, applied to me for charity, and in half an hour after I met him and his wife and daughter as well dressed as any farmer's wife and daughter, and as soon as they saw me come near them, I heard the man remark, I suspected him not to be 'bling,' and they all ran off as fast as they could."

The sight of maimed persons is frequently the cause of great pain, creating a horror in the minds of those who pass them, but no positive injury has been known to result from the exposure of such disgusting exhibitions. If vagrants happen to have children maimed in any manner, they carry them about in wet and cold to render them even more piteous objects, and they pinch them to make them cry. Mr. Finamore states, "they often come to my door, and the children are taught to set up an universal roar."

Those who live by begging were considered to be well conducted, as far as not being concerned in any outrages upon person or property, and seldom being detected in thefts. Mr. Byrne, however, states one case of a theft; "a beggar woman came to my house and got relief; the family were at dinner, and when the servant went outside she saw the woman enticing my poultry with oats, and she had three or four caught and packed in her wallet." Beggars often meet in the evening to carouse together. Mr. Byrne says, "I often see them do so on market days, they come to my house to buy whiskey." The confirmed vagrant never goes to England in search of employment, nor would he emigrate without force, they prefer wandering about in idleness. Beggars evince as much kindness as other people to their children, and when they have no children of their own, they are often supposed to borrow them. There was but one instance known to witness of a beggar hoarding money, he was a blind man. Mr. Byrne says, "it was reported he gave his daughter a considerable marriage portion." Mr. Hardy says, "he was supposed to have left, at his death, 200*l.* or 300*l.*, and he subscribed 20*s.* to the building of the chapel; I have given him change for a sovereign, in which there was half a sovereign to give Mr. Doyle the priest, as he said he would not trouble him with silver."

Beggars, in general, have large families. Mr. Currie states, "I know one with nine children;" and Mr. Fitzpatrick has seen them with five or six children.

With regard to beggars marrying, Mr. Byrne says, "they would not be so foolish; they take one another's word for it at all events;" so that it is evident the proportion of illegitimate children is greater among them than among the labouring classes. Mr. Hardy states a case of a young beggar girl in the town having recently had an illegitimate child. In this parish no case has occurred of death by starvation.

It was the opinion of all present that an active beggar could earn more by alms-gathering than a labourer could by his work, taking into account the casualties of employment.

The character of the persons relieved is never inquired into by those who give them relief, yet this indiscriminate charity did not appear to the witnesses to be injurious to the morals of the labouring classes. Vagrants mostly prefer their wandering life to that of the labourer, and occasionally adopt vagrancy in preference to remaining labourers. Mr. Byrne says, "I have offered them work, but I could not get them to do a halfpennyworth in any way."

An inquiry into the character of a person applying for alms is never thought of, nor could it be successful; the wretched appearance of the applicant is sufficient to cause alms to be given.

A night's lodging is very frequently given to beggars, but clothes rarely; the principal relief, however, consists of potatoes, and milk to females for their children. In all cases the farmers prefer giving food to money, in order to buy firing, candles and articles which are never given in charity.

In this parish there is a certain limit to the quantity given to a beggar; the farmers have a cup holding about a quarter of a stone of potatoes, and a trencher for meal, which is only given to infirm old persons who are not able to carry potatoes. It did not appear that there were many in this neighbourhood supported by families on whose bounty they were pensioners. It was stated that the largest sum given was 1*s.* each per week by the Dean of Cloyne to some poor persons. There are a few farmers and shopkeepers who are supposed to give away as much as would support an additional labourer. The Rev. Mr. Hume says, "I know some farmers in the neighbourhood who I think must give away, in straw, food and money, to the value of 40*l.* in the year."

The farmers here have not the custom of planting a certain spot of land, intending the crop solely for the beggars. Cullen says, "they are very hard set to pay the rent."

As the farmers and shopkeepers are more open to the calls of beggars the relief of that class falls chiefly on them. The rich, observes Neil, have their gate-keepers, and the beggars dare not go past them. In proportion to their means, the poorer classes were supposed to give most to beggars; even the labourers, who have but their hire to depend upon, give a part of their meals and a night's lodging to the beggar.

Witnesses did not suppose that in the country a beggar would collect much more food than he would require; but the sturdy beggars collected round the coaches might occasionally collect a few halfpence more.

Mr. Farrel says the farmer of ten acres gives, one day with another, food to the value of about 2½*d.*; and about ten of the principal shopkeepers give about 8*d.* a day; the small ones about 2*d.* It does not appear that a farmer giving too much in charity in the beginning of the year has afterwards, owing to the failure of crops or other casualties, had cause to regret his generosity to the poor, neither have labourers been pauperised by it, though

Neil says, "last year I gave food to my neighbours, and for twenty-four hours I went without it myself." It was the opinion of all the witnesses that in this parish both farmers and shopkeepers would prefer a regular tax to the present mode of giving charity.

Relief is usually given under the idea that the applicant is suffering from great privation, not because it is the custom of the district; religious feeling has influence, but that would cease if an institution were near where there would be certain relief for persons in real want. Importunity sometimes, though not often, extorts relief; but fear of violence to person or property is not supposed to be an operating cause in alms-giving; yet Mr. Currie observes, "I often give to a beggar for fear that he may do worse." Fear of the beggar's curse sometimes causes people to give alms. Neil says, "I have known beggars curse very hard when the people, perhaps, would have nothing to give them; and I have known persons give for fear themselves or their cattle would not have luck."

Vagrants often spread diseases by the system of giving the lodging. Neil says, "I have known fever and strange sickness brought in by beggars." Simon Cullen also states, "I have known persons here who have caught fevers by giving lodging to beggars." It was stated, also, that beggars often fabricate and spread mischievous stories. Neil states the following instance of theft by a beggar:—"My wife gave a lodging to a beggar-woman and her children; she, seeing the children awake in the bed, 'oh, you cratures,' says she, 'it is cowld,' and she threw a cloak over the children; but in the morning she was off with the cloak."

Persons who have for any length of time followed a wandering life, would not, in general, return to industry. But the Rev. Mr. Doyle says, "in harvest, when wages are high, they will work;" so that the witnesses did not think that they could fairly be considered as a separate class of the community.

There have not been any punishment inflicted for vagrancy here, because there is no other relief for the poor. The feelings of all who give relief are opposed to any severe measures as long as there is any possibility of a person perishing from want, nor could rigorous laws be enforced while such repugnance exists against them in public feeling; but undoubtedly this repugnance would cease upon the establishment of a place of refuge, the want of which is the cause of opposition to vagrancy punishments; some trifling outrages have been attributed to actual destitution.

There is no house of industry in the parish; it was supposed if there were one that the majority of beggars would take refuge in it; but, Andrew Neal (a labourer, 85 years of age, who supports himself by a horse and car) being asked if he would be willing to enter a house of industry, replied, "if a man could get work out of it he would sooner die than go in, because I would have my liberty, and could dispose of my earnings in any way I liked, and divide them with any relation or friend I had a liking for." The following is an estimate of the amount given by the shopkeepers at Naas to the poor:—

THE number of vagrants in the parish amounts to about 100, said the Rev. Mr. Fitzpatrick; but Mr. Farrell said he is under the mark. "Vagrancy has increased here," Mr. Farrell states, "I know it well, and vagrants are more than double within the last 12 years; and the reason is, their being thrown out of their small holdings. I have five houses which occasionally contain 16 families of them, and sometimes four families in one room, perhaps amounting to ten persons. The low rate of wages is another reason."

The season when vagrancy most prevails, is in the months of May, June and July, and part of August, because then a great many labourers are out of employment, and their wives and children are obliged to beg, as the only way to support them. The beggars in this parish are chiefly natives, some of them may come four or five miles. They are composed posed of females from forty to seventy years of age, except at the seasons above alluded to, when labourer's wives of all ages beg. There is very little employment for women. They may get about two months work in the entire year at 5*d.* per day, in hay and corn harvest, and potato planting and digging. Even the wives of labourers in employment sometimes beg. Peter Ennis says, " such as have large families could not live upon the low wages; and the price of produce will not allow the farmer to give higher." The wives of cottiers do not beg, though Lee observes, " they are often more necessitated than those who are begging."

Vagrants come from the vicinity of Robertstown, where there is chiefly bog. Peter Ennis states, " when the price of turf was very good in Dublin, people flocked into these bogs, and now that has fallen, it has driven them to distress."

Kavanagh remarks, " I counted 47 persons that were turned out of their cabins. They made to the bogs, and made little huts of the bog sods. I don't think there are 10 out of the 47 alive."

They have been all in comfortable circumstances, and reduced by misfortune. Mr. Farrell states, " they told me they were willing to pay for their small farms of land, but they were turned out to make room for large farms. I knew a little farmer, he was most comfortable, he was turned out on the road. He had not less than 10*l.* in gold. The poor creature died a beggar. From the day he was turned out, he was like a man struck dumb and stupified." Farrell further says, " that some of those driven out had to lie in the wet ditches, before they had a hut to put their heads into; and some of them were even driven out of the ditches as you'd hunt a rat out of a furze bush." Very few adopt begging from its facilities of life. Mr. Farrell says, " I am convinced that there is not a set of people in the world who despise begging more than the people here; but they are fairly driven to it by the mere dint of hardship."

An able-bodied female would get three stone of potatoes in the day. Meal is not given except to those too infirm to carry potatoes.

The quantity given is adapted to the number of applicants in a family. The families sometimes divide, and get relief in that way.

They sometimes exchange for herrings or milk; but Farrell says, " if they want to wet the potatoes, they seldom do so with any thing but water." Dr. Fitzsimon says, " they sometimes sell their collections for tobacco, tea and sugar, and whiskey. They sometimes go to lodging-houses, and for giving a share they get the loan of a kettle and a fire. I have only heard of one instance where they have hoarded potatoes (instead of selling) against the wants of winter."

They usually beg under the plea that they are not able to obtain work, and they encourage rags, dirt, &c. for the purpose of raising sympathy. Dr. Fitzsimon states, " that Lord Mayo some years ago gave frieze jackets, cloaks, and other articles of clothes to the beggars of Naas, with ' Naas' stamped on them, and requested the townspeople would confine their charity to these persons; but the beggars, in applying for charity, were told his lordship would take care of them. In consequence they were obliged to put on the old torn rags." Dr. Fitzsimon says, " I have often seen wasted and distorted limbs exposed at the chapel doors, and in the town, and am surprised the exposure has not done injury to females. I have often wished there was some place for the reception of such persons, lest injury to females might occur."

The degree of kindness shown by a beggar-woman to her children is as strong as among any other class; but not from the child to the mother. Beggars often share their collections with others more destitute than themselves. In general they do not hoard their earnings; but Dr. Fitzsimon states, " I remember a beggar-woman in Kildare who died last August, and 40*l.* was discovered in her possession."

Beggars in general have large families. " I met one last week," says Dr. Fitzsimon, " who had nine children."

Mr. M'Kenna relates, " I knew a labourer in this parish, with a wife and six children, who from illness and want of employment was reduced to extreme destitution; and it is my firm conviction he died from want of food and proper nourishment. The family are dependent on the neighbours."

Dr. Fitzsimons attended the man in fever; he corroborates the above statement.

In this parish the beggars who are relieved are in general known; and though, when once they have become vagrants, they prefer the wandering life, yet they would almost suffer starvation before they would beg; but once the shame is got the better of, the reluctance follows.

A night's lodging is very often given. Lord Herberton says, " the number of beggars is treble in harvest season, because the wives and children of the Connaught labourers beg while their husbands are in England. Many complaints have been made to the magistrates, by the cottiers, of thefts committed by those to whom they gave a night's lodging, absconding in the night. Beggars would prefer to get money, in order to buy tea, tobacco, &c." Rev. Mr. M'Kenna observes, " I am sure they would prefer the money, were it only for the variety."

The quantity of food given is proportioned to the number of those who apply, generally a double handful of potatoes; if meal, a plateful. Witnesses agreed in stating that some farmers and shopkeepers gave away in the year as much as would maintain an additional labourer. John Fagan states, " I know eight shopkeepers who, every Monday morning, give away a halfpenny to each beggar, amounting to about ten beggars."

The relief of beggars falls chiefly on shopkeepers and farmers. Pat Malone says, " if it was not for the farmers the beggars would starve." Fagan being asked if he gives more than than his circumstances enabled him to give, states, " I'm quite sure if the absentees and landlords would give something to the poor creatures, I would not have to give so much; but what I give I don't miss. I know God keeps an account of it, and will give it to me with good interest."

A farmer of 10 acres might give away about a stone of potatoes a day in charity. He has no money to give, nor can he afford meal, and a shopkeeper may give about 1 s. per week. The Rev. Mr. Fitzpatrick observes, " I know two persons who have given away so much in charity, that they have injured themselves greatly." The Rev. Mr. Fitzpatrick, Fagan and Malone say that the farmers would prefer a regular sum as a tax, to the present mode of giving.

Relief is given, through fear that the applicant is in great want, and occasionally importunity extorts it. Mr. M'Kenna states, " I know one instance very lately, where a fellow came into a house, and would not leave the house without getting something. He behaved with a great deal of sauciness, and food was given." It is not given because of the dread of the beggar's curse; on the contrary, Mr. M'Kenna and Malone state, " they have known alms withheld on the beggar's swearing and cursing."

The system of giving lodging to beggars has frequently spread diseases through the country. The Rev. Mr. Bourne remarks, " I know that a mother, son and grandchild died of cholera, by giving shelter to a strolling beggar, which was the first introduction of that epidemic into this parish."

Vagrants occasionally return to habits of industry. Dr. Fitzsimons has known three instances, and Lord Herberton two, of females turning out good members of society, employment being given to them.

There is no house of industry in the parish, nor would beggars be willing to enter it if there was. Lord Herberton states, " I really think the confirmed beggar would die rather than go into any institution."

There are about 136 holders of land, exceeding one acre each in the parish, and 45 shopkeepers. The average of the landholder's charity 1 d. per day, and the shopkeeper's 1 s. per week, will produce per annum —

JOHN CASEY, cottier.—HUGH DOOGAN, small farmer, 10 acres.—Captain GRAHAM, magistrate.—Mr. JOHNSTON, an extensive farmer.—Rev. Mr. M'CAN, parish priest.—Rev. Mr. M'GUIRE, rector.—Rev. Mr. MOFFET, protestant curate of an adjoining parish and a magistrate, residing in the town of Ballymahon.—Mr. EDWARD ROONEY, a general merchant.—MICHAEL ROURKE, labourer.

OF persons who either beg publicly themselves, or who have no other support than what has been obtained in charity by the different members of their family, there are residing in the parish, according to the estimate of the Rev. Mr. M'Can, from two hundred to two hundred and fifty. "The number of strollers," observes the same witness, "varies with the season; but on a summer's day from one hundred to a hundred and fifty may be found within the limits of the parish." The Rev. Mr. Maguire and the Rev. Mr. Moffett said, that " they considered the numbers as greatly exaggerated, and they would be more inclined to limit the number of mendicants resident in the town to twelve or fifteen, and to allow that the remainder of the parish might contain as many more." On the second day of the inquiry, however, Mr. Rooney mentioned to the satisfaction of both these gentlemen, the names of sixty persons who had no other mode of subsistence than begging, and all of whom resided either in the town or within the distance of one mile from it, in one particular direction; as the town and district alluded to do not contain more than one-fifth of the population of the parish, and as beggars are to be disinclined to take up their abode in towns, where they are in general obliged to pay for their lodging, Mr. Rooney thinks his calculation very moderate when he sets down the number of mendicants, in the rural portions of the parish, at about two or three times the amount of those inhabiting the town; he adds, that of the latter not one individual is capable of work. The Rev. Mr. M'Can " speaks not from calculation, but from actual observation, of the numbers residing in the different parts of the parish." But the Rev. Messrs. Moffatt and Maguire still refuse to believe that two hundred is not too large an allowance for the whole parish. Mr. Moffatt appealed to John Ganley, a small farmer holding about twenty acres, who was present, on the point, and Ganley replied that " it was his impression but from sixty to eighty resided in the town; he could not speak for the remainder of the parish, but it would not surprise him to hear that it furnished twice that number more; vagrancy has been progressively on the increase for many years, in consequence of the augmenting difficulty which all, but more particularly females, who before the decline of the linen trade were much engaged in spinning, experience in procuring employment.

The period of the year at which vagrancy is most prevalent is during the months of June and July; at that season provisions usually become dear, and there is also a scarcity of work, so that the wives and families of labourers are almost necessarily reduced to mendicancy. "They seldom beg at home," remarks the Rev. Mr. Moffatt, "but they leave this country to seek alms elsewhere, while strangers, under similar circumstances of distress, come to us. There are also some labourers who go in search of work to other places, and who leave their wives and children behind them without any provision; these latter are then compelled to have recourse to begging at home, either publicly or privately, many of them carrying a bag, but generally endeavouring to conceal it. The number of mendicants is not a little increased in summer by the addition of several poor widows, who have contrived to struggle through the winter, but are unable to bear the heavier pressure of want in the former season; to all these are added the wives and children of the Connaught labourers, who, while the husband is absent in England, or employed in this neighbourhood, subsist entirely on alms." Females are at all times much more numerous than males; according to the Rev. Mr. Maguire, it is rare to see males begging from the age at which they become old enough to work until the age of impotence comes upon them, unless they be of unsound health; and it is still more unusual to see females from the age of puberty until they become mothers, "except when they are driven to it in order to maintain a young family of brothers and sisters, who have been left orphans." The Rev. Mr. M'Can observes, that the apparent disparity between ages and sexes would not be so striking if among beggars were counted all those who depend on what is begged by the other members of their family; he knows many strong healthy persons, male and female, who are ashamed to solicit charity themselves, but live on what is obtained by their immediate relatives. "It is stated that few single persons are to be observed begging, that the majority are accompanied by families; many causes are enumerated by the witnesses as seducing persons to mendicancy, as orphanage and widowhood, but all may finally be resolved into the want of employment, for the various individuals that beg. The diminished occupation is ascribed to the falling off of the linen trade, more especially so far as concerns females; one of the witnesses says, that "formerly a farmer would employ two or three servant maids, under an engagement that they should spin a certain quantity in the week; this quantity paid for both their wages and their diet, and he then had their other services for nothing; the same farmer would not now give employment to one woman." I have rented, observes Mr. Johnston, for many years the tolls of this town; the great yarn fair used to take place in May; at the May fair of 1821 I received 20*l.* as cranage for weighing yarn, at one penny per score of twenty pounds; that sum has declined since, until last May, when I did not receive 5*s.*; the same quantity of yarn that formerly sold for eighteen and twenty-pence, now sells for nine-pence or ten-pence per pound; there is no instance of a person who earns his subsistence during the week being found begging on a Sunday. Rourke says, labourers who have constant employment never beg or suffer their families to beg, but many labourers who have but occasional employment live for a time on alms, sometimes remaining at home and letting their families beg for them, but they mostly leave their own country, and take their families with them; if they find employment, they take it; if not, they either beg or live on what is begged by their families. "Poverty and shame," says Rourke, "drive a great many from their own country." Cottiers are not known to beg here, their compact with their landlords securing them constant employment. The witnesses agree that mechanics, and persons engaged in small trade, are less likely to become beggars than labourers, not from any difference of habits that the witnesses have observed, but because they are less likely to incur the necessity; no farmer has ever been known to surrender his ground to his children in his old age with the intention of adopting a vagrant life; the aversion from begging is stated to be peculiarly strong among the occupants of land. With respect to the mode of existence on their journey of those labourers who annually proceed to England in quest of employment, Michael Rourke, himself a labourer, states, that "they find much difficulty in making up even the price of their passage from the Irish to the English port; in their journey by land they must occasionally beg a meal or a night's lodging; they have come seeking lodging from him, and declaring that they had but a halfpenny to pay for it."

It is supposed that the greater number of vagrants who pass through this parish are from the counties of Leitrim and Roscommon. No remarks have been made by the other witnesses as to whether towns or country districts are likely to produce the larger number of beggars; but Michael Rourke says, "I believe the town labourer or his family is more likely to be driven to beg than the country labourer; the latter has many helps which the former is without; he always has a pig, which he can easily purchase, as his cabbage plot and potato garden will support him while he is earning the price of it. On the other hand, the town labourer cannot make one shilling meet another, for what he earns to-day must go to buy food for to-morrow, and if he has a family he may be struggling for years before he can put eight or nine shillings together with the same helps; the country labourer may struggle through a bad season when there is no employment, but I do not know any thing the town labourer can do in such a case, but either beg or starve."

It has been already mentioned that vagrants are rarely to be seen unaccompanied by children; nevertheless, very few individuals qualified to engage in labour continue to lead a wandering life after they have become able to earn their livelihood by industry; with the exception of idiots and decrepid persons, all are anxious to quit mendicancy as soon as they can. Vagrants are in general found to attribute their destitution to their having been ejected from their farms, or owing to the sickness or death of a husband or father, frequently to ill health or accident, disabling the individual from working; "but there are," observes Mr. Rooney, "not a few instances of persons wandering about half begging and half employed ployed in occasional jobs, which they prefer to more regular employment by which they could earn nothing better than dry potatoes." As instancing one of these causes of vagrancy, it may be mentioned, that the Assistant Commissioners, while walking in the vicinity of the town, met a fine looking able-bodied man begging with his wife and six children, he was blind. "I strove," said he, "while I had my sight to rear my family honestly and decently; there are three of these boys (none of them were above 12 years of age) who can read and write a good hand, and have besides a fair knowledge of arithmetic; it may be of some use to them yet; but it was God's will to afflict me, we had no help for it, and we were obliged to turn out." The witnesses were asked "whether they had any reason to suspect that the facility of obtaining relief operated to any extent as an inducement to relinquish industrious habits?" They answered that there were no grounds for entertaining such an opinion; that, on the contrary, there was every where a decided reluctance to beg. "Last summer," says Mr. Rooney, "I had some weeding to be done, I employed boys and girls at three-pence and four-pence a day, without food; able-bodied men came to me soliciting work; I told them that I had none, except what I have mentioned: 'for God's sake,' said they, 'give us even that, or we must starve.' I gave it to them, and they worked for the same wages as the children." Captain Graham says, "from a long experience, constantly meeting, questioning and relieving beggars, I would say that none of them would beg if they could support themselves by work. The quantity of potatoes that a vagrant can collect in the day varies according to the seasons of the year; it is estimated that a woman with two or three children would in winter, when potatoes are abundant, collect from house to house, besides what she could consume, about two stone a day upon an average; in summer the amount of her collection would entirely depend upon the price of potatoes; if they should be so low as two-pence half-penny per stone she might get about a stone and a half, but if they should rise to four-pence or five-pence a stone, it is thought that she would find it difficult to obtain enough to eat, and that she must, in many cases, rest contented with one meal a day. No public car or coach stops in this parish; at the roman catholic chapel there attend each Sunday about three persons who receive about three-pence each from the congregation; they are, says the Rev. Mr. M'Can, noisy, importunate beggars, whom I endeavour to discourage.

The quantity of relief extended to a vagrant who is followed by a large family, is always greater than is given to a single person; but still the amount is not increased fully in proportion to the numbers in that family; the beggar that is able to travel the farthest, and to make the most numerous applications will be the most successful at the end of the day; at the same time it is stated, that much compassion is always felt for an infirm or an old person, and that an able-bodied man, unless he have a family with him, does not usually ask for more than a meal, and that in general he does not carry a bag.

Whatever surplus a vagrant can accumulate, after satisfying his daily wants, is disposed of for money, which, says Mr. Rooney, they lay out in tobacco or soap, or in something to eat and drink with their potatoes. If they buy tea or whiskey it must be very rarely, and I have never known it. The Rev. Mr. M'Can states, that "none, except a few bad characters, ever buy whiskey," and all agree that in general they could not buy that, or any other superfluity, and that want often obliges them to sell an article of clothing which has been given to them in charity; there is no instance known of a mendicant having been able to lay by any thing as a provision against a more unfavourable season.

The resident paupers are free from the suspicion of resorting to deceptive means for the purpose of exciting compassion. Mr. Robinson (agent to Lady Ross) says, "I believe the resident population are very well inclined to work, but there are many able-bodied men strolling about as if seeking for employment, who would much rather sit down and sun themselves than work. I cannot express by numbers how far such instances may be considered frequent or rare; all I can say is, I know them to be very common, having offered them work often, which they have either refused, or have abandoned, after accepting it for a day or two, but I cannot say, whether I have known five, ten or twenty such cases in a season." Speaking on this subject, Mr. Johnston, (an extensive farmer) observes, "such persons have sought work of me, but as there were more wanting it at home than I could give it to, it never occurred to me to test the truth of their story, by offering them work, as I never suspected them of wilful idleness." Captain Graham expressly declares that, "he has tried several by offering them work, which they accepted without wages, for their mere food." Mr. Rooney says, "I knew a stranger from Connaught, with a wife and three children, to come here to beg last harvest; a farmer gave him work, and he worked with him during three months for 1*l.* and his food; during that time, his family begged only occasionally, and I do not think that the 1*l.* could have kept them from begging altogether; at the end of his time, he offered to renew his engagement, but the farmer had no work for him. I can very well believe," continues Mr. Rooney, "that able-bodied men may sometimes refuse work, because they may be within a day's walk of another place where they expect higher wages, or they may be making their way to England; I have often known people that come here as strollers to work for 2*d.* or 3*d.* a day and their food, and it has often happened, that resident labourers have noticed them to quit, unless they required the regular wages of the country, and that on their refusal to comply, they have been severely beaten." The Rev. Mr. Moffatt corroborates Mr. Rooney's information, by stating, that "several cases of assault, committed under such circumstances have been brought before him as a magistrate." The number of impostors who assume the appearance of disease or misery greater than they really suffer under is small, and they chiefly confine their practices to fairs. The Rev. Mr. M'Can says, "that within the last six months, eight or ten persons, who may be described as belonging to a decent class of beggars, have called on him, some with and some without papers, their story, whether oral or written, always set forth that they were of respectable families, and that they had been reduced from affluence to misfortune; I have sometimes discovered," adds the same witness, "that their documents and recommendations were forged." Captain Graham says, that "four or five such bearers of papers apply to him in a month, but he cannot say whether they be forged or not, although he suspects so, as they often ask his signature before he has made himself acquainted with the facts set forth; a good many of them purport to be the petitions of shipwrecked sailors." Dr. Bracken, the dispensary surgeon, remarks, "that he has known persons having sores that could be cured in a week, and that were of a healthy nature, to exhibit much reluctance to have them cured; persons of that description generally avoid medical men." The Rev. Mr. M'Can states, that "it is but too common with mendicants to expose their children unnecessarily to cold and rain, in order to excite charity, and he has heard it said, that they will pinch them to make them cry."

The witnesses speak of the resident mendicants as not being characterized by any particular propensity to dissoluteness or dishonesty; they cannot extend the same terms to the strange vagrants, either male or female, but least so to the latter, among whom are many persons that have had illegitimate children, and have been in consequence driven to beg for their support. The country people draw a clear distinction between mendicants of good and bad character. Michael Rourke says, "I give lodgings to beggars, but would not admit every sort; the means I have of distinguishing is this,—I see some of them quarrelling among themselves and blaspheming; many, too, on fair days get drunk on whiskey, which they obtain by begging it from tent to tent; I would not admit such characters into my house." Outrages, whether on the person or on property, are seldom available to mendicants. Suspicion more generally falls on a class which is not, in truth, very far removed from them, viz. on a body of idle young men residing in the town, who are unprovided with any regular occupation and are entirely dependent on whatever occasional jobs may offer to them; nevertheless, a stroller is usually regarded with some doubt. Michael Rourke remarks, that "I am becoming more cautious in giving shelter to beggars with whom I may be acquainted; I have little reason to give them a good character, for one of them cut my blanket in two, and took half of it away with her; another stole my wife's cap; and a third carried off a knife and fork from me. I have latterly been careful whenever I admit one of them, to lock up every loose article in my house." As to the willingness of mendicants to exchange their vagrant habits for the pursuits of industry, it is stated that individuals reared in beggary usually quit that mode of life when they approach the age of manhood, and that there is every reason for believing that vagrants would be as willing to emigrate, if they had the means, as any other portion of the labouring order; this belief of their readiness to revert to industry is deduced from the fact that many who are to be seen begging in seasons of great distress are known to be in the habit of going over to England in search of employment; an exertion of this kind cannot be expected from the resident regular beggars, who all labour under some infirmity. Speaking of the degree of affection usually exhibited by beggars towards their offspring, the Rev. Mr. M'Can says, "strolling beggar women constantly desert their children; I knew one instance of such a mother exposing her child, but from subsequent inquiries I convinced myself that extreme want had compelled her to it, (a child able to walk may be a source of gain to a mendicant, but an infant is a great incumbrance), she had suffered every species of privation during her pregnancy; however, I am confident that the natural affections must be weakened in beggars by the selfishness necessarily induced by destitution, at the same time there are found among beggar families many striking displays of fondness towards each other; the children when grown up frequently support their parents, or having emigrated to the colonies, remit money for their maintenance." John Casey mentions a boy who was reared a beggar, and who emigrated when he grew up; after two years he returned for the mere purpose of seeking out his parents and taking them back with him. Mr. Rourke describes mendicants as being kind also to each other. In his own house of an evening he has seen the family that got much during the day sharing with another family that had not been able to bring home their supper.

There is, observes the Rev. Mr. M'Can, a disposition in many beggars to save some money if they can; within five years' experience of this parish, five or six instances have come to my knowledge where sums varying from one to three pounds have been hoarded, always with a view to meet the expenses of their last illness and of their burial. Women are sometimes suspected of borrowing children in order to increase their claims on the charity of the benevolent. Captain Graham says, "he has met several such cases of deceit; he once asked a woman who had several children of nearly the same age, whether they had been all born together. She laughed and admitted that some of them belonged to another, but that she intended to divide her earnings with them."

The witnesses compute that vagrants are on an average accompanied by about four children, some more and some less; they state that few of these have been born in beggary. The Rev. Mr. M'Can says that he has never known a couple to get married with the intention of continuing to subsist on charity. "Illegitimate children," observes the same witness, "are more common among beggars, but I believe the first fault is usually committed before becoming mendicants, and that it may more properly be regarded as the cause of their mode of life." With regard to the average state of mortality among beggars, Dr. Bracken has not observed any distinction between them and others; he believes that they generally undergo less hardship and privation than the families of labourers. Dr. Bracken has never met with an instance of death by starvation.

The Rev. Messrs. Moffatt and M'Can, Mr. Johnston and Captain Graham, in reply to a question as to the comparative state of the labouring man and the vagrant, agree that from one-third to one-half of the free labourers (as distinguished from cottiers) have their families in a worse condition than those who beg from door to door. The other witnesses coincided in this statement, and John Casey observed, that when a beggar comes to a house and asks for a bit in the honour of God, he will get it if it is going, while the man who has but occasional work must often do without it.

It is not thought that the mode of giving charity has exercised any prejudicial effects on the industry of the labouring classes; but the witnesses admit that their knowledge on this point is not positive, as individuals who might prefer mendicancy to working would not be likely to beg at home. Mr. M'Can says, "I have no doubt there are some who prefer begging to working hard for a scanty supply of bad food, but they are the exceptions." John Carey says, "it is not our custom to make any inquiries about those who ask us for relief, it would not be charitable; if they did not want it, they would not trouble us."

"But little precaution is adopted against imposition on the part of vagrants, we mostly judge by their bag," says Casey; "if it be full, we keep each our charity for some one that may want it more; but they often carry two bags, and when they go into a house, they leave the full one outside with one of their children." In a majority of cases alms are given to persons of whose character the donor is wholly ignorant; it cannot be otherwise where the applicant is a stranger.

Mendicants are occasionally obliged to pay for their night's lodging in towns, but this never happens in the country where they receive it gratuitously, where, at most, the skins of their potatoes (for the pig), or the straw that they have begged from a farmer for a bed, are considered sufficient compensation; the peasant applies this straw to increase his heap of manure. The vagrant does not obtain much clothing in charity, but when a half-naked object presents himself, particularly at a rich man's door, he generally gets something to cover himself. Relief is extended in different shapes in the country and in the town; in the former potatoes, milk, cabbage, and sometimes, though rarely, meal, are given; while in the latter alone is money or else tobacco or broken food. The farmers do not give money, because, as one of the witnesses expresses himself, "money is scarce with them, and they give what is ready to their hand." Mr. Rooney says "that beggars would always prefer to receive an alms in money in the town where they have to pay for their lodgings and other necessaries; that they generally obtain a sufficiency of provisions" in the country.

The extent to which relief is given in a farmer's house depends altogether on the number of applicants, inasmuch as he has no fixed measure to guide him in the amount. There is not an individual in this parish supported as a pensioner on the bounty of any one family, but there are a few who may be designated as private beggars that receive weekly allowances from some of the shopkeepers. It is not the custom of farmers to plant any specific portion of ground with the intention of appropriating its produce of potatoes to the relief of paupers.

The witnesses agree that the chief burden of supporting beggars falls on the class immediately above themselves. "The gates," say both Mr. Rooney and the Rev. Mr. M'Can, "and sometimes the dogs of the wealthy, secure them against the intrusion of the beggar." Captain Graham states, that "a woman called on him to-day for a dispensary ticket; he asked her why she did not go to her landlord, who was a subscriber? 'Oh!' said she, 'I am afraid to go near that house; there is a dog there that would eat one.' Another time, a beggar, applying to me for relief, when asked why she did not call at such a house, replied, 'They have a dog to keep us out there, but I'm told that he has been shot to-day, and so I'll call to-morrow.'" The labouring classes are represented to be very willing to contribute to the assistance of beggars, though they may, in fact, be not so badly off as themselves. On this point Mr. Rooney declares, that "he knows no labourer that would not distress himself in order to give to a beggar, when he asks charity 'in the honour of God.'" "I have seen a labourer," observes the Rev. Mr. M'Can, "who was purchasing meal at a guinea a hundred weight (eight stone), give a handful to a beggar before it left the scale."

The Assistant Commissioners found it difficult to obtain an approximation to the degree in which vagrancy presses upon the agricultural population; the witnesses differed in their estimates, which were as follows:—Hugh Doogan (a farmer of ten acres) says, "in some seasons six families are relieved in a day at my door, and I have seen a third apply before the first was gone; four may be a fair average of applications each day, and three stone a fair average of the relief afforded in potatoes during the week by men of my means; when potatoes are dear rather less is given to each, but there are more calling for them." John Casey would rather say a stone and a half; when there is great distress, some are liberal enough to give more than in times of plenty, but others get tired of relieving, and let the beggars pass on. As regards the amount given by shopkeepers in the town, Mr. Rooney thinks that "the average of all may be taken in money at a shilling per week; some who have the means and inclination may give five shillings, others not three-pence." Whatever the amount may be, it would appear that not a few individuals are incautious enough in their benevolence to give to such an extent as to trench upon what they in the end discover to have been wanting for their own maintenance. This is proved by the statement of the Rev. Mr. M'Can, whose words are: "several small farmers have this summer applied to me to lend them small sums, from 5*s.* to 15*s.*, in order to purchase provisions; these were men whom I knew to have been very liberal in bestowing charity in the beginning of the year." John Casey says, "I have known persons to be obliged to dig their potatoes a month before they were fit for it, who, if they had been more reserved in their alms in the beginning of the season, would easily have got through it. Many a time a man has to check his wife for having too free a hand, and I am often bad enough to do it myself as well as another."

On the subject of the substitution of a regular annual payment for the present uncertain mode of assisting the destitute, Doogan said, "we can badly afford the taxes we have; another would ruin us; even as it is, what we give often leaves the family stinted." James Casey,

Casey, on being asked if it would not be the same to him whether he gave every day as at present, or, laying by, paid a given sum at the end of the year, answered, "if you give a penny a day, you do not feel it; but if you be prudent enough to lay it up, when you see it in a lump, you'll grumble to part with it." Mr. Rooney "believes that the shopkeepers would prefer giving from time to time; for himself, he is sensible that even now he occasionally gives more than he can afford, but he feels a satisfaction in personally relieving a case of distress which he could never feel in paying a tax, although he might be well aware that it would be devoted to a charitable purpose."

Religious feeling enters largely into the motive which leads to the giving of alms. The Rev. Mr. M'Can states, that many would continue to relieve the beggar, though to a more limited extent, although a legal provision for the destitute should be introduced. Mr. Rooney observes, there are many farmers that, when application is made to them, will always hold to the good old custom. "I would still," says John Casey, "like to do something for the last day, if I could afford it. The way would be this: a beggar would come to you, and you would refer him to the institution; 'Oh! the curse of God,' he'd say, 'on itself and its institutions; not a rag of clothes nor a blast of a pipe they'll give us; we were better off when we had the run of the country.' You can't refuse one then; besides, if you give alms, you'll get a prayer for it, but the people in that house would pray for neither the quick nor the dead. I have often been undetermined at first," continues the same witness, "but when one of them mentions the name of God so often, I would think it too bad to refuse them." It is thought that a mendicant's curse no longer forms a subject of terror in the extorting of relief; a woman, it is said, might be afraid of it, but a man would not, and sometimes charity is altogether withheld from an applicant solely because he has cursed.

The labouring classes are losers by the existing amount of vagrancy, not only in the provisions which they conceive themselves bound to give away, but still further from the effects both moral and physical of the practice of admitting nearly indiscriminately all strollers to stop for the night under the shelter of their roof. In this manner infectious diseases are frequently disseminated, as in the case of the father-in-law of John Casey, who found a beggar lying sick of a fever in a ditch; he took the beggar in; he had a large family, and the fever went round the house, and did not leave it for a year. It has been already stated that the habits of vagrants are not dissolute; but although Casey declares that "he never saw any harm in them," they are, in the words of the Rev. Mr. M'Can, "the cause of much mischief; they bear tales from one farmer's family to another, and create much quarrelling and vexation, particularly among women. Women have often complained to me of scandalous reports circulated concerning them by some of their neighbours, and these I have generally found to have originated with a strolling beggar."

It is stated that vagrant habits do not always entail permanent effects in the production of slothful propensities; the children of vagrants are in most cases observed to adopt industry when they have grown up, although by that time their parents have in general passed the time of life for manual labour. Rev. Mr. M'Can states, that he can name on the instant at least twelve industrious labourers, whom he has at one time seen begging. Mr. Rooney mentions three brothers who were brought up as beggars; they worked for a long time for him (Mr. Rooney), and all are now doing well in America. He knows a man who begged in this country with three very young children for three years; as soon as they were old enough to dispense with his constant attention, he took to work, and he now supports them solely by his industry. Temporary mendicancy is by no means supposed to separate an individual from his previous class in life.

It has never been attempted to repress vagrancy by the adoption of severe measures.

With respect to the establishment of houses of industry as likely or not to check mendicancy, and the probable feelings with which they would be regarded by them who now subsist on the charity of the public, the following opinions were delivered by the witnesses: "The greater number of such people," says the Rev. Mr. M'Can, "would willingly go into a house of industry; but there is a class of confirmed strollers, constituting the very worst class among beggars, who would prefer to continue as they are." Rourke says, "there are some labourers who would be glad to have such a place in a season of distress; but there are others who would rather starve than expose themselves by going into such a place. If you kept them for life they might go in, but they would be ashamed to show their faces after coming out of it." John Casey, a cottier, says, "for my children's sake I would not go in; it would be a reproach to them for ever that their father had been in the pauper house; even in a season of distress I would rather struggle round than go in, and I believe that is the feeling of others as well as mine; the stranger would go in in this country, and if I was in a strange place, where I had no relative that it could scandalize, want might drive me in myself." Michael Cox, a day labourer, whom the witnesses concur in describing as the poorest and most destitute man of his class in the parish, happening to be present, says, "I would never go in, it would be flung in my children's face ever after; many a day this summer I lived on half a meal of potatoes, and was often glad to have boiled cabbage and salt without a potatoe at all; I would not have gone even then." On the day after the conversation in which the preceding sentiments had been publicly delivered, Michael Rourke came to the Assistant Commissioners and said, "the labourers are beginning to be afraid that they said too much against the poor-house yesterday, they do not think it as bad now as they thought it then; but 'tis one thing a man will say in a crowd, when his pride is up, and another when he returns and sees the poverty at home."

Rev. Mr. O'BEIRNE, P. P.—LAUGHLIN M'CAN, clerk of petty sessions.—Rev. Dr. CRAWFORD, rector and J. P.—Mr. FARRELL, considerable farmer.—Mr. GREGG, considerable farmer.—JOHN HIGGINS, labourer.—JOHN KEEFE, labourer.

THERE are eleven families of resident beggars, about four persons in each family. In summer, said the Rev. Mr. O'Beirne, I have met sixty families of strolling beggars in a day, the average number in each family being four. Dr. Crawford has sometimes met one hundred strolling mendicants in a day, sometimes not five; but the parish being much intersected with roads is peculiarly a place of resort for them. The general spread of poverty has produced a considerable increase in the number of vagrants.

They are usually most numerous in summer, owing to the want of employment and the dearth of provisions, which obliges many labourers to send their families to beg. The families of Connaught labourers, on their way to England for work, invariably beg while passing through this country. The females are much more numerous than the males, being of all ages, from sixteen upwards; males never beg from the age of thirteen or fourteen until incapable of labour. They usually travel in families, the females being the more numerous, because there is less employment for them, because the care of the children devolves on them during the absence of the husband, and lastly, from the feeling of shame which prevents the males from being seen begging; indeed, they have been often observed to stand apart while the wife and children asked assistance, and to rejoin them afterwards; both boys and girls, after a certain age, partake in these feelings, and seek employment, which the former are more likely to obtain; in failure of this they often enlist. All the witnesses agreed that there was not an able-bodied man among the resident beggars, and that it was very rare to see such a person beg at all. None who earn their subsistence by labour during the week ask alms on Sunday, either personally or by their families; nor do they ever send the latter to beg elsewhere. Strolling beggars are principally the wives and families of unemployed labourers; cottier tenants who have planted their potatoes are never found among them. Servants are more disposed to beg than labourers, finding it more difficult to obtain employment suited to their habits, and being more unable, from having enjoyed comforts, to endure privation. The cottiers too, being now regularly employed, and having a person from whom they may naturally expect assistance, are less apt to beg than the labourer. The latter, however, has not been known to leave the parish for that purpose. No farmers in the parish have adopted a vagrant life, having transferred their property to their children. Those labourers who go from this to work in England go singly, and do not beg. The Connaught labourers take their families, whom they employ begging, not, however, appearing themselves.

The town produces the greater number of mendicants, labour there being more dependent on contingent circumstances, and the state of morals, and therefore the disinclination to beg differing widely from that in the country.

It is believed that very few have begged from infancy, and that none have adopted that life merely from indolence.

An able-bodied man cannot get any thing to carry away with him; but an able-bodied woman with two children may sometimes, but rarely, obtain in a day three stone of potatoes. If she and her family eat enough they will seldom have any surplus, unless in plentiful seasons, when farmers are careless how much they give. At each of the two places of worship three or four beggars are usually assembled, and may obtain about 1 d. each.

A mother with a large family will obtain more and more readily than any other applicant, the quantity given, too, will probably be in proportion to the number of the family. All the members of a family frequently apply with success for relief to the same person. This, said Mr. O'Beirne, proves that they do not obtain in proportion to their numbers. The able-bodied men get nothing, the infirm more than any other single applicants.

Beggars generally sell their surplus collections, or apply them to the repairing of their clothes, or to purchasing soup or tobacco, which latter they prefer, even to a comfortable meal. They do not get enough to enable them to purchase clothes or articles of real utility, but no doubt feel that the appearance of comfort would not be serviceable to them. Mr. O'Beirne knew a woman present her children in a state of all but nakedness, obtain clothes for them, strip them, and again obtain clothes by the same means. Itinerant beggars are not supposed to save in one season against the wants of another.

Fewer resort to deceptive means than have been known to ask for employment, and when they could not obtain it, to request a meal; they do not seek anything to carry away, and are not looked on as beggars; those who foster dirt, sores, &c., are found at fairs and markets only; they travel in carts drawn by asses, and no distance prevents their presence; few beggars present recommendations, nor do they ever forge them, though they frequently request signatures to a statement of fact with which those to whom they apply are unacquainted. These are quite distinct from the common beggars; the children are often very miserably clad from necessity. John Higgins said, "I give lodgings to beggars; they have often left their children in my house on a severe day when they went out to beg."

The Rev. Mr. O'Beirne was not acquainted with more than one instance of immorality among the resident beggars, he could not speak of strollers; they are not ascertained to hold the meetings for drinking or smoking, and have not been concerned in outrages on person or property; they have no scruple, however, said Mr. Farrell, in taking anything lying loose; "I have known them steal from my yard after they had been relieved in my house."

house." They root up potatoes, and steal linen, hay or straw from a field for a bed. They are not concerned in assassinations. The grown boys and young widows with families would willingly emigrate, though some even of the former might be unwilling to part with their families; the old persons would certainly not. I do not think, said Mr. O'Beirne, that the children of beggars are as kind to their parents as those of the labouring classes; I have known them, when they turned to industry, leave their mothers begging, although as capable of supporting them as any other labourers. Mr. Farrell knew in this parish two instances of the contrary, where under the same circumstances they had supported the mother. Beggars have not been known to share or hoard their earnings. Children are sometimes borrowed for not more than a day, but never hired.

Vagrants have generally large families who have been born while the parents were living by industry, and who were the cause of their being driven to beggary. Rev. Mr. O'Beirne during nine years married but one beggar, a female, to a labouring man. "I have often," said he, "christened beggars' children, the mother having frequently given satisfactory proof of her marriage, either by producing her certificate or by referring to the clergyman who married her. I have often refused to church the mother, not being perfectly satisfied, as by the rules of our church all doubt must be removed before we do so; but in nine years' experience I do not remember more than three or four instances where I had good reason to believe the mother was not married; I therefore think the number of illegitimate children among them to be small." Beggars are not believed to suffer greater privations than labourers; no deaths have arisen from starvation.

"An able-bodied man would find begging a very bad business;" a woman with children would, however, at some seasons of the year live better than the families of most labourers.

The characters of the strange beggars cannot be known to those who give. Mr. O'Beirne said, the Rev. Mr. Mitchell, of this parish (not rector) spends a handsome property in what I consider most injudicious charity; its objects are badly selected, and its effects injurious both to industry and morality; in passing the house of a confidential agent employed in dispensing his charity, I have observed an assemblage of drunken riotous persons who receive weekly pensions from him. Mr. Mitchell said, Mr. Farrell and Mr. Gregg give to labourers in this parish pensions of from 1*s.* to 2*s.* 6*d.* per week, besides meat, meal and occasionally tea and sugar; the consequence has been, that many who were hard-working industrious men, have now become idle, and unwilling either to seek for or accept employment. "I know," said Higgins, "six or seven persons who were once hard-working men, they got pensions from Mr. Mitchell, and now scarcely ever work, though I am certain they could get it if they wished for it." All beggars whom the witnesses had observed, were unable to earn their support by industry, and they never preferred beggary to labour; work is not offered to beggars, because "there are too many at home looking for it."

If the bag of the beggar is seen full he is desired to pass on, being told that some one may call before night, who will want charity more. Higgins has known a beggar return to his lodgings, empty his bag, and go beg again. Alms must be sometimes given to those whose characters are not known.

Vagrants constantly receive a night's lodging, often cast-clothing, but generally potatoes, meal, milk, cabbage, broth, and broken meat; buttermilk is very largely given; farmers prefer giving potatoes, it is more convenient to them and more proper for the condition in which beggars represent themselves to be. Beggars prefer money, it is easier carried, and they will ask it to buy tobacco.

There is no fixed limit to the quantity given; but if an extraordinary number apply, the last must be denied. No beggars are supported as pensioners on families; but several householders by Mr. Mitchell, that gentleman possessing 1,200*l.* a year in this parish, and an English property besides, spends most of his fortune in charity. Calculating a workman at 8*d.* a day. There are six farmers, holding from 50 to 100 acres, who give away half of a workman's support. Farmers holding from 10 to 20 acres, (a very common class) give what would support a workman one day in the week, and no person holding of land, to secure him from buying potatoes, does not give at least a stone in the week, which may be valued at about 2*d.*

There are but few shopkeepers in the parish, the relief of beggars falls exclusively on them and the farmers, the rich having their gates closed against them. The poor give fully in proportion to the rich: "We give," said Higgins, "until we begin to buy ourselves;" the labourers in the country plant con-acres for their own use, which is generally in April or May. "We may give a handful to two or three in the day."

More is given to some than they require. "What I give," said Higgins, "at the beginning of the season, would be a help to me at the end; but once I give I never think of it after."

Compassion is the usual motive; relief is seldom extorted by importunity, unless upon a more urgent statement of the beggar's distress. If there were any institution at which the beggar could obtain relief, the poor householder, and not the vagrant, would be attended to. Relief might still be given, but not to the extent that would encourage beggary. Tinkers sometimes, but very rarely, extort relief by threats of violence. The dread of the beggar's curse does not influence. Two or three instances have occurred when fever was spread by the custom of giving a night's lodging to vagrants. "I have seldom," said Higgins, "lodged beggars more than twice in a month." The association with beggars arising hence was believed by Mr. O'Beirne to be too short seriously to injure the morality of the labouring classes.

None who have been long vagrants have been known to return to industry. Mr. Farrell knew two instances in the parish, of women rearing families by begging; the sons when grown up took cabins for the mothers and supported them without begging; there are now no better characters in the parish. "It is invariably the case," said Mr. O'Beirne and Mr. Gregg, "that males, on arriving at a certain age, turn to industry, and even girls after 15 or 16 are not very commonly seen begging."

No punishments for vagrancy have been inflicted in this district; the destitute must either beg or do something worse. The general feeling is decidedly opposed to any rigorous measures, especially as outrages have never been attributed to destitution.

There is no house of industry or mendicity institution in the neighbourhood; beggars would not in general enter such an establishment, as they are already in most instances better off than the families of the labourers.

Mr. ROBINSON, rector and J. P.—Rev. Mr. SHERIDAN, J. P.— —— THOMPSON, Esq. J. P.

IN the town there are 100 resident beggars; the number of strolling beggars varies according to the price of provisions from 30 to 100. Vagrancy has increased owing to the decline of the linen trade, since women are now begging who would formerly have been employed in spinning; to this increase the cessation of building in the town has also contributed. Beggars too are attracted to the town from the facility of procuring cheap lodgings.

Vagrancy is most common in summer, where provision is dear and work scarce, but the increase of it is principally owing to the families of Connaught labourers who beg in this country while the men are in search of work elsewhere. The females are four to one, and of every age, though more rarely older than 16, unless when mothers of families. No males, unless impotent from age, beg after 10 or 12 years old.

They usually travel in families. Boys of 15 or 16, or younger, are ashamed to beg and seek employment which they can obtain more easily than the females.

The latter too have less reluctance, and will beg for the males, who remain at home from shame. All the witnesses agreed that an able-bodied man was scarcely ever seen begging; such a person may occasionally solicit relief when unable to find work, but never becomes a systematical beggar. None beg on Sunday who labour during the week. Several labourers of the town and neighbourhood go to seek work in summer while their families beg at a distance from home. Tradesmen and mechanics being more independent, and therefore more proud than the labourer, are therefore more reluctant to beg; they are moreover assisted by persons of their own rank who can better afford it than labourers. No distinction is observable between the conduct of disabled or unemployed servants and labourers. Cottier tenants do not themselves beg when they are not known, but their families do so. "Those who go to England for work sometimes," said Maguire, "cannot get even the little that would take them there, and then they must beg." They generally make some provision for the journey.

The greater number of vagrants are persons from the country, who being ejected from their farms, flock to the towns. Almost all have been reduced by misfortune, either from the cause above mentioned or from the illness, death or sometimes the dissipation of the husband. All the witnesses agreed that none had ever been known to adopt vagrancy from choice, and that they would all work in preference.

Maguire said, they often lodge with me; a woman with two or three children might bring home at night a stone or a stone and a half of potatoes; they get something to eat besides, but they take their supper and breakfast from what they carry home, and seldom beg on Sunday.

An able-bodied man seldom begs, and when he does, only asks for a meal, and never carries a bag. A woman with children can sell some provisions in winter but not in summer; at all seasons they generally get enough to eat; in winter at least, though not always in summer, they are secure of a sufficiency. A coach arrives here on alternate days, about a dozen surround it, they may get 6*d.* or nothing. They are not permitted to attend the doors or avenues of places of public worship. Those who do generally present some disgusting spectacle and are regarded as impostors.

The quantity given is increased if a large family apply, but not in proportion to their numbers. Instances were known to the witnesses, where the whole family having been first relieved, the children afterwards applied severally. Able-bodied men get nothing but a meal; women with children and infirm persons receive in proportion to their distress; the former may obtain a surplus above their wants, the latter very seldom does so, but gets a few halfpence in towns. They sell their surplus earnings and purchase tobacco, but scarcely ever spirits or tea; if in a town, they pay for their lodging 4*d.* or 5*d.* a week. Those who sit at the road side or attend fairs and markets are occasionally known to be drunk. Beggars have been known to put aside or cover comfortable clothing.

They are not known to save for any season, but some, lodging in towns, can feed a pig which they sell in winter, and after buying another, may reserve part of its price.

Some few beg under the plea that they have been unsuccessful in search of work. No resident, but some of the itinerant beggars, labour to appear ragged, diseased, &c. Persons who present certificates are of a totally different class from the common beggar, and expect some more effectual relief in money. The paper generally states that they had been in good circumstances and reduced by sudden calamity. Such papers are not generally forged.

Dr.

Dr. K. believed that beggars if they did not produce sores on their bodies, at least kept them irritated. They are generally anxious to have their children, if peculiarly afflicted, taken to suitable asylums.

In bad weather they generally stay within with their children and shew great anxiety for the weather clearing. If they themselves go out they usually leave the children at home, but are sometimes obliged, in self defence, to take them out. The morality of the resident beggars, considering their temptations, is surprising; strollers are often immoral and profligate, but none are ever concerned in outrages on person or property; in towns, indeed, they have but little opportunity. Some few who make a trade of begging would not be willing to emigrate, but the greater number would; some have been reduced to beggary by the exertions to enable some member of the family to emigrate and have themselves been enabled to follow by a remittance from that member. The confirmed vagrant does not ever go to England or Scotland for work. No distinction has been observed between the kindness of beggars and of the labouring classes towards their children. Mr. M. knew three instances where persons, reared beggars, sent remittances to their families at home. They commonly share their earnings with the more destitute. "I have seen it," said Mr. M., "done at my door." They have not been known to hoard; three children are considered the best number to travel with. Maguire "knew one woman make up her family to that number by taking her sister's child." It is not, however, unusual to hire or borrow children.

Vagrants generally have large families, a great number of the children are born while the mother is begging and the father labouring. They do not marry while begging; the Rev. Mr. S., in 18 years experience, knew but three or four instances. The population of illegitimate children is somewhat, but not considerably, greater than among labourers; this may be accounted for by considering that women having illegitimate children are driven to beggary, and having once been guilty of the offence are careless of repeating it. The mortality among beggars generally is not greater than among labourers; among the men it is, but they are all broken down labourers. The wives are even more long-lived than those of labourers; they suffer less fatigue of body and less uneasiness of mind.

A begging family on the average of the year live undoubtedly better than that of a labourer. "When a beggar goes out," said Maguire, "what he misses at one house he gets at another; but the man that shame keeps within has no chance at all."

"I smarted myself when I was rearing six in family, and often felt the stingings of hunger, and was unable to give my children more than one scanty meal in the day. It was a great temptation to me."

The character of the resident beggar is known, that of the stranger not at all. Private charity does not injure the morality of the labouring classes. Vagrants, with few exceptions, would prefer to work. None voluntarily choose the life of a beggar. There are too many unemployed at home to enable them to offer work to beggars.

No inquiries are made either as to the character of the applicant, or the relief he has already received.

Beggars in town generally pay a halfpenny or a penny a night for lodging for a family. Cast clothes are commonly given them, but generally potatoes, meal, broken meat, cabbage, &c. Shopkeepers frequently give money, or whatever they retail, the baker, bread, and the apothecary physic. The beggar generally prefers money.

The quantity given depends on the number of applicants. There is no fixed limit. Those who give money give usually a halfpenny or a penny to a large family. A workman would engage to labour for 6*d.* a day by being employed every day in the year. Twenty shopkeepers in the town give away as much as that in alms. There are several old women, who receive from many of the shopkeepers 1*d.* or 1½*d.* a week regularly.

The relief of beggars in towns is pretty fairly divided between tradesmen, shopkeepers, and some private families. In the country it falls wholly on the farmers, beggars not being at the gate of the gentlemen's places. Rev. Mr. R., however, knew several moderate proprietors in the parish, to whose houses beggars gain admission, and where they receive relief generally in halfpence. Mr. Thompson stated that he had a gate-keeper and did not believe that any beggars were denied admittance, but that he made it a rule to relieve none but those whom he knew something of. Such are the beggars living in his immediate neighbourhood, amounting to from 25 to 30. The relief given is potatoes or meal, or perhaps a few pence. The poor give much more in proportion than the gentry. The day-labourer would leave himself a scanty meal to relieve the destitute.

More may sometimes be given than the applicant requires.

There are 50 shopkeepers in this town; 20 of them cannot give less than 10*l.* per annum; the rest give from that sum down to 3*l.* or 4*l.* "A labourer," said Maguire, "may give from half to a stone of potatoes in the week from the beginning of November to March. Neither farmers nor shopkeepers would be willing to give near the same amount as a regular tax. Although now they give as much, they feel it less.

The general motive is charity; but relief is sometimes yielded to importunity. Were there any institution where the beggar could be secure of relief, charity would be transferred from them to distressed housekeepers. In the country women may sometimes be frightened by importunate beggars, but never in towns. Relief is sometimes given from dread of the beggar's curse.

Dr. R. thought that typhus had been spread by the habit of giving a night's lodging to vagrants. The other witnesses did not know of any such instance. The morality of the labouring classes must necessarily be injured by the association, though vagrants have not been known to promote discord or discontent.

Mr. Murtagh had known some beggars, after having reared a family, go to a part of the country country where they were not known, and become most industrious. The younger part of the family always turn to industry. Vagrants never become a separate class.

No punishments have been inflicted for vagrancy. There is a strong feeling against them; but this repugnance would be removed if a provision were made which precluded all chance of starvation. Carts of meal going out of the country have been sometimes attacked and the meal destroyed.

There is no house of industry or mendicity institution in this neighbourhood.

THIS parish contains from 20 to 25 resident beggars, and is visited by strollers to double that amount. Several of whom leave Longford in the morning, and after roaming through the parish, return again at night. There is no considerable increase or decrease of vagrancy observable; occasional changes take place in the number, according to the season and the price of provisions, but the amount stated above may be considered as a fair average. The particular season when vagrancy most prevails here is during the months of July and August; from October to April a strolling beggar is rarely seen in the parish; there is one townland, somewhat out of the way of the high roads, where the inhabitants never see a beggar for three months of winter. The chief reason why vagrancy is more frequent in summer is the circumstance of the potato being very scarce at that particular period, the old potatoes being almost out, and the new ones not yet come in; the number also of strollers is vastly augmented by the influx of the families of Connaught labourers, who come to labour in this and the adjoining counties, or on their way to England; moreover the labourer in this parish, being solely engaged in agriculture, becomes scarce in summer. With regard to age and sex, the resident beggars of this parish are composed, for the most part, of males under 10 years, none above that age, and females of all ages; the strollers are generally young mothers with children of both sexes, the males always under 10 or 12 years of age; the common story of these women is, that their husbands are at work either in this country or in England, yet in some instances they have confessed the husband to be loitering in the neighbourhood, but ashamed to be seen begging; both the resident and the strolling beggars of the parish are all married, an instance to the contrary being of rare occurrence; the reason why vagrancy is confined chiefly to females is, that the males when they have arrived at a certain age, find employment more readily, especially since the decline of the linen trade, the only source of employment for females, several of whom would be glad to accept employment, but cannot obtain any; males, on the contrary, capable of work, are scarcely ever seen begging; no persons earning subsistence during the week are to be met begging on Sundays; neither are the wives and children of employed labourers or cottier tenants found publicly begging. With respect to any distinction in a reluctance to begging between labourers and cottier tenants, and those connected with some small trade, very little difference is observable, the latter however rather seem the least reluctant. In this parish there are few servants that can be well distinguished from labourers. None of the cottier tenants of this parish go into other parts of the country on begging excursions. There does not exist any custom among the small farmers at an advanced age to transfer their farms to their children and become vagrants; the children would feel as much shame as if they were begging themselves. The parish priest mentioned a case of an old man who transferred his farm to his son, and being irritated afterwards by him, went to beg in the neighbourhood: the son, feeling the shame thus brought on himself, used most earnest entreaties with the priest, and by his influence prevailed on the father to return. A working labourer has stated, that the Connaught labourer on his way to England never begs, though his family beg; he stated that he had been with them, and the custom is to take a stock of provisions and some money to pay for lodgings. The greater number of vagrants are natives of towns; the country labourer generally grows some potatoes, while the town labourer, depending on the market when employment fails, is without resource; of the two classes, those reduced o beggary and those born beggars, the former exceed the latter in the proportion of two to one; the priest has stated that the reduced beggars have attributed their reduction to death, sickness or ejection from a farm, not an instance being known in the parish of any adopting such line of life from the facilities it affords of relief. A family of three or four persons may carry home, after a day's begging, from one to two stone of potatoes, according to the abundance or scarcity, and perhaps a quart of meal; but all the witnesses agreed in stating, that an able-bodied man could get nothing by ordinary begging. Through this parish only one car passes; two beggars attend, and receive about a penny a day; there are two places of worship; no beggar attends at the church, one only at the chapel, who receives about three-pence per Sunday. The amount of alms is increased according to the helplessness of the family, though not in proportion; all have coincided in stating that it frequently occurs that the same family, after being relieved in a body, separate in two parties and apply successfully to the same persons again.

There can be no comparison made by the witnesses as to the quantity received by an infirm or able-bodied beggar, no able-bodied man having been known to carry a bag, besides when he got enough to eat, he would cease to beg any further. Beggars when they obtain more food than they require, usually sell it to buy tobacco or clothes; they seldom store for comfortable clothing or for provision in winter; whether the circumstance of their being better clothed would be likely to diminish compassion, and that the fear of such consequence may drive them to dissipate their earnings, this may be a secret motive, but it is not within the knowledge of the persons examined. The parish contains none of those persons who beg under the plea of a vain search for work, neither has the system of assuming rags, dirt, the appearance of being diseased or crippled, been in any degree introduced into this parish, nor have any instances occurred of sores being produced or refusals to be decently clad for the purpose of producing sympathy. The persons who use forged recommendations are of a class quite different from vagrants, and little known by the inhabitants of this parish.

There have not existed in this parish any persons refusing to have their sores cured; nor have any instances been known of injury accruing to woman enceinte from any disgusting exhibition.

There have not been any refusals of parents to allow their children, if blind, or dumb, or maimed, into asylums for such persons; because, in this part of the country, there are no such asylums; nor in the parish do parents ill-treat their children to make them more piteous objects.

The resident beggars of this parish have not been in any way accused of immoralities, but thefts have been often attributed to the strollers; neither do they meet in this village to drink or smoke. The commission of outrages on person or property, or the fact of being concerned in assassinations, has never been charged to the vagrants, the extent of their guilt going no further than stealing clothes, if left out by night. Many boys growing up in beggary would be willing to emigrate; and in answer to the question, whether any vagrants go to England, it has been mentioned, that none, fit for labour, are to be met in the parish.

The resident beggars seem as attached to their children as any other class of persons; the dispositions of the strollers were not so well known; it was mentioned that beggars have been reported to share their earnings with others more destitute than themselves, but such was not an ascertained fact; neither was it within the knowledge of the persons examined, whether mendicants ever hired or borrowed children to excite compassion.

Vagrants generally have large families, inasmuch as the families are in general the cause of their poverty. But touching the marrying of beggars, the following was the answer of the parish priest; "I have been nineteen years ordained and never married a beggar." With regard to the proportion of illegitimate children, of vagrants compared with other classes, the same clergyman concluded that from the universal knowledge of a rule in his church, viz., that no woman would be churched who did not produce a marriage certificate, and from the fact, that though he christened upwards of fifty children of vagrants while he churched but two women, from this he judged that the women were, for the most part, unmarried. The comparative mortality had not come under observation, nor the producing causes.

As to whether an able-bodied man could obtain more by begging than by labour, such a man begging would get enough to eat, but nothing to carry home; yet the families of beggars get better food than labourer's families; Geelan, a labourer, described by the clergyman as a favourable specimen of 100 labourers in this parish, stated, that though he had employment at from 6*d.* to 8*d.* per day, and none to support but his wife, still that the families of beggars, in the matter of food, were better off than he and his wife, owing to their system of frequenting the farmer's houses at meal time.

There is seldom any inquiry into the character of those who are relieved, but there is no charity of that description in the parish that could in any way prejudice the morals of the labouring classes.

With earnings nearly equal, it is likely that the vagrants would prefer the roaming life; but it was considered if their condition was in a way to improve by labour, they would willingly adopt it; there was no case known of any choosing such life in preference to remaining a labourer. It was mentioned, in answer to the query whether beggars refused to labour, that the preference of work is given to neighbours, and that beggars, from want of habit, would not be as useful labourers.

Inquiry is never made into the characters of vagrants, nor whether they have previously received alms during the day.

The form in which relief is given to vagrants is in lodgings, in cast clothes and the clothes of the dead; but the alms chiefly given consist in meal, potatoes, cabbage and milk, which the farmers prefer giving to money, as being more convenient, though the beggar would prefer money, from the strong desire of tobacco. The quantity of food given daily depends entirely on the number who call, and the quantity at each particular time, and the number of the family; there are no pensioners on the bounty of particular families in this parish. No person in the parish seems to give in alms as much as would support an additional labourer; there are no shop-keepers; the farmers give about the value of three pence per day. There are about eight gentlemen's families in the parish, whose combined contributions amount to about five shillings per week. There does not exist in this parish a habit among the farmers of planting some small portion of potatoes, to be set aside exclusively for beggars.

As there are but very few resident gentlemen in the parish, and as from approach to the houses of some of those the beggar is debarred, the onus of sustaining the poor is placed, according to the opinion of all, on the farmers; the labourers, however, as stated by Geelan, the labourer, are expected to give something.

Beggars frequently receive more than their immediate wants require, the farmers give it even when the beggars' wallet is nearly full, from a religious motive.

The following was the statement of a farmer, as to the amount of relief; "I hold a farm of about 15 acres, and for nine months in the year give about a stone of potatoes, average value 2½*d*., during the winter three months, a quarter of a stone answers per day; I give very little meal, and no money." It was agreed by all, that labourers, and those holding very small farms, often suffer in the end of summer from the want of the potatoes given in alms in the earlier part of the season, and two instances have been adduced of respectable farmers' families having been ruined from profuse and unrestricted charity.

With regard to the point of preferring a regular tax to the present system of vagrancy with its annoyances, there was a difference of opinion. The farmers would prefer the present way as lighter, the expenditure being gradual, and laid out in accordance with his own wishes, in this opinion the priest concurred; while the magistrate and middle landlord would choose the tax, to get free from the many annoyances of vagrancy; relief is given to vagrants from a mixed motive, a desire to relieve the sufferer, because it was the fashion of the district, and from yielding to importunity. It was stated that religious motives would not, nor ought not, induce men to give to a beggar not in want, or if a mendicity institution were convenient. Alms have been given through fear by females to some sturdy beggars who met them in lonely places, but the instances in this parish were very rare, not more than two in twenty years; yet the dread of a beggar's curse has often induced many to give. The priest mentioned that several seek consolation from him after having received this malediction.

The system of giving a night's lodging to vagrants has been said to be the means of spreading diseases, small-pox especially; effects injurious to morals also are stated to be the consequence. The priest has affirmed that many of the juniors of his flock have greatly suffered from association with beggars' children, and both the farmer and the labourer have declared the language of these children to be both indecent and profane. Mr. Skipton, the magistrate, was not acquainted with any such consequence.

Those who have long lived a vagrant life, in no instances were known to return to habits of industry, but the boys when they grew up, either turn to some employment, or enlist; indeed a farmer mentioned one case of a mother and daughter who came to the parish and begged for some months, but who now are living on hard earned bread. The priest stated that the farmers were unwilling to employ them for fear of their contaminating their other servants

There have been no punishments in the parish for vagrancy, but the fear of punishment does not restrain vagrancy; the answer of the farmer as to the fear of punishment was, "were I a beggar, I would not starve while Captain Skipton had a cow that I could kill;" and Mr. Skipton stated, "that if they were not beggars, they should be thieves." It was asserted to be both absurd and inhuman to put rigorous laws into execution against vagrancy, while an individual may perish from want of food. The feeling, however, against such laws would gradually die away, if a provision were made, that precluded the chance of starvation. In this parish scarcely any outrages have prevailed, those which have, may be said to have had their origin in actual destitution. The neighbourhood is not furnished with a house of relief, nor if it were, would those who beg be inclined in general to adopt such relief.

Mr. CARBRY, general merchant.—Mr. DWYER, churchwarden.—Mr. GANBY, baker, grocer and spirit dealer.—Rev. Mr. HUDSON.—Mr. KEENAGH, baker.—Rev. Mr. KENNEDY, presbyterian minister.—Rev. Mr. O'DONOGHOE, R. C. clergyman.—Mr. WILLIAMS, town serjeant and under agent to Lord Longford.

IN the answer to the question whether the number of vagrants is ascertainable, there was considerable discrepancy. The number of persons soliciting alms from house to house was said by Mr. O'Donoghoe to vary within the union of Templemichael and Ballymacormic (which contains a population of 12,000) from 150 to 450. In Templemichael only, which, including the town of Longford, contains a population of 8,000, the number is said, by Mr. Hudson, to be generally about 50. Mr. Williams states them to vary from 60 to 120 in the town, which he thinks all the mendicants of the union frequent. Two witnesses place the number at about 100, and one, Mr. Ganby, makes them amount to nearly 300, having himself had 150 applicants for relief at his shop in one day. Mr. Keenagh mentioned that about 60 families and single persons had applied to him for relief on that day. The total number of such applicants being about 120.

With respect to the increase or decrease of vagrancy, three witnesses have perceived no variation. One, Rev. Mr. O'D., believes it to have increased one-third within the last six years, and another, Mr. D., one-sixth within five years, the former of these gentlemen attributing this increase to an increased difficulty of obtaining employment, and the latter to the greater facility of extorting relief, owing to the greater number of shopkeepers.

Vagrancy is most common in summer and harvest, owing to the influx of the families of the Connaught labourers, left by them when going over to England to beg in the more opulent opulent counties, until their return. About one half of the vagrants relieved in the neighbourhood are residents, one half strangers, owing to the town being a thoroughfare between Dublin and several counties of Connaught. Several of the witnesses have observed, at Mullingar (a town 20 miles distant) the same beggars whom they had frequently relieved in Longford. The number of beggars in Longford is increased about one-third on Mondays, because the inhabitants distribute on that day a greater portion of relief, or owing to the large market held on Saturday. Males are seldom seen begging in the streets from the age of 12 until incapable of labour. Females are seldom found in the same circumstances between 15 and 23 years of age. It is observable that though able-bodied men are rarely found begging in the streets themselves, yet they may frequently be found loitering outside towns, waiting for their families who are begging in them, and to whom their presence would be a disadvantage, since they represent themselves generally as widows and orphans. The proportion of females to males is said by some to be as nine to one, and by others, as three to one. The proportion of families to single beggars is two to one. The number of female mendicants is greater than that of males from several causes. The men more easily obtain employment, are less likely to excite compassion, and have higher feelings of independence. Some of the witnesses believe, too, that when the father of a family of females dies, leaving a small farm, they are unable to cultivate it, and are obliged frequently to resort to begging. This cause is, however, doubted by others, who know of no such instance. Males of the age of 12 or 14 become ashamed of mendicancy. Some obtain employment, some enlist, some emigrate, and many join gangs of pickpockets, &c. Females are about the same age taken into employment, first in occasional jobs, afterwards, perhaps, in service. Many become prostitutes, and travel about with gangs of depredators. They generally return to mendicancy about the age of 24 or 25, burdened with a family which they cannot support. No instances are known where persons who earn during the week, by labour, the means of subsistence, are found begging on Sunday; but several cases have occurred where the wives of men obtaining constant employment has been found among the common beggars of the town. Tradesmen or mechanics seldom beg; they are considered superior, as a class, to the cottier tenants, and would suffer great privations rather than beg. Their distresses, too, exciting greater sympathy, are frequently relieved by subscriptions. Old servants are sometimes found begging, but are generally reluctant to do so from feelings derived from their intercourse with the higher classes. Several instances are known where persons who have been cottiers in this neighbourhood have afterwards been found begging in distant parts of the country. Those who go to England for work do not generally beg themselves but take their families with them as far as Leinster, and leave them to beg until their return.

Vagrants are in general natives of towns, owing to the greater temptation existing there, and leading to dissipation and imprudence. All the witnesses agree that very few continue beggars from infancy to childhood. All, at some time, have earned their subsistence, and they have been reduced to beggary from the sickness, death or dissipation of the head of the family, from his being thrown out of employment, or perhaps from the great number of the family, some of whom are obliged to beg, being unable to obtain employment, or to subsist on the ordinary wages of the father.

Mr. Ganby has known a female mendicant to sell, at 3*d.* per stone, five stone of potatoes, collected in the country in a day. This is an extreme case; but when potatoes are so cheap as to be sold for 2*d.* per stone, two or three stone may be taken as an ordinary day's collection. The quantity of meal given is inconsiderable, at least in the country; in towns their earnings cannot easily be estimated, from the various modes in which relief is conferred. One importunate female beggar has paid for and drank in his shop, in one day, 6*d.* worth of whiskey. Mr. G. knows a blind beggar, and his wife, who also begs, whose joint earnings scarcely afford them sufficient to support life on potatoes and milk, which might be done for about 3*d.* per day; they pay 6*d.* per week for lodging, and are rarely in possession of more than 2*d.* or 3*d.* Rev. Mr. Kennedy has often seen a beggar in the country have three stone of potatoes in his bag, when they were selling at 2*d.* per stone; when potatoes are dear, less are given; but unless a farmer himself is buying them, he never refuses it in toto. There is no doubt but an able-bodied female beggar may obtain more than a bare subsistence.

Mail and stage coaches pass through Longford three times in a day: a set of about 10, all, but one cripple, females, beg from the passengers; they look on all others to be intruders, and divide among themselves their earnings during the day, which may average 2*s.* but are sometimes much higher; the same set may get as much more from private cars, &c. Very few now beg at the doors of the places of worship (the practice being discountenanced by the clergymen), and the two or three who do so may receive about 2*d.* each.

If a family of beggars apply, the quantity given would be increased, not, however, in proportion, but a family will obtain relief where an individual could not. Different members of the same family frequently and successfully apply for relief to the same persons; those who had gone together, going afterwards singly, and vice versâ; but this appears necessary for the subsistence of a large family. More is given to the infirm and aged than to an able-bodied mendicant, and the former are frequently relieved where the latter is not. Able-bodied men without children have ordinarily little chance of obtaining relief; even with women, the chances are in favour of those who have children. But the difference of earnings between beggars principally arises from one being more importunate or more plausible than another.

Beggars exchange, sometimes for tobacco, sometimes for spirits, but rarely for tea, the surplus food which they have collected. If they exchanged this surplus for articles of utility or comfort, they would certainly destroy the power of exciting compassion. Mr. Williams instances a woman to whom he had given a new cloak, which she constantly covered with an an old one. Itinerant beggars never save for any particular season, but sometimes do so for sickness, or that they may at their death obtain a decent burial, having a great abhorrence of being buried at the expense of the parish.

Stranger beggars frequently pretend sickness, and about 10 persons pass through Longford in the week, representing themselves as belonging to the trades for the time depressed. They generally obtain relief. Beggars now very rarely assume rags, dirt or the appearance of being crippled to excite sympathy; they generally adopt the most decent appearance possible to excite greater commiseration from appearing to belong to the better class. The Rev. Mr. O'D. recollects a single instance, where he had met, walking stoutly out of the town, a man who had personated a cripple in it. Vagrants do not now produce sores on their bodies, the imposition being too notorious. Many persons go about with recommendations, the truth of which it is impossible to ascertain. Mr. Williams mentions an instance of a person lately committed to gaol in the town on a charge of forging one of these; the prosecutor not appearing, the man was dismissed. No instance is known where beggars have refused to have their sores cured from a wish to retain the advantage of exposing them. The witnesses have heard, but have not themselves known instances where the exhibition of maimed and diseased beggars has been of injury to women enceinte.

There are no asylums in this part of the country to which the children of beggars, who are blind, crippled or dumb, could be taken. Children are frequently kept intentionally by the mother half naked in the most inclement weather, to excite greater sympathy.

The Rev. Mr. O'D. has not observed whether the habits of beggars are dissolute; but the other evidence proves that mendicants are both immoral and insolent, though they might not show these dispositions to the priest. Resident beggars do not meet together in the evening to drink or smoke, but strolling beggars and tinkers (whose wives always beg) do so. Beggars are not known to have been concerned in any violent outrages, but constantly pilfer, principally potatoes, either by rooting them up or by cutting the sacks in the market. Many of the boys becoming ashamed to beg as they grow up, connect themselves with gangs of thieves, and several such have been transported at the Longford assizes. Many are too idle to wish to emigrate; but some have been known to commit offences in order to be transported.

The confirmed vagrant sometimes, but very rarely, goes to England and Scotland in search of work. The feelings apparent towards their children are as strong among the vagrants as in the labouring classes; but children lose among them their respect for their parents. It is believed that beggars would divide their earnings with those more destitute than themselves. Mr. O'D. has known three instances where beggars have given marriage portions to their children, one being 10*l.* and another 20*l.* The other witnesses have heard but have not known of such occurrences. The children of one family are never transferred for any length of time to another, but are sometimes borrowed for a single occasion.

Vagrants generally have large families who have not been born in beggary. None of the witnesses have ever known beggars to marry with an intention of continuing to beg. The number of illegitimate children among them is very small, there being no difference in this respect between them and the labouring classes. The mortality among them is about equal to that among the labouring classes. The witnesses have known no instance of death resulting immediately from starvation, but many of great privation.

Able-bodied mendicants can obtain nothing; real distress is found rather among the labouring classes than among vagrants. Labourers, even when in constant employment, if with large families, could not provide their children with more than a sufficiency of potatoes and very scanty clothing; they are often stinted to one meal in the day, to which habitual beggars are never reduced. Mr. Ganby mentions that it has frequently happened that the wife of a labourer who has obtained an occasional day's work, not having a breakfast to take to him, has come to his shop to obtain it in advance; this is stated by the other witnesses to be a fact of frequent occurrence.

Resident beggars are generally known; with strolling beggars there is no safeguard against imposition. The prevalence of private charity is described by all the witnesses as certainly not prejudicial to the morals of the labouring classes. Women habituated to beggary, certainly prefer that mode of life; and Mr. Williams has known an instance where a woman employed as a charwoman, has left her service to return to beggary. The males prefer any other mode of life, and are rarely vagrants after the age of 12 or 14, three-fourths of them being absorbed in the ordinary labour of the country. The ordinary beggars are incapable of work; those who are not, either refuse it or soon throw it up; there are, however, but few instances of the latter class of mendicants.

A night's lodging is frequently given in the country to beggars; but in towns, the resident mendicants have lodgings, for which they pay from 4*d.* to 8*d.* per week. The strolling beggars pay for their night's lodging with a portion of their day's earnings or collection.

In the country, the relief generally consists of potatoes, and occasionally of meal, cabbage and milk. In town it is more varied, and includes broken meat and money. Farmers often give milk; they give food in preference to money, because the latter is not at hand, and they set less value on the raw produce. Beggars always, except when provisions are very dear, prefer money.

The quantity of food given daily depends on the number of beggars who call, and is never limited. The quantity of potatoes or meal given to each beggar is not fixed, but depends on circumstances. Rev. Mr. O'D. and Mr. W. do not know of any street beggars supported as pensioners on the bounty of families; Mr. Carley assists seven with 2*d.* or 3*d.* per week each. Farmers and shopkeepers do not give away as much as would support an additional workman Mr. Carley gives about 2*s.* 6*d.* in money, which with broken food would support a labourer labourer for half a week; Mr. Keenagh 3*s.* and broken food. Farmers have never been known to set apart the crops of certain portions of their ground for beggars.

The relief of beggars falls principally on shopkeepers, tradesmen and farmers; the gate of the gentleman's demesne or the door of his house being guarded against importunity to which individuals of the other classes are personally exposed. The man day labourer can scarcely afford anything, but gives more in proportion than the gentry, though I have known, says the Rev. Mr. O'D., a labourer after buying potatoes give some to a beggar and believe that they sympathise with them from the similarity of their condition. The labouring farmers give fully as much, if not more, than any other class.

More is given in many instances than is required.

A farmer holding 10 acres of land would give away, on an average, each day one stone of potatoes, valued, say at 2 d. per stone, and half a stone of meal in the week, value 4 d. more: the wife too will give additional relief without the knowledge of the husband. The value in food or money which a small shopkeeper gives each day in alms varies, according to Mr. C. and Mr. O'D., from 2 d to 4 d.; according to Mr. Williams, from 1 d. to 1½ d.. Relief is often given after the potato harvest, and the givers are themselves left in want in the end of the summer.—(Mr. C.)——All the witnesses agree that the shopkeepers would prefer giving a regular sum annually to be freed from beggars, but that the farmers would not.

Relief is given, not because it is the custom or fashion, but from notions of kindness. It is seldom extorted by importunity in the country, but sometimes from females in towns, and frequently from coach passengers and shopkeepers, the latter giving to free their customers from annoyance. The witnesses agree that if the beggar was not in want, or if when in want he had the certainty of relief by applying to an institution close at hand, such as a house of industry or mendicity institution, the relief given would be greatly diminished in quantity and would probably cease in the end, except among the farmers, who from habit and mistaken charity might continue the practice for some time. Relief is frequently extorted from the fears of females and sometimes from men, to avoid the chance of their dogs being poisoned, their fowl killed, &c. All however agree that the class of sturdy beggars is fast disappearing from the country. Relief is frequently given to obtain the blessing of the mendicant; rarely, even among the peasantry, to avoid their curse.

Fever, small pox and measles have often been introduced by the system of giving a night's lodging to vagrants; the morality of these families where lodgings are given to beggars is much injured. Mr. Carbry has heard that the younger peasants have frequently been induced by wandering beggars to connect themselves with ribbon societies. Rev. Mr. Kennedy has known much disunion between families caused from their tale-bearing. Mr. Williams mentions that he had heard from labourers in his employment that a wandering beggar from Tipperary had pointed out persons seeking relief in that country who had been instrumental in the punishment of criminals, and that such persons were obliged to fly. Mr. Carbry states that he has more than once heard a clergyman, in times of political disturbance, charge his flock not to harbour wandering beggars.

Ordinary beggars do not become a separate class of the community, but wandering tinkers, families who always beg, do. Three generations of them have been seen begging together.

No punishments have been inflicted for vagrancy, but a report was spread by the resident beggars, which prevented for a time the influx of strangers, that such measures would be adopted. Vagrants, if prevented from pursuing their occupation, become robbers by necessity, and the enforcing of vagrancy laws would have this effect. The repugnance to laws against vagrancy would probably be removed on the part of those charged with their enforcement, if a provision were made that precluded the chance of the starvation.

There is no house of industry or mendicity institution in the neighbourhood; the old and infirm would be glad of a place of refuge where the food and lodging would be equal to that of the labouring population, but the great body of the mendicants would prefer their present condition as affording greater personal liberty.

is increased from the want of resident gentry to employ the poor. Mr. Dixon says, "all the people used to get employment on the Hill of Down, by Lady Jane Loftus, but she is now dead."

Vagrancy prevails most here from the 1st of June to the 1st of July, when the families of Connaught labourers throng hither; not more than one-third of the vagrants are natives, the rest are strangers, chiefly females, of ages from 40 to 70 years. The resident beggars are generally infirm through age, and travel about singly, the strangers are in the habit of having families accompanying them. There is not known a single case in the parish of the wife and family of a cottier or employed labourer going about begging; but occasionally mechanics and servants out of place. The Rev. Mr. Flood, recollects one man, a millwright at Trim, and Mr. Dixon says it is very common for them to ask for as much as will pay for their night's lodging. It is not now the custom for the small farmers to give up their holdings to their children and go about begging. Gorman, a farmer, says, "faith they are cunninger now, 50 years ago they did it." Those persons who are going to England in search of work for the most part pay their way. Mr. Brown says, "I know a man in my neighbourhood, who last year brought home from England eight pounds," and the Rev. Mr. Flood exclaimed, "they would work a long time before they could do that in Ireland."

Connaught and the west of Longford, produce the greatest number of beggars, and in general they are the natives of country districts.

There are very few beggars the children of beggars. The Rev. Mr. Flood says, "when they are old enough, they generally go to work, I only know two instances, the one 20 years old, whose mother was a cripple, he drew her about; the other the son of a blind woman, he was 18 years, and led his mother about." Beggars are persons who at one time had earned their subsistence and gives as reasons for begging, the death of their husbands, or the want of employment for them, or that they are past labour, but none of the natives take to begging from the facilities it affords of a livelihood.

An able-bodied beggar might obtain one day with another, from two to three stone of potatoes. Richard Senior, serjeant of police, states, "I buy my potatoes from a beggar woman, and she supplies me almost every day with about three stone, she is an able-bodied woman, about 40 years of age."

The quantity given to beggars at each house is guided by the number applying, and Mr. Hopkins states, "there is nothing more common than to see families of beggars dividing and applying separately with success."

An old beggar would get more than any other.

Beggars sell their surplus collections, and buy tea and tobacco, but have not enough to purchase clothes or to lay by. Gorman, a farmer, says, "of strange beggars I have seen as jolly a set at fairs drinking as ever I see."

They generally beg under the plea that they cannot get work, and at fairs travelling mendicants expose their sores, and exhibit the appearance of rags and wretchedness. The Rev. Mr. Dixon states, "I have had some mendicants coming to me with forged characters, but after a short stay, their conduct not bearing out the character, they have absconded." He further adds, "I knew one family who used to send out their children with insufficient clothing purposely, when I was aware they had more at command."

Beggars are in general well conducted, but some of the young ones are exceptions, there are however but few thefts committed by them. Being generally infirm or aged, they certainly would not be willing to emigrate to America. They treat their children as kindly as other people, and they are sometimes known to borrow children for the purpose of exciting compassion. Gorman says, "I have heard the remark ever since I was born."

Beggars generally have families from five to six children, more of whom certainly are illegitimate, than children of the labouring classes. The Rev. Mr. Flood says, "I am inclined to think they frequently leave their homes to follow their immoral practices. There has been no case of starvation among the beggars, and from their avoiding labour, they are supposed to live longer than the working classes."

An able-bodied man would not collect more by begging than he would earn by working, but an able-bodied woman would.

Those relieved are not known, their characters are not inquired into, it would be a useless attempt. Vagrants in general prefer their wandering life to that of labourers. Mr. Hevey says, "when once they make a trial of it, they seldom give it over;" yet they do not adopt it at first from preference. Work is seldom offered to beggars, strollers may refuse it, but no resident beggar is known to have done so.

It is very usual to give beggars a night's lodging. Rev. Mr. Dixon states, "I have known beggars who got a night's lodging go off in the night, leaving one of their children behind and never return after." The farmers generally give potatoes and butter-milk in summer. Mr. Hevey says, "the Spalpeens' wives if they have children get some; money is rarely given." Mr. Hevey says, "the farmers want all the money for the rent, and more if they had it."

The quantity given depends on the number in family and the objects of charity, but generally about 2lbs. of potatoes are given to each; some of the large farmers give about a pint of meal, but this is to the aged and infirm. Some of the considerable farmers, perhaps 12 in the union, give away as much as would enable them to employ another labourer; the shopkeepers however do not, except one or two.

The support of the poor, as all the witnesses agree, falls on the shopkeepers, farmers and labourers. "The gentry," observes Mr. Flood, "shut their gates against them;" and Mr. Hevey says, "it is for that that I wish some sort of a poor law would be given, for they are as worthy of support as the soldiers or any other member of society; it is to me a matter of great surprise that property is secure."

A small farmer of about 10 acres, gives one day with another, about half a stone of potatoes, value 1½*d.*, and a small shopkeeper gives about 1*d.*, and both would prefer some tax to the present mode of giving.

Relief is given from the apprehension that the person applying is suffering from privation; importunity and the fear of violence, sometimes induce females to give; religious feeling too has great influence, but all concur in thinking this would be diminished if there were any establishment where certain relief would be given to beggars. The fear of a beggar's curse often makes weak-minded women give charity.

The system of giving nights' lodgings to beggars has been the cause very frequently of diseases being spread. The Rev. Mr. Flood states, "it is quite fresh in my memory, that a malignant fever was the consequence, and death ensued." Mr. Nangle says, "lodgings are very often given for the straw, poultry, or other things, which the beggars may bring in, and no inquiry is made, though in every case they must be aware that the things were stolen." Mr. Hevey, Mr. Gasteen, and the Rev. Mr. Flood state, "that about two years ago a great sensation was raised throughout the country, which almost ended in insurrection at Muff, originating in stories told by a beggar woman, viz. that the people were to assemble at Muff in order to obtain higher wages; on another occasion the country was much agitated here by stories brought by beggars, and the whole of this part of the country was expected to 'rise;' so much so, that the serjeant of police, who was present, stated, that 20 magistrates assembled with a troop of lancers, infantry, and police to stop the expected movement."

Mr. Nangle states, "that a beggar brought in a story some years ago, that the Orangemen of the north were coming to massacre the people, which caused numbers to lie out of their houses watching the enemy."

The confirmed old beggars would not give it up for any other trade, and indeed they may be distinguished as a class. Mr. Gasteen states, "there is a colony of beggars about a mile off in the bog, occupying about 10 cabins, perhaps about 40 persons; they are regular professed beggars; the place being set expressly for lodging beggars, they call it the 'Garden of Eden;' during harvest there is a difficulty in keeping them from stealing corn."

There have been no punishments for vagrancy, and the feelings of the people are entirely against severity, except in the case of dissolute and infamous characters; neither are those feelings likely at all to change, unless some provision be made against public destitution, which would supersede the necessity of begging.

They would not go into a house of industry; they would rather have their liberty; for their present condition is not behind the labourer, either in food or in lodging.

The following is an estimate of the charities given by the different classes in the parish:—

IN this parish there are but few resident beggars, but at particular seasons many strolling vagrants come here; yet vagrancy seems rather on the decrease, owing to emigration partly, and the greater cheapness of food. Rev. M. Mullen also thinks the habits of the people are also improved.

In the early part of summer, about May and June, women and children come here from other places, while the husbands are absent in search of work. The women are forced to beg from want of employment and the necessity of saving the man's hire to pay the rent. Able-bodied men are seldom seen begging here; they get some employment or other; but their wives and children beg in the scarce season. It is not a practice in this parish for old persons to make over their little farms on their children, and then go abroad begging; and whenever labourers go from this district to England in search of work, they do not usually beg their way, but carry their own provisions.

Country districts produce the greatest number of vagrants, and those who come here are principally from Connaught.

The proportion of beggars who have been always such, is very small, by far the greater number are persons reduced in circumstances; they attribute their reduced condition to the loss of husbands and fathers, and the general scarcity of employment. Mr. Tuite says, "since the passing of the Act depriving 40*s.* freeholders of the franchise, very many of them have been deprived of their holdings, and have thus become paupers. Emigration has also taken place to a great extent, chiefly among the labouring classes, who leave their families behind behind with the intention of sending for them, when their means will permit; thus very many women, children, and infirm persons are obliged to beg."

It was stated that an able-bodied beggar would obtain about two stone of potatoes per diem, on an average, and that an active man who was capable of exerting himself many hours in the day, might procure much more food than would be sufficient for his own consumption.

The quantity given depends in a great degree on the number of persons in the party, who make application for alms; and a family will frequently divide into two parties, and thus obtain from the same houses a larger quantity than if they had applied in one body. An infirm person would obtain more than a stout-looking beggar.

Beggars generally sell their surplus collections, or exchange them for tobacco, sometimes for tea and spirits, very rarely for the latter. Mr. Henry O'Connor thinks, "they do not buy clothes for fear a decent appearance might diminish their power of exciting compassion." Mr. West says, "that beggars frequently lay up a little saving against winter, but they cannot save much."

Vagrants, if able-bodied men, beg under the plea of an unsuccessful search for work; but women say their husbands are dead, or away in England or America. In some instances beggars retain dirt and rags, and assume the appearance of being crippled, for the purpose of moving pity; but this only is the case with the professed beggar, not with the occasional one. There is no instance known here of beggars refusing to allow their sores to be cured, being anxious to derive benefit from the exposure of their maladies.

The habits of professed beggars are dissolute; but those of the ordinary class of occasional mendicants are not so. Beggars in this country are not often concerned in outrages, but there are occasional thefts attributed to them; they seem to be equally kind to their children as other people, but of course cannot give them the same comforts; but they do not seem to share their earnings with each other, except they are living together. Beggars seldom hoard their earnings, except perhaps a few shillings for their funerals which was formerly a common practice with them, but is not so now.

Vagrants generally have large families, the average perhaps four in each family, and witnesses thought that the proportion of illegitimate children among them was greater than among other classes. The witnesses also thought that there were many premature deaths among them, from the slow effects of want, unwholesome food, &c.

It seems to be the opinion of the witnesses, that an able-bodied man would not collect as much by begging as he would earn by labour; but that his wife would obtain more than he could ordinarly earn.

Little or no inquiry is ever made by those who give relief, as to the character of the persons to whom they give, and the witnesses would not say, that private charity did injury to the morals of the labouring classes; yet Mr. Bear says, "in this parish mendicancy was increased, and a number of persons induced to become residents from the extensive charity of a particular family." It does not seem that many adopt a vagrant life in preference to remaining labourers; yet Mr. Bear has offered work to able-bodied men at the usual wages, who slunk away and would not accept it. The explanation of this however, may be that such persons having no house or means of preparing food, should receive it also; but Mr. Bear was not in the habit of giving food to his labourers.

Inquiry is never made as to the quantity a vagrant may have previously received during the day, and character is never investigated when alms are given.

A night's lodging is often given to beggars by the lower class of farmers, and sometimes clothes, but the principal relief is given in potatoes, which the farmers find it more convenient to give than money, though the beggar would prefer the latter.

There is no limit fixed as to the quantity to be given to each beggar or party that calls at a farmer's house, nor is there any particular quantity set apart to be given each day. There are, in the opinion of the witnesses, some few farmers who give away as much as would support an additional labourer; at some seasons they give much more; but there are periods at which they give very little, the women and the children then living on the produce of the potato gardens. In this parish some persons, probably about 20, are supported as pensioners by particular families.

As the farmers and shopkeepers are more open to the visits of beggars, of course they are obliged to give a larger share than any other class, and indeed the poorer classes give a greater support, in comparison, to the beggars, than the other classes; even the working labourers, who have nothing for themselves but their daily labour, share their meals with the beggar.

As it is impossible to ascertain how much any one may have received previously, of course it must often happen that a beggar may receive more than he requires; yet this is useful to another class, viz. the poor householders who are ashamed to beg, and purchase their surplus collections from the beggar; so that it very rarely happens that any food is lost which is given to the beggar.

The shopkeepers give about an average of 3*d.* per diem. Mr. Murtagh gives about 6*d.* a day, but does not consider the shopkeepers in general either do or can afford to give so much. Small farmers give in alms about a stone of potatoes per week, but this is a high average; in this parish, however, they often give so as to be obliged to purchase for themselves, in consequence of their charities in the early part of the season. It was considered that the farmers and shopkeepers would not prefer giving a regular sum to the present mode. They would not wish to be obliged to pay anything, and prefer the present mode, as they can suit their charity to their convenience; besides, the giving away of some food every day seems of less consequence than a sum of money, though less in value.

Persons give charity for God's sake, and expect to be rewarded according to the extent of their charity, it being of little or no consideration with them whether well or ill applied, if the person receiving appears to be in distress, and the intention of the giver be charity. In a neighbouring village, when beggars were excluded during the raging of the cholera, the people were anxious for their admission, saying, "they got no prayers for their souls then." The fear of the beggar's curse may sometimes cause persons to give charity, but not often; occasionally, however, alms are bestowed to get rid of importunity, but this is scarcely considered charity.

Diseases are spread by itinerant beggars to some extent, but not very materially. The habits of this class of beggars are not in general very bad, and their stay in one house so short that they cannot do much harm. They certainly tell stories, but seldom of that nature that would cause discontent.

Persons who have for any considerable time followed a vagrant life very seldom come back to industry, but of course terminate in becoming a separate class of the community.

Vagrancy has never been visited with any punishment in this part of the country, and the feelings of all persons are in opposition to any harsh measures on the subject; neither would it be possible to enforce any rigorous laws unless a great increase were made to the civil power; besides, the magistrates would be unwilling to enforce them. This repugnance it is very probable would abate considerably, if a provision were made which vagrants might betake themselves to.

There is no house of industry nearer than Dublin, and if there were, there would be the greatest reluctance to enter it. The poor would prefer any sufferings to a restriction on their liberty.

WILLIAM CONLON.—Rev. T. CAULFIELD, rector.—MICHAEL FINNEY, beggar.—PAT. GERAGHTY. —Rev. J. KEARNEY, P. P.—PEGGY KIERNON, beggar, with three children, her husband begging with three more in another part of the country.—Mr. CHARLES LENNON, farmer.—Mr. PHILIP LENON, farmer.—JOHN MIARS, labourer.—JOHN MONREAL, miller.—THOMAS STUBBS, esq. J. P. of Cork, residing here.

JOHN MIARS, labourer, states, that there are about 30 resident beggars, and three or four strangers to every one of the residents; however, there are not so many at present as used to be, because potatoes are now so cheap it is not worth their while. Rev. J. Kearney, parish priest, says, "I think there are less now; I find always when potatoes are from 1*d.* to 1½*d.* per stone, there is scarcely a strange beggar to be seen." Before the cholera, there were many more vagrants than are now seen; the reason is, they are not since so much encouraged, particularly in giving lodgings.

The time of year at which vagrancy prevails most is in the months of June and July, before the new potatoes come in, and when the winter's stock is nearly exhausted. Beggars relieved in this parish are mostly strangers who come from a distance. Michael Finney, beggar, says, "I go every year to my own part of the country, but I never beg there—I would be ashamed."

Mr. Philip Lennon, farmer, says, "the strange beggars are generally women and children; many of them have their husbands with them, who bring their spades and would work if employed, but we have enough of our own people to do our business."

Persons earning their own subsistence during the week are never seen to beg on Sunday, nor are the regular beggars so numerous on that day."

The farmers say, "we do not know of any of the wives of cottier tenants in this parish who are in the habit of begging; if they do beg, they certainly do not beg at home, and we do not miss many of our own people; but I dare say many who pretend they are going to visit their friends, leave the parish for the purpose of begging: they return again, and we know nothing about it."

In general, the cottier tenants, when obliged to beg, go into some distant part of the country to seek alms. Mr. Charles Lennon, farmer, says, "I know a man with five or six children who had but 7*d.* per day, and that only occasionally, who sent his wife and children to beg for a time, and he supported himself by labour; they never went since."

The small farmers often give up their land to their children, reserving a small proportion for themselves, but never for the purpose of begging. Those labourers who go to England to seek for employment mostly pay their way, and bring provisions from home, because as they travel in numbers, they could not expect to get much by begging. They are generally from the country parts, mostly from Longford and Connaught.

It is thought that the children of vagrants do not grow up to maturity in a state of mendicancy, and that those persons who become vagrants are driven to it by necessity; the parish priest says, "I know an instance of a labourer, who, with his family, lived six or seven days on one meal a day. He had a small patch of barley, and had calculated his means until the ripening of this; but a bad season kept it back, so that his wife and children, after suffering the extremest want, were obliged to beg until he had prepared the barley for them."

Rev. Mr. Kearney also gives an instance of a man who offered to sell him a field of growing wheat, in order to buy some provisions for his family.

Single persons do not get much, but a single woman it is supposed might get two stone on an average one day with another. All concur in stating that a single man would get very little, unless infirm, and then he could not walk far.

Peggy Kiernan, a beggar-woman with three children, says, "an able-bodied beggar, who could run through the country, would have a good deal provisions to sell."

William Canlon says, "I have seen 50 instances of beggars, who have slept in my house, having provisions which they had collected during the day, and which would be much more than each individual could consume." There is usually an increase of alms according to the number of the family of the applicants.

Peggy Kiernan, beggar-woman, says, "the quantity of food given is usually increased according to the number of beggars in the group, as far as five or six, but any single person could not support more by begging."

Rev. Mr. Kearney, parish priest, says, "sometimes members of the same family will apply during the day to the same person, and with success;" and also states, that "bodies of tinkers go through the country often with two wives each, and a number of children, who beg in small parties."

The infirm beggar will obtain a great deal more at a single house than the able-bodied, but he cannot call at so many. Also those who have young children will get more, but are not able to travel more than two or three miles each day.

Peggy Kiernan, a beggar-woman, says, "I get plenty to eat for myself and the children, of potatoes, but am sometimes at a loss for milk for this infant. We walk about two miles each day." With regard to the use made of their surplus collections by beggars, Michael Fenney, a well-dressed beggar, says, "I buy tobacco and clothes;" and P. Kiernan said, "I never had any thing to spare."

Rev. T. Caulfield, rector, says, "beggars in general have no objection to exchange their surplus collections of food for clothes, as being well clad would be no obstacle to their obtaining relief."

Rev. J. Kearney, parish priest, says, "beggars sell their surplus collections sometimes to procure spirits, but in general tobacco, shoes, and linen; and I think they cannot have more money than covers their expenses."

Patrick Geraghty, farmer, says, "I would relieve a man with good clothes sooner than any other, because I am sure that what I give such a person will not be squandered, for if he was a bad man or a drunkard, he would first sell his clothes."

Able-bodied men always beg under the plea that they are in search of work, but cannot find any. The women say that their husbands are sick, dead, or unable to support them by their earnings.

Peggy Kiernan, a poor beggar, says, "my husband is in the next parish, with four of our children, begging. We had some land, but was dispossessed when the lease was out; afterwards my husband worked as a labourer, but got sick through cold, and hardship, and want of covering at night; he is now unable to work, and if able, could not support seven children on his earnings."

Rev. J. Kearney, parish priest, says, "some of the women have patched cloaks for the purpose of exciting sympathy, and are unwilling to appear well clothed."

P. Geraghty, farmer, says, "women often say their husbands are gone to America. A woman told me so a few days ago: she had three children; and I knew a woman who begs in rags, and who has a good new cloak which she wears on Sundays."

Rev. Mr. Kearney thinks that the strange beggars could not dress much better than they do, but that some of the residents could. He also says, "I saw a woman with a most disgusting sore on her face, which seemed all distorted; she was examined, and it was discovered that the appearance was produced by squeezing a ribbon very tight across her face."

Patrick Lennon, farmer, says, "I knew a strong young woman who used to lead a blind man about; when the blind man died she continued to beg."

It is suspected that beggars sometimes prevent sores from healing, in order that by exposing them they may excite pity.

Rev. J. Kearney, parish priest, thinks that rags are no recommendation to beggars, as people suspect either that the beggar is a drunkard, or has money hoarded up.

The habits of vagrants are not thought to be dissolute. It is necessary that they should pretend at least to religious feelings, or the people would not tolerate them. Pat Geraghty says, "I never saw a beggar drunk: very often seven or eight of them sleep at my house."

Thefts are but rarely known to be committed by vagrants. Philip Lennon, farmer, says, "I knew of one man who went up stairs for some potatoes for a beggar-woman, who in the mean time robbed him of some clothes; but for the most part they are incapable of any violence, as able-bodied men are seldom amongst them."

Patrick Geraghty, farmer, says, "an infirm man to whom I had been very kind, and whose bed I used to make, stole my stockings."

The farmers say that beggars are generally very much attached to their children, and are constantly known to divide a small charity among them, without eating any themselves.

Rev. J. Kearney says, "I have known beggars pinch their children to make them cry, in order to excite attention when the door of a house was closed; but they are fond of them in general."

Philip Lennon, farmer, says, "I have often heard of women borrowing children to beg in order to excite sympathy, but I never knew an instance."

Rev. J. Kearney says, "I do not think there is one woman in a thousand who would lend her children for such a purpose."

Rev. J. Kearney says, "In general vagrants have large families, but a majority of them were not vagrants when they married. I did not meet an instance of a beggar's marriage these seven years."

"In most cases it is the number of the family that compels them to beg, and enables them when mendicants to get the more. I'm certain that many of them die of bad food and want of covering; most of their complaints are on the lungs."

Thomas Stubbs, esq. J. P. says, "in this parish labour is in demand, and an able-bodied man could procure five times as much by labour as by begging."

Michael Fenney, a beggar, says, "I could procure more and better by begging than by working. I work every year at the potato-digging season, and earn 18*s.* to buy clothes. I am afraid I will not be able to do so this year."

J. Monreal, miller, and John Miars, labourer, say, "that certainly private charity increases vagrancy, but they do not think that vagrants prefer their wandering and unsettled life to that of the labourer; and there was a case in point tried lately in this house (the Sessions Court). A short time since, a man with his wife and a number of children came to a farmer's door, and made an offer to work for him for his own support alone; it was accepted, and the family went to beg through the country. When the hurried season came, the farmer agreed to pay him some wages beside, but, when the work was over, refused. The beggar summoned him, and the bench of magistrates obliged the farmer to pay him for every day he had worked for him."

In general alms are given to beggars without any questions being asked, and without any knowledge of the mendicant's character.

Beggars sometimes get lodgings and clothes. Michael Fenney, beggar, says, "I get lodgings in the honour of God, and am seldom refused. When I have time to look for it, I get it for nothing, and never pay except when I come into a town, tired after a long journey, and must go to a lodging house."

Peggy Kiernan, beggar, says, "I seldom get any thing but potatoes, or a little meal: at some seasons milk."

Beggars do not always prefer relief in the shape of money, as in some districts it is not easy to exchange it for food.

Peggy Kiernan, beggar-woman, says, "I am often in want of money to get soap to wash the children's clothes, and very seldom get any."

There is no limit to the quantity of food daily giving to beggars.

Philip Lennon, farmer, says, "sometimes when a farmer's wife has given a great deal in the day, she determines to give no more; but if a woman and four or five children come in, she is certain to break through her resolution." There is no fixed quantity; generally almost a plateful of potatoes is given to each beggar.

J. Miars, labourer, says, "some of the strong farmers give as much away, at some seasons, in alms, as would keep an additional labourer, but there are not more than ten of this class in the parish."

The relief of beggars falls mostly on the farmers. Michael Fenney, beggar, says, "I am mostly relieved by the farmers and the poor; the labourers give much more than any, considering their means."

It is thought that, from the impossibility of the giver being able to know the beggar's previous collections during the day, he will often get more food than he can consume.

Peggy Kiernan says, "with my children I could not save any thing out of what I get."

A farmer holding ten acres is not supposed to be able to give much in charity to the beggars.

Philip Lennon, farmer, thinks "the shopkeepers and farmers would not like to pay any thing in the shape of a tax towards relieving the poor. We could not afford to pay any thing; we do not mind it as it is at present, but in money it would be heavy."

He further says, "alms are given to beggars through a dread that the person is suffering from privation, and also in the honour of God; but if the givers did not think the beggar is in want, they would take very little notice of him."

Charity is never given through a dread of violence to the donor's property, sometimes except to the strolling tinkers.

With regard to the spreading of diseases by beggars, J. Miars, labourer, said, "about two years ago we heard a good deal of the beggars having spread diseases through the country, and did not give them any lodging."

"They are never the means of causing discontent by fabricating stories; they merely bring the news, but nothing else. In general, they are very well conducted. Some vagabond tinkers get into our houses sometimes to lodge, but no one admits them willingly. A woman begged for lodgings from me some time since; I put her in the barn, and shortly after found 20 tinkers in it."

Some persons after pursuing a vagrant life for a long time, return again to industry, but such are not the confirmed beggars. Many families beg at certain seasons, and return to labour for the rest of the year.

Philip Lennon, farmer, says, "I am sure that when first they begin to beg all would prefer to work, but the habit grows upon them; still, if able-bodied, they are so much taunted with their state, that very few could wish to continue."

They scarcely ever beg here, except when starvation is the alternative.

The feelings of alms-givers generally, would be opposed to the use of any rigorous measures against beggars; the farmers said, "every one would side with the beggars;" there is a kind of pleasure in relieving them, that besides the expectation of future reward more than makes up for the burden.

The repugnance to severe laws being put in operation against vagrants, would soon be removed on the part of the people, if they had to pay themselves for a provision for the poor, and their heart would soon become hardened to it.

Rev. JOSEPH FITZGERALD, P.P.—LAURENCE LLOYD HENRY, esq. J.P.—Mr. MICHAEL HOPE, farmer.—Rev. ROBERT A. MARTIN, protestant curate.—Mr. JAMES SEERY, farmer.—ROBERT MORGAN TIGHE, esq., J.P.—The Marquis of WESTMEATH, lord-lieutenant of the county.

THE number of vagrants is very great, about 400, the greater number of whom, however, are not settled in the parish, but wandering mendicants. Mr. Hope thinks there are 30 applicants for relief at his house each day during the year; the number of mendicants has increased; this some of the witnesses attribute to want of employment and reduction of wages, which Mr. Henry thinks it is owing only to the increase of population. Vagrancy is most common during the summer, owing to the scarcity of provision, and the influx of the women and children of the Connaught labourers, who are left to beg while the husbands are in England; the vagrants are principally strangers, and principally women and children, with a few old men. They go about in families, and beg in order to save the earnings of the husband to pay the rent of the ground which is to support them in winter; the husband, when seeking employment, will sometimes sit under a hedge sending his family to beg for him. All the witnesses except Mr. Hope agreed, that these mendicants were either women with families, or infirm and aged, and stated that the strangers were generally able-bodied persons earning their subsistence by labour during the week; very seldom beg on Sundays, at least, if they are residents in the parish; the wives and children of cottier tenants and employed labourers, when resident, are not found begging, nor do these tenants after having planted their potatoes wander about seeking alms. Tradesmen, according to Mr. Tighe, very seldom beg; according to Lord W. feel less shame in doing so, the cottier being in his opinion more reluctant to beg in Leinster. Mr. T. said, that servants when disabled or out of employment generally begged; three of the witnesses believed, that cottiers frequently went into parts of the country where they were not known to beg; Lord W. and Mr. Henry thought they did so to labour, but not to beg; those who go to England for work, generally take their own bread, and do not beg their way.

The vagrants are generally from country districts, and principally from Connaught.

Very few are the children of beggars; their children when they grow up generally obtain employment in the service of farmers; the proportion of those who have formerly earned their own subsistence is great; they are in general reduced to beggary from the death, or want of employment of the father, and, according to Mr. Hope, from the objection entertained by landlords against selling a small portion of ground as a potato garden. Lord W. believed the failure of Lord French's Roman Catholic Bank (to which in preference to the Bank of Ireland the inhabitants of Connaught were much attached) to have been the cause of extensive ruin; the facility of obtaining relief does not act as a motion originally, but frequently induces them to continue beggars.

An able-bodied beggar can obtain from two to three stone of potatoes daily, and, according to Mr. Seery, three pounds and a half of meal; a woman and four or five children can procure, at some seasons, four stone of potatoes; Mr. Hope placed the average at one stone daily; able-bodied persons, especially if women with children, can procure more food than they can consume. Vagrants at Mullingar are very importunate in their attacks upon coach passengers; very little is given on Sunday to mendicants at the doors or avenues of places of worship; if a family of beggars applied, the quantity given would be increased in proportion to their numbers; different members of the same family frequently, and with success, apply for relief to the same persons. The quantity given to an infirm person at each house will be greater than to an able-bodied one. The latter, if men, seldom apply, having their wives and children to beg for them, but some (whose trade it is) do, and travel in a circuit of about 12 miles, taking nothing but meal, which they sell. These trading beggars will, as the farmers express it, "fling the potatoes in your face" if offered to them, and will not "load" themselves with any thing but meal; they can get anywhere enough of potatoes to eat, and will take with them meal only, "which will tell well, and be no great burden." This class can obtain more than those with children, being able to travel further daily, but children are in general very useful to excite sympathy.

Beggars having obtained more food than is requisite for their consumption sell it, and purchase spirits, tobacco, and sometimes tea. Rev. J. F. stated, that a woman might in some seasons save in this way from 3 d. to 5 d. daily. Mr. Hope thought the above remarks did not apply to the families of Connaught labourers, and that those to whom they did apply were not numerous. A few may possibly think it prudent to dissipate their earnings lest the possession of articles of utility or comfort would lessen the power of exciting compassion, but it is very rare indeed that such articles can be obtained. The habits of itinerant beggars are by no means thrifty, but Mr. Hope thought they did save in summer for their support in winter. Lord W. did not think that they usually begged under the plea of having been in search of work, and unsuccessful. Mr. Henry and Mr. Hope thought it was their usual plea, and that all able-bodied men would willingly work if they could obtain employment. Strangers frequently offer to work for their food without hire; women beg under the plea that their husbands are in England or at a distance working; confirmed beggars, assume sometimes rags, dirt, &c. for the purpose of exciting sympathy, but this class is by no means numerous, and is found principally in towns and at fairs. The state of mind created by such practices is incompatible with morality, especially among women. The exhibition of maimed and diseased persons in the high-ways (which is very common in the streets and roads approaching great towns, especially in Mullingar, as being in the centre of Ireland) is frequently the cause of injury to women enceinte; such objects are very common at fairs; children afflicted in the above-mentioned manner are taken about in the wet and cold, without sufficient clothing, in order to excite greater sympathy.

The habits of vagrants are stated by Lord W. and Mr. Fitzgerald to be generally dissolute. Mr. Hope and Mr. Henry thought not, unless in the cases of confirmed beggars; they sometimes meet in the evening to drink and smoke in towns and villages, but are not commonly concerned in outrages upon person or property, with the exception of bad characters who frequent fairs, and are found only in towns. The extent of thefts and robberies committed by vagrants is great. Lord W. once apprehended a vagrant with six wet shirts upon him, stolen on the road from Kells, 10 miles from the parish; confirmed vagrants would be unwilling to emigrate, and do not go to England or Scotland in search of work. Beggars are not often known to share their earnings with the more destitute; single beggars frequently hoard them; beggars frequently borrow children to excite sympathy.

They have in general four or five children; the proportion of illegitimate children is greater than among the labouring classes. Mr. Henry thought beggars did not marry earlier than other classes. Mr. Fitzgerald had himself married two persons who had been living together for 20 years as man and wife. Mr. Hope thought the mothers were mostly young. Lord W. mentioned that many married first without prospect of an honest subsistence, and then begged.

An able-bodied man can scarcely obtain anything himself by begging, but by sending his family to beg for him, can support himself as well as by working.

No inquiries are made as to the character of the beggar; the prevalence of private charity tends to increase the number of mendicants; vagrants are not usually persons who prefer that mode of life, but having once adopted it, usually adhere to it when the motives for emigration from Connaught periodically occur. They do not prefer it to remaining labourers, nor do they ever refuse work at the ordinary wages of the country.

No endeavour is made to ascertain what the vagrant has already received; alms are given to those of whose character the giver is wholly ignorant.

A night's lodging is frequently given. Mr. Hope's account of this is, that the cottiers do so in order to have as manure the straw which the beggar lies on; clothing is sometimes given in winter, but the relief usually consists of potatoes, meal, and sometimes milk; the farmers prefer giving food; beggars would generally prefer money.

The only limit to the quantity of relief given is necessity; there is no fixed quantity. All but Lord W. stated, that but few mendicants were supported by the gentry as pensioners; his lordship said many were so; both shopkeepers and farmers, but especially the latter, give away as much in alms as would enable them to support an additional workman or labourer; sometimes, as in the months of June and July, enough to support two. In country towns and villages, the shopkeepers frequently give weekly allowances to resident beggars; it is not customary for the farmers to plant small portions of ground, the crops of which are to be distributed among mendicants.

The relief of the mendicants falls almost completely on the occupiers and farmers, who, together with shopkeepers, are more exposed to annoyance from them; all the witnesses, except Mr. Hope, thought that the poorer classes gave much more in proportion than the rich. He believed that the labourers possessed of half an acre or an acre of ground seldom gave any thing but lodging, for which they obtained a portion of the beggar's earnings; the other witnesses believed that this class of labourers very frequently gave without any such return, and that even those who possessed merely cabins or were day labourers, relieved the beggar. In fact, said the Rev. Robert Martin, the system of charity is so general, that persons who have but one potato are willing to share it with the more destitute.

From the impossibility of ascertaining how much beggars have already received, more is frequently given to some than they require, such uncertainty leads to the waste of the provisions, especially in the cases of single beggars.

A farmer holding 10 acres of land would give, any one day with another, half a stone of potatoes; they often give more than they can afford. The feeling of charity generally prevalent has not probably ever led to the pauperising of a labourer, who might have continued independent and comfortable. The intelligent portion of the farmers and shopkeepers would prefer giving a regular sum annually, to sustaining the present annoyance from beggars, and the risk to their property, especially if such a tax were proportional to their means.

Relief is given to vagrants generally from the fear that they are suffering privation; very seldom because it is the custom or fashion of the district, and in towns sometimes is extorted by importunity. Superstition and beggars' prayers influence many to give, but if the beggar, when in want, could apply with a certainty of relief to any institution, such as a house of industry or mendicity institution, the donor would certainly not feel it a duty to give; relief is very seldom or never given to able-bodied persons from fear of violence to person or property; it is very seldom yielded to the supposed civil influence of a beggar's curse. Mr. Hope stated that a beggar who cursed would get nothing.

Diseases are often spread through the country by the system of giving a night's lodging to vagrants. The morals and habits of the labouring classes are very often injured by their custom, and vagrants are constantly in the habit of circulating gossip, fabrications, and superstitious absurdities.

Those who have followed a vagrant life very seldom return to industry (nor in many cases do their children), they ultimately become a separate class of the community.

No punishments have been inflicted for vagrancy in this district. The general feeling is strongly opposed to the execution of rigorous laws against it, while there is a possibility of a person perishing from want of food. If a provision were made that precluded the chance of starvation, this repugnance would certainly be removed; but while it exists, such laws could not possibly be efficacious; outrages, according to Mr. Fitzgerald and Mr. Hope, arise in many instances from actual destitution, especially where persons are dispossessed of their holdings. Lord W. attributed them rarely to destitution, generally to political causes.

There is no house of industry or mendicity institution nearer than Dublin, unless the county bridewell, at Mullingar (10 miles off) be esteemed so; but vagrants merely as such are not sent there.

Rev. JOHN BURKE, P. P.—Rev. ADOLPHUS DROUGHT, protestant curate.—WILLIAM FAGAN, farmer.—Mr. SIMON FAGAN, farmer.—THOMAS HALPIN, farmer.—Captain PAKENHAM, J. P.—WILLIAM DUTTON POLLARD, esq. J. P.—NICHOLAS RIEVE, farmer.

THE number of beggars in this parish is said to amount at some seasons to 300 at least; and continues about the same, neither increasing or decreasing in any great degree.

The period at which vagrancy is most prevalent, is about the months of summer, when the potatoes are growing; and from the end of December to March. Women and children chiefly make up this class, either by the death of the father, or the want of employment, or the lowness of wages, being sometimes 3 d. per day with food; no able-bodied men are found among the beggars; sometimes the wives of employed labourers beg, but it is mostly in the case of Connaught labourers; in some cases the cottier tenants after planting their potatoes go begging, but not in this parish. Many tradesmen, especially weavers, beg, nor do they show more reluctance than labourers to this mode of life; as there is now no employment for weavers at their trade, by the decline of the linen trade, they are obliged to have recourse to day labour, but being inured to an in-door sedentary trade, they are unable to bear the fatigues of agricultural labour, and are in general most wretched.

When cottier tenants beg, they go into a different part of the country, but labourers when on their way to England, very seldom beg their way, they bring some provisions with them.

Most of the strange beggars that come here are vagrants from Cavan, though the witnesses do not agree, whether the majority are from the towns or country.

There are a good many who have been always beggars from childhood, but the majority are reduced persons, who generally attribute their downfall to the illness of the father, or his death, and the want of employment; some even beg from the facilities of subsistence that begging supplies.

The supposed quantity of meal and potatoes given from day to day, may amount to three stone, meal being seldom given; this takes place in a case of a woman and children begging; an able-bodied woman would get more by begging than she could use, but an able-bodied man would get little or nothing; in this parish the sum given at the entrances to places of worship is very small. A woman may support in idleness her husband by begging, and sometimes does.

The earnings of the beggar increase according to the number of the family, and it frequently happens that the same family after applying together, will then separate and apply again with success; in applications for relief, the infirm is more likely to be successful than an able-bodied man, but those with children are more successful.

A woman who keeps a small shop in this neighbourhood, lately sold 300 stone of potatoes, which she had purchased solely from beggars.

Michael Nail, from an adjoining parish, says, "he had known beggars collect such quantities of potatoes, as to be obliged to borrow a horse and car to remove them; he also knew a woman to sell a stone of meal, which she admitted was the produce of one day's gathering.

Wm. Pakenham, esq., says, "there is a charitable manufactory in this town, at which mendicants frequently purchase new articles of clothing, and pay for them by instalments, beginning always with a dispatch."

Mr. Drought stated, that he had been told by the children of beggars, that their mothers have collected six or seven stone of potatoes, which they sell for whiskey, tobacco, tea, &c., yet very seldom are seen drunk; but they must be driven to some dissipation, inasmuch as if they clothed themselves by their earnings in better garb, they may diminish compassion; some of them are supposed to save for bad times.

Able-bodied men sometimes put forward the plea of fruitless search for labour, and women say it of their husbands, and vagrants often foster rags, dirt, and the appearance of disease, for the purpose of exciting sympathy; they have been known even to have produced sores, &c. for the same purpose; certainly the confirmed beggar has been known to refuse being well clad, and some dress well on Sundays when not begging; often also they have been detected using forged recommendations, &c., and thus evince a state of mind incompatible with with morality. They sometimes too, by their exhibition of sores, have done injury to women in the family way, and it has been known of the cripples, that they form joint stock companies and divide the earnings.

The habits of those who live by begging are frequently dissolute, and the town beggars drink and smoke; they have not been known to be concerned in any outrages on person or property, nor to engage in assassinations, but the number of thefts committed by them is very great; in some cases the beggar would be willing to emigrate to America; as to the comparative affection for their children between them and the other classes, witnesses could not state, but they have heard, though do not believe, that beggars borrow children to beg with.

Rev. A. Drought thought, that if a man had constant work at the ordinary wages, he would be better off than as a beggar, but that, considering the chances of employment, his family could support him better by begging; that is, by having him at home and going themselves to try for his support.

Some thought this extensive charity prejudicial to morality in this way: Able men very seldom beg, but when driven from this exclusively, the falling in of leases, the will of the landlord to "clear off" his estate, or some casualty, they then with spade in hand go through the country to seek for work, their families going before them to beg, at first they certainly do work when they can get it to do, lest when shame wears off and they find the almost certainty with which their families can support them by begging, they become idle and do not seek for employment.

It has been said that in some instances beggars hoard money, but it was not known to be the case. They have in general from three to seven children, and a greater number of illegitimate children than the other classes.

It was conceived that an able-bodied man would be better than by any collection he could make by begging.

No inquiry is made into the character by those who give to beggars, and the practice of indiscriminate charity seemed to some to be prejudicial to the morals of the labouring classes, as likely to increase the number, but others did not agree. They have not been known to adopt a vagrant life in preference to remaining labourers, yet after continuing it for some time, they may perhaps like it better; certainly, when offered the ordinary wages they have refused.

No endeavour is used to find out whether a vagrant has received much during the day, unless they seem to have a good deal; but they seldom appear to have much, as they often unload their gatherings; there is no inquiry either into character, and alms would be as freely given to one unknown as to one known.

Sometimes a night's lodging is given to them among the poor, in return for their beds, to be used as manure; very seldom do they get any clothing, the chief donation to them being in potatoes, sometimes meal and a little milk; the farmers seldom give money, food being more convenient, though the beggar would in some cases prefer money.

There is no fixed quantity of food daily given, no limit but convenience, the usual quantity to a beggar is as much as can be taken up by both hands. There are many farmers in the parish who give as much away as would support an additional labourer, while several also are supported altogether by the bounty of particular persons; there are not any regular weekly subscriptions for supporting resident beggars.

On the farmers the support of the poor principally falls; the labourers with half an acre also give; even the mere day labourer, who has nothing but his cabin, contributes; in all cases the poor and working classes giving in proportion to the rich, the farmer and the shopkeeper are of course more annoyed than the rich.

As it is impossible to tell what a beggar may have previously received, of course he must sometimes receive more than he requires; they prefer getting potatoes that they may sell the overplus; this causes no waste of provision, as there are enough to eat them.

The quantity given by a farmer who has 10 acres, is stated to be about a stone of potatoes a day, and the value of what a shopkeeper gives may be about 5 d. a day; often the feeling of charity has in seasons of distress been the cause of great injury to the struggling man. As to whether the farmers and shopkeepers would prefer a fixed tax to the present mode, the shopkeeper might; the farmer would not, finding it easier to give in the present way, money is so scarce.

The feeling which almost always causes relief to be given to vagrants, is the fear that the applicant is under great privation; nor has the custom of the district any considerable force in causing charity; importunity is rare; when told there is nothing to be had, they pass on; religious feelings at present exist in some degree on the subject; but if an institution were at hand to relieve the beggar, the priest said it would be looked on as a sin to give him anything. The fear of violence is not a cause of giving, nor does the curse of the beggar seem to be dreaded; "they consider the curse of the wicked no consequence."

The effects of vagrancy are agreed on by the witnesses to be, the spreading of diseases, the contamination of morals, and the mischievous effect of spreading and inventing stories.

Those who have been long vagrants do not often return to industry, but for the most part ultimately become a separate class of the community.

There has been known one instance of a vagrant being transported by presentment at the assizes, but punishment has no effect in stopping vagrancy, the feelings of the givers of food, &c. being all in opposition to any rigour towards vagrants.

The Rev. Mr. Burke thought the dislike of the peasantry to prosecute for petty offences, was chiefly owing to a sympathy for their poverty, which was known to be so great, no severe laws would be efficacious, public opinion being opposed to them: but if a provision was made, that repugnance would certainly cease. Outrages have scarcely ever arisen from actual destitution.

There are no houses of industry in the parish, nor would the beggar willingly take refuge in them.

Rev. JAMES ALEXANDER, rector.—Rev. JOHN CURRAN, P. P.—GEORGE M. T. DROUGHT, esq. police magistrate.—MATTHEW KEEFFE, farmer.—DAVID MOORE, shopkeeper.—PETER PURDON, esq.

THE number of vagrants in this parish is very great. Rev. J. Curran thought there was about 300 or 400, who beg sometimes; and Mr. Purdon said the number of permanent beggars was about 70.

The general opinion was, that vagrancy was increasing through the great want of employment; but Matthew Keeffe said, "I think the number of impoverished people is increasing, but vagrants are not this year more numerous owing to the cheapness of provisions."

Vagrancy is most common from May to the beginning of September, because potatoes ar then scarce and dear; there is very little employment and numbers of strange beggars crowd in from Connaught. The greater number of those vagrants are considered to consist of persons from the neighbourhood, but Mr. Keeffe thought they were in general strangers; they consist of infirm men and able-bodied women with children. The residents are mostly infirm single persons; the strangers go in families, and are very seldom accompanied by the husbands or fathers, who are in general employed in a distant part of the country, or in England. The families of cottier tenants very seldom beg, and it is not a custom here with this class to plant their potatoes and wander about in search of alms. Matthew Keeffe thought, that the cottier tenants did beg, and in order to do so, always go to a place in which they are not known, but no instance has ever been known here of an old man transferring his holding to his children for the purpose of begging.

The strange beggars are mostly from Connaught, and the residents live on the borders of bogs, where they can have fuel in plenty, and can easily get ground on which to build a cabin; they are mostly the natives of country districts.

By far the greatest number of vagrants are persons who have been compelled to adopt that mode of life through necessity, caused, as Dr. Moore said, "chiefly by the sub-division of land, and the rack-rent system, which renders the holder of land unable to give employment; very few are the children of beggars, and very few become beggars on account of the facilities of obtaining relief." Matthew Keeffe said, "there are some of that description who are very idle."

Meal is not frequently given to beggars, and of potatoes, most of the witnesses thought an able-bodied woman may collect about a stone each day. M. Keeffe, farmer, whose house is near the high road and much frequented by beggars, said, "two stone at least." David Moore thought that in many cases such a person could obtain perhaps three stone, but all the witnesses concurred in saying, that in general they could get more food than was necessary for their own consumption. David Moore said, "I am sure they can, I have frequently met beggars with good bags of potatoes."

When a family applies, the quantity of food given is increased according to the numbers, and different members of the same family frequently apply in a day to the same persons; but the Rev. J. Curran thought it by no means a custom, and that beggars seldom call more than once a week.

In relieving beggars very little distinction is made between an able-bodied and an infirm person, "except," said the Rev. J. Curran, "that meal is more frequently given to the latter, as being more portable." An able-bodied person can therefore get more in a day than an infirm one, being able to walk farther and apply to a greater number of houses.

When beggars collect more food than they require for their own use, they exchange or sell it, and procure (most of the witnesses thought) tea, sugar, tobacco, bread, and spirits, but Rev. J. Curran thought, they rarely had any thing to spare, and that when they could purchase any thing, they preferred articles of clothing. It was said also, that some beggars are supposed to have money hoarded up, but instances are now very rare.

It is considered that deceptive means of exciting pity are very rarely used. The usual pretext under which women beg, is, that their husbands are dead or away at work, and more say, that they cannot get employment.

Rags, dirt, &c. are not fostered for the purpose of exciting pity; sores are never produced for that purpose, and the Rev. J. Curran did not think they were unwilling to be well clad, but all the rest of the witnesses thought they were. D. Moore said, "I am sure they are." Sometimes revolting exhibitions of maimed persons are to be seen at fairs, but these belong to a distinct and not numerous class.

The habits of those who live by begging are supposed to be frequently dissolute, but in general not. They are never engaged in outrage, and are but rarely charged with thefts. Mr. Drought said, "men have been paid to commit murder, but such are never destitute persons." Beggars are as attentive to their children as any class; and are sometimes known to share their earnings with persons more destitute than themselves. Rev. J. Curran said, "I knew instances of their having done so."

It was thought that they sometimes hoard up money; but Rev. J. Curran thought it was only done for the purpose of having "a decent funeral."

The number in family of the strange beggars is said to be on average four, but it is not known whether they marry earlier than the other classes or not; Rev. J. Curran said, "I know no difference," and D. Moore said, "I cannot say as to marriage, but I have seen many young women with children. I remember one in particular, she said she had her first child before she was fourteen years of age."

The number of illegitimate children is very small among any class.

Some of the witnesses did not think an able-bodied man could in general collect more by begging than he could by labour, but Mr. Purdon thought he could get as much. Mathew Keeffe and D. Moore said, "they were sure he could get much more by begging."

Very little is known in general of the characters of those who are relieved, by those who give alms; Rev. J. Curran said, "they do not always inquire, but if any of the beggars are known to be bad characters, they are driven from the parish."

On the point whether or not vagrants were mostly persons who preferred that mode of life to one of labour, the witnesses were divided. Some thought they often were, and some said very rarely, but as all admitted that very few able-bodied men were to be found among them, and that for women and children, there was no sort of employment, it may be concluded that but few are beggars, otherwise than from necessity. D. Moore said, "that beggars had refused to take employment which he offered them;" and Rev. J. S. Alexander mentioned an instance of the same kind: the beggar was a traveller, who asked for assistance and refused to remain and work; he said, he was returning to his family in Connaught.

No sort of caution is used against imposition; no attempt is ever made to ascertain what the beggar may have already got during the day, and alms are constantly given to persons of whom the giver has no knowledge whatsoever.

It is very much the custom with small farmers to give lodging to beggars; articles of clothing are also at times given them, and the food given is potatoes, and a little meal; milk they get only in summer, and the farmers never give money, as they cannot afford it, and food is more convenient to them.

There is no limit to the quantity of food to be given to beggars each day; it depends entirely on the number of those who apply; nor is there any fixed quantity to be given to each.

Some few are mainly supported by the bounty of certain families.

Some of the farmers could maintain an additional workman on their alms. D. Moore thought they did not give so much away, and Rev. J. Curran said, that this year some farmers could maintain three upon the food which is given in charity, as it is a bad season, and there are many beggars.

The relief of beggars falls almost entirely on the farmers. The poor and working classes give much more in proportion to their means, than the rich, and even the labouring possessed of but half an acre, as David Moore said, "often give more than they can spare."

A farmer, holding 10 acres of land, may give away, one day with another, at some seasons, from one to two stone of potatoes.

Considering the annoyance which farmers and shopkeepers are subject to from beggars, all the witnesses thought, they would be glad to pay a regular sum, and thus get rid of them altogether.

Relief is given to vagrants through charity, and because it is considered absolutely necessary for their support, and the custom is now so universal, that no one thinks of breaking through it, but religious feeling would not oblige a man to give to a beggar, whom he knew not to be in want; if an institution were established in the neighbourhood, he would readily refer such a person to it for relief. Charity is not given through fear of the beggar's curse.

It is supposed that diseases are spread through the country by the custom of giving lodging to beggars, but the witnesses did not think any bad effects were produced by it on the morality of the families with whom they lodge.

No punishment is ever inflicted here for vagrancy, and such a law would be most unpopular, and would never be resorted to by the givers of relief; but this repugnance would be removed in a great measure by the establishment of a certain mode of provision. If an institution was established to give in-door support, the general opinion was, that the old and infirm would willingly go into it; but no other class.

THERE is a considerable number of vagrants in the parish, but the exact number cannot be easily computed. A great majority of them are strangers, and their number is greatly increased within recollection.

Vagrancy is most common, from the middle of May, until the latter end of August, on account of the great deficiency of employment.

The vagrants consist almost exclusively of women and children; men very rarely, if ever beg. Many of the women are able-bodied, and others are aged and infirm.

Persons who earn their subsistence during the week, are never seen begging on Sunday.

A very few of the wives of cottier tenants may beg in the absence of their husbands, but it is by no means usual in this neighbourhood; and very few of the cottier tenants indeed scarcely ever wander about the country seeking alms; their condition is far preferable to that of those formerly employed as mechanics, who generally appear most wretched.

When any of the cottier tenants are driven to beg, they always go into parts of the country where they are not known, and anxiously strive to conceal their distress from their neighbours. Those who go to England to look for work, generally pay their way through Ireland, and often work a day or two on the road, carefully saving what they earn, to prevent the necessity of begging.

Many of the vagrants come from Longford, and a still larger proportion from Connaught.

But an exceedingly small number of vagrants are brought up from their youth in habits of mendicancy; even the beggars themselves desire most earnestly to obtain employment for their children, and few, if any, ever resort to this mode of life, in the first instance, except under the pressure of necessity. There are many beggars who formerly earned their own subsistence, and whose destitution is attributable to "bad seasons, failure of crops, sickness, &c., and consequent inability to pay rent."

There are but very few who become beggars from the facility of obtaining relief, as mendicancy, by those who can possibly support themselves otherwise, is almost universally accounted disgraceful.

From two to three stone of potatoes is said to be the average quantity which an able-bodied beggar might obtain one day with another,* which is unquestionably more than any one person could consume.

The amount received at avenues leading to places of public worship is very uncertain. This mode of relief does not prevail to any extent in rural districts.

If a family of beggars apply for alms, the quantity given would be increased in proportion to the numbers, and reference is always made to the apparent necessities of the applicants.

It is supposed† that occasionally different members of the same family apply to and receive alms from the same individual. An able-bodied woman might frequently get more than an infirm one, from being able to travel farther; but an able-bodied man would frequently find it difficult to obtain "anything." It is very doubtful, for the same reason, if the beggar-woman with children would not have more than the able-bodied at the end of the day, as increased alms are given on account of the children, which may more than compensate for not being able to beg at so many houses.

Beggars generally sell or exchange their surplus collections of food. George Dixon, farmer, "knows two small shopkeepers who almost exclusively purchase their potatoes from beggars, but he thinks the latter very seldom attempt to obtain luxuries, except perhaps a little tobacco. Clothing for their children is a main object with them."

Mr. Loyd, a respectable shopkeeper, not long ago "sold flannel clothing to a beggar to the amount of 6*s.*, for which she paid him from the produce of provisions given to her as alms. This woman particularly insisted on getting a receipt for the payment, lest she should be suspected (on her future rounds) of having stolen such comfortable habiliments."

Beggar-women generally plead the sickness, death, or absence in search of work, of their husbands, and their own consequent destitution. They sometimes encourage an appearance of rags and dirt to excite sympathy, but it is not generally practised, as decent apparel is for the most part rather a recommendation; and very rarely indeed does it happen that they resort to such expedients as lying, forged recommendations, &c. &c.

The beggar from voluntary choice will of course be generally idle, and occasionally dissolute; but the beggar from necessity is for the most part thankful to relinquish that mode of life as soon as his wants can be supplied by labour.

The class of mendicants who exhibit maimed and diseased persons for the purpose of exciting sympathy is chiefly restricted to those who frequent fairs, &c., and altogether distinct from the main body of those who are supported by almsgiving.

The beggars are not supposed to be capable of committing the graver sorts of crime, and even the petty larcenies are but seldom imputed to them.

When asked if confirmed vagrants would emigrate: if by "confirmed vagrants" is meant the incorrigible beggar, it is replied that the number of such men is very few, and that they would probably rather remain where they are than seek employment anywhere.

Women of course are too rarely able to emigrate to make the inquiry of much consequence.

Beggars are as kind to their children as other classes, and are sometimes known to share their collections with others more destitute than themselves.

The beggars very often have large families, but are not supposed to marry earlier than other classes; and though there may be a few more illegitimate children amongst them than the working classes, yet the difference is too small to be distinctly perceptible.

Dr. Bewley has observed no evident difference in the rate of mortality among them, or of the comparative mortality in towns and country, though he says there can be no doubt that the the duration of life is very frequently shortened amongst the labouring classes by diseases arising from the scanty and unwholesome food, insufficient clothing, and wretched state of their dwellings; but he has never known a case of actual starvation.

It was unanimously and emphatically stated, that there exists the greatest unwillingness to give alms to an able-bodied man at all times.

Little or nothing is known of individual merits in the relief of vagrants; the undoubting conviction that want and distress are prevalent seems to preclude inquiry.

It is commonly believed that vagrants would greatly prefer a life of regular employment to wandering about, though some rare instance may occur of able-bodied beggars refusing when employment is offered to them; but it is conceived that these cases are merely to be regarded as exceptions. Mr. Egan says, "I never met a man who refused to work."

If the vagrant appears to be in want, alms are given without any inquiry into his character being made by the giver.

Farmers usually give their alms in potatoes, sometimes milk, and frequently (though not usually) articles of clothing. They seldom can afford to give money, though it is generally thought that the beggars would prefer it to food.

There is no limit in the quantity of alms daily given.

Shopkeepers usually give alms in money once a week to a certain number of resident paupers, and occasionally to strangers.

The relief of vagrants falls most disproportionately on the farmers, and even the small farmers and day labourers contribute much more liberally, compared with their ability, than the richer classes.

The daily average given by the farmers of potatoes in charity, is from one half to three quarters of a stone; and the shopkeepers give on an average from 1*s.* to 1*s.* 6*d.* weekly in money.—(All concur.)

There are many of the labouring classes who are frequently known to stint themselves in order to relieve others who are more destitute; and all concur in declaring that they would prefer the present mode of assisting the beggars to paying a regular annual sum, assigning amongst other reasons the opportunity it affords of selecting their own objects of charity.

A dread that the vagrant is suffering from privation, and strong religious feeling, are in general the motives which induce most people to give alms; giving in honour of God, to be in itself meritorious, without any reference to the deserts of those who ask it; but even those would refuse alms to any whom they knew not to want, though they would probably give it to the necessitous, notwithstanding the immediate vicinity of some charitable institution.

It is supposed that fever may in a few rare instances have been communicated by beggars, but too rarely to interfere with the exercise of charity towards them in the shape of a night's lodging.

The confirmed vagrant seems to prefer his wandering life to any regular employment; but the beggar from necessity will always be glad to get work.

The vagrancy laws are never put into force in this district, and in the existing state of things such enforcement would be decidedly repugnant to public opinion.

There are no houses of industry, and the general opinion of the witnesses is, that beggars would not like to go into them if there were such institutions.

Patrick Mullvanny, labourer, says, "I would take all the chances I told you of, viz. starvation, and, if I died under it, of having my wife and children beggars, rather than go into such a house. I would much rather have 6*d.* per day constant outside; in fact, I would consider myself very well off with that all through the year."

THE number of resident beggars amounts to about 100, who are not by any means the most destitute, and the number is increasing with the population and the scarcity of employment. "The farmers employ less labourers now than formerly, as there is less tillage; upon the sheep and fat cattle they now depend for the rent."—(Wm. Beattie.)——And Mr. Mahon gives as another reason, that "about 10 years since we had an extensive linen trade, which employed all the women; they cannot now earn more than 1*d.* per day. I often saw 10,000*l.* worth of yarn at the fair; there was this year but 100*l.* worth."

Vagrancy prevails most from May to September, as provisions are then scarce, and the husbands of strange beggars away in England or in the country to seek for work. Beggars are mostly women and children. George Reeves says, "I remark of late years many more children among them; I also know old men who go out in the country to beg for their families. The young persons are ashamed to beg at all, and the old man where he is known."

Rev. Alexander Gibson says, "when work is not constant, the wives and children of labourers are obliged to beg. I always remark when work is constant, and the wages any thing near sufficient to support them, very many cease to beg." In consequence of this inability to do out-door work, through habits induced by their trade, the weavers are the most wretched of all. Robert Walsh said, "I was reared in-door at my trade, and am not well able to work at labouring work."

The resident beggars are mostly natives of the town, but the strangers are the wives and children of Connaught labourers.

There are scarcely any beggars who are the children of beggars. When the children are old enough to be useful to the farmers, their mothers send them to work for support alone. Almost the entire have been reduced to beggary by misfortune. The resident beggars are mostly widows, who can get no employment. Rev. Mr. M'Loughlin says, "they may have acquired bad habits in begging, but in the beginning of their distress they would all work."

A woman with children can get at this season about three stone in the day, in summer about one, and as much of boiled potatoes as she and her children can eat. In town they get nothing but money; and George Reeves says, they get enough to be often drunk. In this town they get a great deal from passengers on coaches, who give to get rid of their importunity. Peter Williams said, "the constant sale of potatoes by beggars is a matter of notoriety; a woman in health, with two children, may safely calculate on being able to sell one stone a day, after receiving a sufficiency for her own family to use." This witness has kept a shop in the market place near 30 years where these sales are made, and he says that a considerable number of families depend on the regular purchase of the beggars' surplus, at a trifle under the market price.

As to whether the alms would be increased in proportion to the number in family of the applicant, George Reeves, shopkeeper, says, "I give but a halfpenny at a time, and make no difference; but as I do not give to every one, I prefer those with children; but the town beggars live a great deal better than many of the housekeepers. They are not the distressed people at all; the decent housekeepers, who are reduced by the fall of the times, and who will rather starve than beg, are most to be pitied."

When beggars obtain more food than they require for their own use, they very constantly sell it, and procure articles of clothing, but these in general are persons without families. J. M'Garry said, "I saw a man a few days since who works in the busy season, and begs at other times; he had a large bag of potatoes, perhaps three stone, and refused to sell them under the market price."

George Reeves says, "the town beggars drink as much whiskey as would support a family." The country beggars cannot save anything, and beg only during the summer, till their potatoes are grown.

The town beggars say they are unable to work; and as they are mostly all women, and when they obtain relief no questions are asked, as everybody knows there is no employment for them. The country beggars say their husbands are away at work, or sick, or dead.

The town beggars are dissolute, and are often seen drunk in the streets. They sometimes commit thefts, but are never engaged in outrage. They are not capable of such crimes, there being very few able-bodied men among them. These outrages are supposed to be entirely committed by farmers' boys. William Beattie, farmer, says, "I keep no boys in my house, as they would not consent to be kept in the house at night. If I locked them in they would run away."

It is often said that beggars hoard money, but not so often as formerly. G. Reeves says, "about two years ago a blind man died, near this town, and left his daughter 30*l.*

Beggars have in general four or five children. In many cases the family will not go out with them to beg through shame, certainly not when they are grown up.

A family of a wife and four or five children could support a man better by begging than he could support them by labour. They would be certain of enough to eat themselves, and some to bring home. The earnings of a labourer are very scanty. A person said, "I know many who get scarcely an average of one day's work in the week at 10*d.*; it is a miracle how they live. There is the strongest reluctance to beg, and when they are obliged to do so, the old persons, both men and women, are sent about, the rest remaining at home, and living upon what is so collected. Almost any person who lives in that way would prefer to work at any regular wages here."—(J. Bracken.)——There are many proud-spirited women too that will not go out to beg "a bit" for you.

The shopkeepers mostly give money, and the farmers potatoes and meal; and the beggars in general beg in town, and go out to the country to sleep.

There is no limit or fixed quantity of potatoes to be given to each beggar. The shopkeepers seldom give more than a halfpenny at a time. It is the custom of the shopkeepers to give their charity once a week, on Mondays. Mr. Mort Mahon says, "I give 5*s.* every week; they come on Monday morning; I give a halfpenny to each single person, and a penny to those with children."

The relief of beggars falls almost entirely on the shopkeepers and farmers. The houses of the gentry are shut; they may give charity at times, but the shopkeepers and the farmers must give constantly.

All the respectable shopkeepers would give considerable sums to be rid of the annoyance of beggars; their trade is injured by it; and the Rev. Mr. Gibson says, "that very many farmers would give a tax in preference to the present mode."

Street beggars mostly extort charity by their importunity; they will stand at the door until they get something, and will follow persons until they "pay" them to go away; this is the only reason that money is given to them, as these beggars are known to be mostly drunkards.

Glin says, the beggars are well behaved; some bad persons of course are among them, but they are soon found out; they must at least pretend to religion. James Ring, a farmer of 35 acres, says that he has been in the habit of giving lodging to beggars, and never had to complain of their conduct or language. I can only answer for them, he said, in my own house, "but I have never heard a creditable man find fault with them. If they are in a decent house, they know they must behave correctly in it."

With regard to the effect a house of industry would have in suppressing vagrancy, it is said they would be very reluctant to go in, but many of them would for a few months in the scarce season. They would prefer 3*d.* a day outside. James Dogherty said, "I would rather fast half the day than be confined."

Robert Walsh, cotton weaver, said, "I wish to God it was open to us now, I would readily go in. I could bear confinement very well, as my trade is an in-door one; and if I could walk an hour or two, I would be less confined than at my trade, as I should work very hard to earn 6*d.* a day by."

THE number of vagrants is about 150; they are mostly strangers.

Vagrancy, according to Mr. Brown, has been stationary during his recollection; according to Mr. Gibson, fluctuates with the price of provisions.

It is most common in July and August, owing to the extreme scarcity of food at that period. Vagrants are principally women and children, who wander about during the absence of the husband or father while seeking work at a distance, perhaps in England. But few able-bodied men are found among them: they are in general infirm; and few beg on Sunday who can earn their subsistence by labour during the week. Few families of labourers excepting Connaught-men beg; but a great part of the population of that district plant their potatoes, and go in search of work to distant parts of the country or to England, leaving their families to subsist till their return by begging. The wages thus saved pay the rent of the patch of potatoe ground, by which they are supported during the winter. But little distinction is observable between cottier tenants and small traders as to reluctance to begging. The former often wander, as mendicants, where they are not known. When going to work to England, they seldom beg their way.

Vagrants come principally from Sligo, Leitrim or Connaught, especially the latter, and are almost always inhabitants of country districts.

Very few are the children of beggars; these get employment as soon as able to work. The majority, at some period, have earned their subsistence, until reduced by misfortune. Very few adopt vagrancy from the facility with which they can obtain relief.

They may obtain about two stone of potatoes (Mr. Dowling thinks not quite so much) in the day, the surplus of which, above the quantity requisite for their consumption, they sell in the market, so that a sale of beggar's potatoes is proverbial.

The quantity given is increased in proportion to the number of the applicants, who are frequently different members of the same family. The infirm obtain much more than the able-bodied, who indeed seldom beg.

They frequently obtain more than they themselves require, and exchange the surplus (if they do not sell it) for spirits, tea or tobacco. They are miserably dressed, but usually provide shoes against the winter. They can save very little.

The usual plea put forward is inability to obtain work; but they sometimes foster rags, dirt, &c., to excite sympathy. They are not known, however, to produce sores on their body for that purpose, and very seldom resort to forged or stolen recommendations. It is not the custom here to take about children peculiarly afflicted, with insufficient clothing, to excite pity.

Vagrants are generally incorrect in their conduct and habits, but are not addicted to meeting together in the evening to smoke or drink, are never concerned in outrages on person or property, and seldom commit thefts or robberies. If confirmed in mendicant habits, they would not be willing to emigrate, and seldom go to a distance in search of work. They always behave very kindly to their children, but do not, except in rare instances, save, except perhaps for their funerals; this, however, was much more common formerly than now. They sometimes borrow children to excite pity, but have not been known to hire them.

The average number of persons in a family is about four. The mothers generally are young women, very few of them having been beggars when they married; indeed, beggars rarely if ever marry. Cases of absolute starvation are not known, but many perish from the slow but sure effects of want.

Able-bodied men cannot collect more by begging than by working. Mr. Dennis Kane remembered one who did, but this was a very singular instance.

No inquiry is made as to the character of the beggar, and the morals of the labouring classes are therefore necessarily injured by the prevalence of private charity. Those who begin from necessity, sometimes continue to beg from choice; but this so seldom occurs, that Mr. Dowling thought none begged except from necessity. James Flanagan thought that vagrants sometimes refused work or demanded exorbitant wages, but that these were strangers, and even with them such instances seldom occur. Beggars, however, become nice, and sometimes refuse potatoes, preferring meal.

The character of the applicant is never inquired into, nor is any distinction made according to it.

A night's lodging is frequently given by the labouring class, it being some object to them to obtain manure from the straw given as a bed; the principal motive, however, is benevolence. Clothing is occasionally, and potatoes and meal very generally given; milk frequently in summer, but rarely in winter. It is more convenient for farmers to give food than money, but the beggars, except when they have large families, prefer the latter.

Very few indeed limit the quantity of food, whether potatoes or meal, &c., which they give away. Both farmers and shopkeepers, during June and July, give as much in alms as would support an additional workman. They never, however, plant ground to distribute the crop among beggars.

The relief of vagrants falls principally on the farmers and shopkeepers, who are more exposed to annoyance from them than the richer classes. The poorer classes, indeed, both farmers and labourers, give much more in proportion than the higher classes; some witnesses say 100 fold more. Even those who are most reduced in circumstances themselves, contribute freely from the little they possess. Few applicants, however, obtain much more than they require

A farmer holding 10 acres may give away one day with another about the value of half a stone of potatoes; a small shopkeeper about 2*d.* per day. Few, perhaps, reduce themselves to actual destitution by their liberality, "but very many stint themselves to supply others."

Relief is generally given from motives of pure charity; importunity is sometimes tried, and occasionally succeeds. Were there any institutions to which beggars could be sent with a certainty of obtaining relief, they would generally be sent there in preference to relieving them at the moment. Fear of injury from the able-bodied has never been to influence the donor. "Farmers are not such fools," said the witnesses of that class, "as to give from dread of a beggar's curse."

Diseases are often spread by the habit of giving vagrants a night's lodging; but the morality, concord, or content of the labouring classes is not injured by the association thus caused.

Many who have long followed a vagrant life return to industry, few except the children of beggars forming themselves into a separate class of the community.

No punishments for vagrancy have been inflicted in this district; indeed, public feeling is strongly opposed to any severe measures, for its repression would necessarily render them inefficacious. Such repugnance, however, would certainly be removed by the establishment of a provision precluding all chance of starvation. Outrages have never been attributed to actual destitution.

There is no house of industry nearer than Dublin, nor would the poor go into any such establishment under any restriction of that liberty which at present they can enjoy.

"THE farmers," says the Rev. J. Booker, "are becoming worse; the cottiers can hardly sink lower; if there be any recent change in their condition it is for the better."

The present number of vagrants cannot possibly be ascertained, they neither have increased or decreased within recollection. Vagrancy is most common in June or July, owing to want of potatoes.

Those relieved in the neighbourhood are generally strangers; residents seldom begging near home, are mostly composed of females between 20 and 50 years of age, old and disabled men; the greater proportion go about in families. They are chiefly of the female sex, because men might get something to do, but women could not, though at low wages. Flax used to be grown and spun, and linen wove formerly; the cotton has turned it out; it used to employ the women and children; it is coming round again a little.

The wife and children of employed labourers and cottier tenants sometimes beg; the latter, after having planted their potatoes, do not to any extent wander about the country seeking alms; when they do, it is into parts where they are not known. Mr. Dalton says, he has been blaming them often for it. Persons engaged in small trade seldom come to want; mechanics would be less inclined to beg than those who have been cottier tenants. Very few disabled or unemployed servants do so, except when misconducted. None of the farmers of the parish have transferred their property to their children, and adopt a vagrant life. Those who go to work to England pay their way through this country.

Vagrants generally belong to mountainous parts of the country, and are mostly natives of rural districts; a great number of them are themselves the children of beggars, but yet a minority of the entire.

Increase of population is the circumstance to which those who have been reduced to begging generally attribute their misfortune; a line of life that a considerable number adopt, owing to the facilities with which relief is to be obtained; character for idleness or industry and general morality, not being inquired into.

An able-bodied beggar who is known, and conducts himself properly, would get sufficient one day with another, and sometimes much more than he could consume; very little is obtained from passengers in coaches, cars, &c. and not much at the doors of places of worship.

The quantity given is not always increased in proportion to the number applying; different members of the same family constantly, and with success, apply to the same person. Mr. Dalton says, "they often make three divides of themselves." More is given to the infirm and those who have families, than to the able-bodied, although the latter can travel a greater distance daily; for those who have children with them are considered the greatest objects.

When mendicants obtain more food than they require for their own consumption, they sell their surplus to procure tea, tobacco, and spirits, but less of spirits than formerly. Mr. Dalton thinks there is not as much drunkenness as there used to be; attributes this change in many cases to the savings banks.

The right beggar has a dress for begging; they usually beg under the plea that they are, and have been, in search of work; rags, dirt, and the appearance of being crippled are fostered, and often sores are supposed to be produced, for the purpose of exciting sympathy by the hardened beggars who attend fairs, &c. but not by the better sort. Have never known any other expedients resorted to; have heard that the exhibition of maimed and diseased persons in the highways, is frequently the cause of great pain and injury to women who are enceinte, but cannot say from actual knowledge.

Never knew those who have afflicted children to have refused to allow them to be taken into asylums.

Have often seen those who have such children, take them about in the wet and cold with ragged and insufficient clothing; thus rendering them more piteous objects, and therefore more beneficial.

Those who live by begging, supposed frequently to be of dissolute habits, meeting in the evenings at fairs to drink and smoke; are not often concerned in outrages on person or property, but thefts are frequently committed by them. "If there are too many shirts or stockings on the hedge," says Mr. Dalton, "who could blame them for taking a loan of one?"

Vagrants are not known to have been concerned in assassinations; they would not be trusted. The confirmed vagrant would not be willing to emigrate to America, nor has he ever been known to go to England or Scotland in search of work.

The degree of kindness shown by them to their children, the same as that shown in similar relations between the labouring classes.

Think it likely that beggars would lend money to one another; some laid by their earnings; have heard of from 5*l.* to 30*l.* having been hoarded. The children who travel with mendicants often belong to others, being borrowed, not hired (as they would rather consider themselves under a compliment for the loan, than part with the money) for the purpose of exciting compassion.

They frequently have large families; believe they marry earlier than other classes of the community. The number of illegitimate children greater than that amongst the labouring classes. Mortality amongst them not more than in other classes, mostly in towns; no cases of death from starvation ever heard of.

An able-bodied man could ordinarily collect as much, if not more, by begging than he could obtain by working, supposing him to be subject to the casualties as to work of a labouring man.

Those who give relief have but the slightest knowledge of the character of the applicant; think the prevalence of private charity is not prejudicial to the morals of the labouring classes; the great majority of those who can get work are disinclined to beg; and do not conceive that if idleness be not produced by it any ill effect can arise therefrom.

Vagrants are mostly persons who prefer the life of a beggar to that of a labourer with equal earnings. Very few take to such a mode of life in preference to remaining labourers. When work at the ordinary wages of the country is offered, they never refuse to accept it.

It is impossible to ascertain what one had already received during the day before alms are bestowed; the giver is often wholly ignorant as to his character.

They frequently get a night's lodging, and usually clothing amongst the poor, who shelter them oftener than others, because they cannot afford other charity. Relief is given chiefly in potatoes in seed time; a little corn; milk is extensively given by farmers, who prefer giving food to money, it being easier for them. Beggars prefer money unless when suffering from actual hunger, or when provisions are very high.

There is no fixed limit to the quantity given daily; some are mainly supported throughout the year by families on whose bounty they are pensioners; think some farmers and shopkeepers give as much away in alms as would enable them to maintain an additional workman.

The relief of beggars falls on a few of the gentry, but in general on the farmers, the latter of whom, together with shopkeepers, are more annoyed by them than the richer classes. The poor and working classes give as much according to their means as the wealthier; labourers possessed of half an acre of ground also give, although they cannot afford it; even those who have merely cabins share their meal with the mendicant.

More is frequently given to some than they require, from the impossibility of ascertaining how much each has already received; this, however, does not lead to waste of provisions, as they dispose of the surplus.

It is impossible to say the quantity a farmer, holding 10 acres of land, would give away one day with another; a small shopkeeper gives as much in money or food as would support an individual each day.

Instances sometimes occur of those who have been in the habit of relieving the distressed becoming in their turn applicants for relief, but do not know that the change is attributed directly to an excess of benevolence. Shopkeepers would be more disposed to give a regular annual sum than the farmers, in preference to remaining open to the annoyance of beggars.

Relief is given from the fear that the individuals applying are suffering from privation, and not from custom or fashion; it is occasionally extorted by mere importunity; religious feeling has a very powerful influence upon the donor; instances are very rare of relief being given from the dread of the beggar's curse, but the people fear it.

Believe diseases are often spread through the country by the system of giving a night's lodging to vagrants, and the association caused by it is injurious to the morals and habits of the labouring classes; they are often the means of originating, spreading, and continuing discontent by fabricating stories, and by tale-bearing.

Those who have long followed a vagrant life never return to industry, and ultimately become a separate class of the community.

No punishments have been inflicted for mere vagrancy in the district; there have been a few cases of confinement from a week to a month. Those who give relief are unfavourable to the execution of the laws relative to vagrancy, whilst there is a possibility of an individual perishing for want of food; in fact, under such circumstances, they never would sanction severe measures against vagrancy, either as to their wandering or asking alms; this repugnance would probably be removed if a provision were made that precluded the chance of starvation.

There is no house of industry or mendicity association in the neighbourhood, except the one in Wexford. Those who beg would not be willing to go into a house of industry, the food and lodging in which should be only equal to the food and lodging usually possessed by the labouring people of the country; any deprivation of liberty would be a most obnoxious condition attached to the giving relief. Private charity would continue, and the majority of those who give would be opposed to any legal provision. "Without compulsion," says Mr. Booker, "you can never have a poor law in this country." Mr. Stokes observes, that the feeling is very strong against any provision for the able-bodied; a legal provision would not be resisted, but evasion would be extensively resorted to.

Beggars have been known to refuse to enter a house of industry, and those who were in have been desirous of leaving, and have done so for the purpose of begging.

THE number of vagrants is not ascertainable. Captain Owen does not think that there is so much distress now as there was 10 years ago; and that general poverty has decreased within the last 10 years, which he attributes to improvements in trade and agriculture. Mr. Bolton thinks poverty is on the increase, that there are five in distress now for every three there were 10 years ago, and for every two in distress 20 years ago, there are now five.

Vagrancy is most common from the month of May to September, on account of the scarcity of provisions, and the want of employment during those months.

The vagrants relieved in the neighbourhood are for the most part strangers who come from Carlow and Kilkenny, and some of them from Dublin; of those strangers the greater number go about in families, composed principally of women, many of whom are widows and some unmarried. The men endeavour to find employment elsewhere. The persons asking relief are in general able-bodied, with the exception of the residents who are infirm. The wife and children of employed labourers do not beg in this part of the country, nor those of cottier tenants, while they continue to hold land; no cottier tenant after having planted his potatoes, is seen to go about asking alms; such a person is less likely to beg than one who had been ngaged in small trade.

Captain Owen believes that of mendicants a large proportion are mechanics, which he ascribes to the prevalence of dissipated habits amongst this class of persons, particularly the habit of drunkenness, which he does not think is decreasing. Cottier tenants are not known to go into parts of the country where they are not known for the purpose of begging; and there is no instance of any small farmer of an advanced age, having transferred his property to his children in order to adopt a vagrant life. None go for work to England.

The parts of the country to which produce generally belong, are those which border upon the county of Carlow, between Newtownbarry and Ross.

By far the greater number of vagrants are persons reduced to this state by casual misfortune. Few adopt such a line of life on account of the facilities which it affords of obtaining relief.

An able-bodied person would collect one day with another, twice as much meal and potatoes as would support him, and consequently by exerting himself for many hours in the day, he would obtain much more food than he could consume. Passengers in coaches, &c. give a good deal to mendicants, but nothing is given to them on Sundays at the doors or avenues leading to places of religious worship.

When a family of beggars apply for relief, the quantity given is invariably increased according to their number. It very commonly happens that different members of the same family ask and obtain relief from the same person.

In bestowing alms no great distinction is made between the able-bodied and infirm through age or accident. An able-bodied person unaccompanied by children seeking charity, would not obtain as much as one with children, though the former be able to travel farther in the course of the day than the latter.

When beggars obtain more food than requisite for their own support, they sell or exchange the surplus to procure tea, tobacco and spirits. There is a considerable system of barter carried on between the paupers and the publicans; the latter are in numberless instances unlicensed pawnbrokers; if the surplus food was exchanged for articles of real utility and comfort, as clothing or furniture, they would lose their means of exciting pity, and therefore they are obliged to seek for employment in habits of dissipation. It is not supposed that itinerant beggars lay up part of their earnings in summer to sustain them in winter.

The able-bodied generally beg under the plea that they are and have been looking for work, but cannot find employment.

Vagrants, unwilling to be decently clad lest they should not excite compassion, very often make use of rags and dirt, and affect the appearance of being crippled or diseased, and very commonly supposed to produce sores on their bodies in order to move pity. They frequently of late have had recourse to lying and recommendations forged or surreptitiously obtained.

Though there is no knowledge of a direct refusal on the part of vagrants to have their sores healed, yet there is reason to believe that they are not anxious to avail themselves of medical relief when it is in their power. The exhibition of maimed and diseased persons is frequently the cause of much pain and injury to women who are enceinte.

There are several instances of persons with blind, or crippled, or deaf or dumb children, having refused to allow them to be placed in the proper asylums; such refusal has been caused from the advantage derived from being accompanied by those objects when seeking relief. Persons possessing children so afflicted, but too often lead them about in wet and cold, with ragged and insufficient clothing, to make them thus objects of greater compassion and consequently of greater profit.

The habits of vagrants are supposed to be frequently dissolute; they sometimes meet in the evenings in towns and villages to drink and smoke, but they are never concerned in this country in the outrages upon person or property, and there are hardly any thefts or robberies committed by them. They have never been known to be guilty of assassinations; there have not been for a long time any such offences committed in this district.

Confirmed vagrants who have the ties of family connexion, would not be willing to emigrate to America, others would. The confirmed vagrant is never known to go to England or Scotland to look for employment.

Major Owen and Mr. Brownrigg state that there has been a considerable increase of emigration from this barony within the last two years. A few have returned from America, which they found not by any means equal to their expectations. Many emigrate from political motives; when once the spirit of emigration gets into a neighbourhood it becomes a sort of mania.

Vagrants show much less kindness to their children, and to each other, than the labouring classes do in similar relations. This, however, applies only to the professed beggar; the occasional beggars often share their earnings with others more destitute than themselves, but the confirmed beggars never do so. Very few instances are known of beggars hoarding their earnings.

It is by no means rare to find mendicants travelling with children that have been borrowed or hired, for the purpose of exciting compassion: they give from 2*d.* to 6*d.* a day for a child.

The number of children in the families of vagrants generally average from three to four. The proportion of illegitimate children amongst vagrants is much greater than amongst the labouring classes, for few of the vagrants are legally married. The mortality amongst them is not considerably greater than amongst the labouring classes: it is comparatively greater in towns than in the country, owing to the free use of ardent spirits. There is not known an instance of death from actual inanition.

An able-bodied man could sometimes collect more by begging than he could obtain by working, supposing him subject to the casualties as to work as a labouring man.

Those who give alms are entirely unacquainted with the character of those who ask them. Private charity, inasmuch as it induces idleness, is injurious to the morals of the labouring people: the pauper, who has never known any other mode of life than that of mendicancy, prefers it to that of labour with equal gains.

Labourers of every class have the strongest repugnance to begging. Mr. Bolton has known labourers to endeavour to support existence by eating weeds sooner than turn to begging. None take to begging in preference to remaining labourers. The trading beggars uniformly refuses work when offered at the ordinary wages of the country.

No endeavour is made to discover what a vagrant has already received before alms are given to him; and every day and hour charity is given to vagrants with whose character the giver is totally unacquainted.

A night's lodging is often given to vagrants by the lower classes of farmers and by cottiers. Mr. Bolton says, that the latter often give a night's lodging for the sake of the straw bed, which the beggar procures from a neighbouring farmer, and leaves behind him in the morning. It is usual to give clothes to vagrants: the chief relief given to them consists of potatoes and meal, to which may be added large quantities of milk given by the farmers, who always prefer giving food to money. Beggars would rather have money than potatoes, and meal than money.

There is no fixed limit to the quantity of food distributed daily to the poor, nor is there any particular quantity of meal or potatoes apportioned to each beggar. There are not many who are chiefly supported by families upon whose bounty they are pensioners. Some farmers and shopkeepers give as much in alms as would maintain two or three additional workmen. The shopkeepers in country towns and villages are not accustomed to give regular weekly allowances to resident beggars. It is a very common practice with small farmers when planting their ground, to plant an eighth part more, for the purpose of distributing its produce amongst the beggars.

The relief of beggars falls chiefly upon the farmers; small farmers and shopkeepers being more accessible to vagrants, are undoubtedly more annoyed by them. In proportion to their means, the poorer and working classes give much more than the rich; for not only the cottier, possessed of an acre or half an acre of land, but even the day labourers who have merely cabins, relieve the beggars.

From the difficulty of knowing whether a beggar has already received a sufficient quantity of provisions, many of them get more than they require, which occasions a waste of food to a considerable extent.

A farmer holding ten acres of land gives in meal, potatoes, &c. one day with another, to the value of from 3*d.* to 5*d.*, and a small shopkeeper gives about 6*d.* a day in food or money. It frequently happens that those whose means are barely sufficient to meet any emergency, such as the lateness or failure of the crops, have given charity so as afterwards to have been themselves left destitute. The feeling of charity has seldom reduced to pauperism a labourer, who, but for acts of benevolence, would have continued independent. Both farmers and shopkeepers would prefer giving a certain sum yearly to being subject to the constant annoyance of beggars, and the risk to their property by giving them encouragement.

Relief is given to vagrants in the belief that the individual applying suffers from privation, but it cannot be said to be given from any fear of actual starvation. It is not thought that relief is given, because such is the custom or fashion of the district; it is sometimes extorted from females by mere importunity. Religious feeling so far influences the donor, that though he knew the person applying to him for alms had the certainty of relief by applying to an institution hard by, a house of industry or mendicity institution, still he would feel himself religiously bound to give him some assistance; if the provisions in such an establishment were not approved of, or perhaps if they were not of such a description as would be popular amongst the poor themselves. Alms, though seldom given to able-bodied people from the fear of personal violence, yet are frequently given from the dread of the supposed evil effect attending the beggar's curse.

Diseases, particularly fevers, are very frequently spread through the country, by the custom of giving a night's lodging to vagrants. The giving lodging to vagrants, as it necessarily brings the labouring classes in contact with them, tends to vitiate the morals and habits of the latter; and vagrants are in the habit of originating and spreading discontent, by tale-bearing and false stories.

Those who have long led a vagrant life seldom return to industrious habits; they ultimately become a distinct class.

In this district none have been punished for mere vagrancy; persons of bad or suspicious character have been sometimes confined for a few hours. It is impossible that the punishments hitherto inflicted could have any effect in repressing vagrancy, nor does it appear probable that a person placed in the alternative of begging or starving, would be restrained, through the fear of punishment, from asking relief. As long as there is a possibility of an individual perishing for want of food, the feelings of those who give alms would be opposed to the application of rigorous measures for the repressing of vagrancy, and therefore laws for this purpose being against public opinion, would be wholly inoperative. However, Major Owen is of opinion, that the repugnance, on the part of those charged with their enforcement, enforcement, would be removed if a provision were made to obviate the danger of starvation, and that they would be supported by public opinion, in proportion to the popularity of the provision made. Captain Owen is opposed to any legal provision for the poor. Outrages are not immediately attributed to actual destitution.

Captain Owen says, that the people being easily satisfied as to food, clothing and other necessaries, would be unwilling to go into houses of industry, not from any indisposition on their part to work, but that in their mind the separation of families, or deprivation of freedom, would more than counterbalance the personal comforts enjoyed in such asylums. Captain Owen also observes, that the people are said to be very patient under suffering; and that the fact is, they deserve no credit for enduring what they do not feel to be privation.

Messrs. Owen and Brownrigg say, that in a great majority of parishes, there are not persons fit to form elements of the machinery for working any system of relief.

RICHARD DEVEREUX, esq., merchant, Wexford.—Rev. WILLIAM HICKEY, rector of Kilcoman.—Rev. GEORGE MURPHY, roman-catholic curate, Wexford.—J. E. REDMOND, esq., banker, Wexford.—CHARLES A. WALKER, esq., M. P., Belmount.—Mr. JOHN WALSH, general agent, Wexford.

THE number of vagrants in 1832, in the town of Wexford, was 600. Mr. Walker believed vagrancy to have increased during the last ten years, especially since 1832, when there was very great distress. Mr. Walsh attributed the increase to the operation of the Subletting Act, and the total failure of the oyster fishery. Both agreed that there are three paupers now for one 25 years ago. Mr. Hickey, however, believed the distress to be on the decrease.

The period at which vagrancy is most common is from the beginning of May until the end of August. The cause of this is the scarcity of food in the intervals between the old and new potato crops. Mr. Walker considered the stranger vagrants to be the most numerous. Mr. Hickey believed the numbers of the residents preponderate. Women with children are the more numerous class. The number of those who go about in families, and of those who travel singly, is about equal. There is a disposition to work, and a considerable demand for employment. Mr. Walker thought the vagrants were generally able-bodied; Mr. Hickey, with whom the other witnesses concurred, thought almost all of them were infirm or diseased. None who earn their subsistence by labour during the week are found begging on Sunday. Very few of the wives or children of cottier tenants or employed labourers beg. The number of cottier tenants who, having planted their potatoes, wander about seeking alms, is very small; indeed, Mr. Hickey considers the number of cottier tenants to have been much reduced by the clearing of estates. Cottier tenants are more likely to beg than those who have been engaged in small trades; the latter are seldom completely destitute; very few mechanics or unemployed or disabled servants beg; cottier tenants sometimes go into a distant part of the country and beg there. None of the small farmers have at an advanced age transferred their property to their children, and adopted a vagrant life. Very few go from this district to work in England; those who do pay their way.

The vagrants come principally from the counties of Carlow, Waterford and Kilkenny, and many come into Wexford from Enniscorthy; they resort from towns to the country, and from the country to towns.

The greater number have been reduced to vagrancy by particular circumstances, such as the death or sickness of the head of the family. Not many are induced to adopt this mode of life from the facilities with which relief is obtained.

A vagrant can obtain, one day with another, a sufficient quantity of potatoes and meal for his subsistence. Money or broken meat is more usually given in towns. In the country an able-bodied beggar might obtain more food than he could consume; in towns he would not be relieved. But little is obtained from passengers in coaches and cars, &c. No relief given at the doors or avenues of the churches.

The quantity given is increased in proportion to the numbers of the family. Different members of the same family rarely in the country, oftener in towns, apply successfully for relief to the same person. The apparent wretchedness is a fair measure of the relief given; the infirm obtains more than the able-bodied can by travelling further, since the sympathy of the people is more excited in favour of the former. A single man is best off.

Beggars, who have obtained more food than is required for their own consumption, neither waste nor give it away, but frequently sell or exchange it for spirits, tobacco or tea. The surplus is not applied to any objects of real utility, nor do they save a part of their earnings in summer to support themselves in winter.

They usually beg under the plea that they have been in search of work without success. Strangers assume frequently rags, dirt and the appearance of disease: this would not however be of any advantage to residents, whose imposture would be easily detected; it occurs principally in any case in towns and villages. Vagrants may possibly produce sores on their bodies to excite sympathy; for the same purpose, they are unwilling to be decently clad. The state of mind thus created is incompatible with morality. No instances have been known where forged recommendations were resorted to. The exhibition of maimed and diseased persons in the streets and roads is frequently injurious to women enceinte. A person lately deceased, well known in this part of the country, was a cripple from his birth, owing, it was supposed, to an injury of the kind. Those who have blind, dumb or crippled children have not been known to refuse to allow them to be taken to asylums for persons thus afflicted. Strangers frequently take about children afflicted in this manner in wet and cold, with insufficient clothing, to excite sympathy. Residents do not.

The habits of the confirmed vagrant are dissolute; those of the occasionally distressed are not. They do not meet in the evening to drink or smoke, and are not often concerned in outrages upon person or property. Strangers are sometimes guilty of petty thefts, principally of clothes; residents are honest. Vagrants have never been known to assist in assassinations. Some of them would be willing, if they had the means, to emigrate to America. When confirmed vagrants, they are never known to go to England or Scotland in search of work. Most of the witnesses agreed that there generally existed a mutual good feeling between the parents and children. Mr. Murphy thought there was much less affection among them than among the labouring classes. It is probable that beggars frequently share their earnings with those more destitute. They are known to hoard them, " and," said Mr. Hickey, " frequently leave money for religious purposes, masses, funerals, &c. but are strongly averse to the clergy knowing what they have while they live."

They frequently have large families; the average number of children is four or five. They marry earlier than other classes, and have proportionably more illegitimate children among them than the labouring population. The mortality among them is also greater, but very few deaths occur from absolute starvation.

An able-bodied man could sometimes collect more by begging than by working.

In most cases no inquiry is made as to the character of the beggar: " the people don't like to lose time." The prevalence of private charity is in no way prejudicial to morality, except in rendering persons callous. Some vagrants from habit would prefer their present mode of life to that of the labourer with equal earnings; others would not. None choose vagrancy originally in preference to the life of a labourer. The ordinary wages of the country are seldom offered to them. Strangers or practised vagrants would probably refuse. Residents or occasional labourers would certainly accept it.

It would be impossible to ascertain what a vagrant has already received during the day. Alms would be given to those of whose character the donor is wholly ignorant.

A night's lodging is frequently given; clothes seldom. The relief usually consists of potatoes, meal and milk. The farmers prefer giving food to money, but beggars almost invariably prefer the latter. " In some cases," said Mr. W., " they are almost thankless for food, and at the houses of the gentry have been known to refuse or throw it away."

The quantity of food given is scarcely ever limited; many vagrants are supported throughout the year by families on whose bounty they are pensioners. Shopkeepers and respectable farmers often give away as much in alms as would support an additional workman or labourer; the former sometimes give regular weekly allowances to beggars. It is not customary for farmers to plant small portions of ground, destining the crops for beggars.

" The protestant clergy," said Mr. Hickey, " contribute much more than their legitimate proportion." According to the other witnesses, the burden falls chiefly on people in trade. The small farmers and shopkeepers are more exposed to annoyance from beggars than the gentry; the poorer classes give more in proportion than the richer; potatoes are rarely, even among the poorest labourers, refused to the passing beggar.

As no inquiry is made how much the beggar has already received, more is given to some than they require. Such uncertainty does not lead to waste, as the surplus is sold or exchanged.

From the great difference in the value of land, no average answer can be given as to what quantity of meal, potatoes, &c. a farmer with ten acres of land would give away daily. In the barony of Forth, ten acres would give a comfortable subsistence; elsewhere in the country, the tenant of such a farm is a pauper. In small towns, 6*d.* per day may be considered a fair average of the sum given away by the shopkeepers. Charity is not carried to such an extent as to leave the donor destitute. It is probable that the majority of farmers and shopkeepers would prefer giving an annual sum to be freed from the importunity of beggars.

Relief is generally given from the fear that the applicants are suffering from privation: sometimes, because it is the fashion of the district; it is seldom granted to importunity, and never to the fear of violence. The donor would not feel bound to relieve the beggar if he could apply with a certainty of relief to any institution close at hand; it is never given through through dread of a beggar's curse (which would have a contrary effect), but often to the desire of obtaining his blessing.

Diseases are in a few instances propagated by the system of giving a night's lodging to vagrants. Mr. Hickey believed that beggars created discord and discontent by tale-bearing, &c.; Mr. Walker thought that those who propagated discontent were generally of a higher class.

Those who have been long vagrants seldom return to industry, but become a separate class of the community.

Suspected characters have been committed for various periods to prison, but none for mere vagrancy. Two cases occurred several years since of transportation for seven years under the Vagrancy Laws, but the persons were suspected characters. There is of course no fear, as there is no punishment. Public feeling is against the execution of rigorous laws regarding vagrancy, as long as there is a possibility of any one starving. The givers of relief would certainly not sanction severe measures, nor would such measures have any chance of being efficacious, being opposed to public opinion. If a provision were made precluding the chance of starvation, the magistrates would execute the law without repugnance, but would not be supported by the public feeling. Outrages are not attributable immediately to desitution, but is certainly one of the existing causes.

There is a house of industry in the neighbourhood; none are admitted to it but lunatics vagrants under sentence from the sessions, prostitutes, epileptic patients, and the aged and infirm, who are utterly destitute. There is no mendicity institution now in Wexford; there was, but it fell to the ground. Applications are never made by any who can support themselves by begging, or by any other means, for admission to the Wexford house of industry. The presumption thence seems, that as the food is much better there than can usually be obtained by the labouring classes, the vagrants would not accept such a mode of relief, unless some strong additional inducement were held out to them.

EDWARD COOKMAN, esq.—Rev. MICHAEL FENWICK.—JOHN NIXON NUNN, esq.—Rev. SOLOMON RICHARDS.—Mr. PATRICK WHITE, corn merchant.

THE number of resident mendicants in this parish does not amount to a dozen; but on the point of increase or decrease, there is discrepancy in the evidence. Mr. Cookman says there is a decrease, while Mr. White gives the following account, "the number is increasing; it is doubled within the last ten years; for one in distress twenty years ago, there were two ten years ago, and four now."

The particular season when vagrancy most prevails is from June to the end of August, that being the season when the supply of potatoes is scanty; the majority of persons in search of relief consists of strangers from the counties of Carlow and Kilkenny, and those generally are women and children, who are forced to beg, while the heads of the families are trying to get work; if they had constant employment, able-bodied men in the parish are not known to beg, nor do persons after earning in the week go begging on Sundays, nor are cottier tenants in the habit of planting their potatoes, and then going to seek for alms. Those who have been in trade seldom or never beg; labourers for the most part compose this class in the parish, and the case of disabled servants is very rare; there are, however, many men who go about the country, under the name of pedlars, who are in reality beggars; very few instances of cottier tenants going into distant places to beg; they are exceeding industrious; no cases known of old persons adopting a vagrant life, after transferring their farms to their children; and with respect to those who go to England for work, they are not known to beg, they always pay their way, and usually remain there.

The districts most productive of vagrants are the counties Carlow, Wicklow, Waterford and Kilkenny. They are seldom the natives of towns, chiefly from the country. The vast majority of vagrants in the parish are reduced persons, who usually attribute their misfortunes to the continuance of heavy rents, high rates and fall in prices. Few of them adopt vagrancy from its facilities of relief; nine-tenths are industriously inclined, and take to begging from necessity to choice.

The quantity which a beggar would obtain in the course of the day is much more than a sufficiency, more than he can consume of food. Their receipts are trivial from coaches and cars, &c. nor do they earn any thing in this parish on Sundays by begging at the places of worship.

The proportion given to vagrants is increased where a family of four or five applies; and it very often happens that a family will divide after being relieved, and apply again successfully to the same persons. Infirm people get more than the able-bodied, and likewise those with children more than those without them.

Beggars, when they obtain more than they require for their own consumption, usually sell it, and with the money obtain spirits, tea, tobacco and other things, under the impression that if they purchased better clothes, compassion for their wants might be lessened; and in this way they are driven to dissipation as their only enjoyment, never laying by for winter any of the earnings of summer. Vagrants have been frequently known in the parish to put forward the plea of having sought for work unsuccessfully; in many cases, too, they have fostered rags, dirt and the appearance of disease and being crippled, for the purpose of exciting sympathy; even they have been supposed to have produced sores for the same object. Certainly they are unwilling to be decently clad, lest they may not create pity; they have not been known to have recourse to such expedients as forged or surreptitiously obtained recommendations, but when dispensary tickets were offered, that their sores might be cured, they have been known to refuse them. These sores and disgusting exhibitions have in towns often caused great injury to women enceinte, but not in the country. Those who have children afflicted with blindness or any other calamity dislike sending them to any institutions, preferring to keep them at home for the purpose of exciting pity, and to render them more miserable objects, they take them in wet and cold with little clothing.

The habits of many vagrants in this parish are dissolute, and they have a custom of meeting in the evenings to drink and smoke, yet they are not often concerned in outrages on property or person; thought he extent of thefts committed by them was stated to be considerable, it was not known that they were concerned in any assassinations. As to whether a confirmed vagrant would emigrate to America, it was considered very much to be doubted, but they never go to England or Scotland in search of work. In their general conduct to their children they are kind, though they sometimes ill-treat them for the purpose of exciting compassion. Witnesses did not know of vagrants sharing their earnings with others more destitute, but beggars have been known to hoard their earnings.

Vagrants generally have large families and marry earlier than other classes, but have not more illegitimate children than among the labouring classes. The mortality is greater among them in towns than in the country, but no deaths from starvation take place.

Looking to the casualties as to work of a labouring man, it was conceived that a man would receive more by begging than by working.

Very little is known of the character of persons relieved by those who bestow; they seldom inquire as to the effect of private charity on the morals of the labouring classes; the result was not considered prejudicial. Few would beg if they could get work, and hardly take up such a life in preference to remaining labourers; nor do even beggars refuse the usual wages for work, if offered.

There is no caution observed against any imposition of the vagrant, no endeavours made to ascertain what he has already received in the course of the day, nor any trouble taken to know the character of the person to whom relief is given.

Lodging by night is given to vagrants, but not so much as formerly; and clothes are occasionally given to residents, but the relief is chiefly given in potatoes, meal seldom, and milk, the farmers choosing to give food in preference to money, though the beggar would rather get money.

There is no precise limit as to the quantity of food or money given at houses, but numbers live upon it; so that it was considered that both farmers and shopkeepers give a great deal more than would enable them to support an additional labourer. The shopkeepers in Enniscorthy are in the habit of giving from 1*s.* to 1*s.* 6*d.* weekly, and dividing it into small portions; this was considered a bad mode, as it brought many strangers to the town. There exists no custom in this parish among the farmers of planting potatoes intended exclusively for beggars.

The relief of beggars falls mostly on beggars; and the shopkeepers, too, being exposed to the annoyances of beggars, contribute considerably to a degree far beyond the rich in proportion; even those labourers who possess but an acre or half an acre of ground, give all they can, and the mere day labourer who has but his cabin, shares his meals with the beggar.

It generally occurs, from the impossibility of ascertaining how much a beggar has already received, that more is given to him than he may require. Yet the provision is not therefore wasted, for the beggar sells it.

Very little meal, corn or money is given by a farmer, but a man holding ten acres may give, on an average, a stone of potatoes in the day, but it is variable.

The shopkeeper, besides the weekly allowance, gives away enough in money and food to support one individual a day.

It often happens, that those who are themselves liberal are reduced, but it was not considered that their being reduced was referable to their liberality. As to the mode of giving, the shopkeeper would prefer giving a fixed sum, while the farmer would rather give double in food, from day to day, than a stated sum of money.

The causes urging to give relief were in general fear that the applicant was under great want, the importunity of the beggar in many cases, and a strong religious feeling; which feeling, it was concurred, would not operate if an institution for relief was at hand. It was not not supposed that fear of violence, or because it was the custom of the district, were influencing motives to give, though it was often bestowed for fear of a beggar's curse.

The spread of disease, the contamination of the morals of the lower classes, the increase of discontent by spreading and inventing stories, these were considered the results of vagrancy.

Those who are driven to vagrancy rarely return to industry, but for the most part ultimately end in a separate class.

Very seldom have any punishments taken place in the district for vagrancy; and when such a thing does take place, it is merely a punishment by confining for a few hours, which has no effect whatever in checking vagrancy, nor could the fear of punishment restrain a destitute person from begging when starvation is the alternative; moreover, the feelings of those giving relief is arrayed against such rigour, nor could they be induced to sanction such severity against vagrants, while an individual may perish from want of food. Such laws would have no chance of being efficacious; and it was the opinion of witnesses, that such laws would be opposed by public opinion, if the certainty of a comfortable provision were to be purchased by the loss of liberty and the separation of families. The shopkeeper would be in their favour, but the majority quite against them, if liberty was controlled. In one year of extraordinary distress, the people prevented by force the corn being taken out of the country, but this is the only outrage that is stated to have taken place in this district. They assembled in the town, unloaded the boats that were going off with the grain, but did not seize any portion for themselves, merely insisting on its being carried back to the stores.

There is no house of industry nearer than Wexford, nor in the opinion of witnesses would those who beg be willing under any circumstances to go into such institutions.

THE exact number of vagrants in this parish was not ascertainable, but vagrancy has increased here within the last 10 years, and is increasing both in town and country; in fact, it has doubled within the last ten years, and is considerably beyond what it was either 20 or 30 years ago. The increase was attributed by the witnesses in a great degree to the operation of the Subletting Act.

The period during which vagrancy is most prevalent here is from June to August, and the reason of this is, the scarcity of food at that season, and the want of employment from the end of hay harvest until the beginning of the corn harvest. The vagrants relieved here are generally strangers in summer, but in winter chiefly residents. In summer the heads of families go out in search of work, and their wives and children go about the county seeking alms; cottiers also, after planting their potatoes, are in the habit of going round the country seeking alms, and thus increase the numbers of mendicants both in town and country. In this district very few tradesmen or mechanics are reduced to beggary; and though servants, especially females, were often previously driven to begging, yet since the establishment of savings banks the cases have been much more rare. The labourers of this district do not emigrate, nor go in search of work to England, occasionally they go into the adjoining counties, and then, if they obtain employment, they always pay their way.

In this district vagrancy is rather adopted now and then in seasons of distress, than practised as a regular mode of life; and at such times many adopt it, as it affords great facilities of relief.

In general beggars obtain about as much food as is sufficient for subsistence; but an active beggar exerting himself during the day would obtain much more than he could consume. Beggars obtain a good deal of money here from passengers in coaches, &c., but get very little on Sundays from persons going to places of public worship.

Beggars in towns do not beg in families; in the country they do; and the quantity of relief given is in proportion to their numbers.

It is a common custom for beggars to separate the families and beg in distinct parties; the father and perhaps one or two of the children keep out of sight, whilst the mother and the remainder of the children try to make out what they can.

Beggars seldom waste their surplus collections, or give them to others more distressed than themselves; on the contrary, there is much jealousy between those of the same trade, and few instances are known where they have evinced sympathy for each other's misfortunes.

The practice of vagrants is openly to sell their surplus, and in this part of the country they purchase clothes, and frequently appear decently dressed on Sundays.

It has often been a subject of remark what becomes of the vagrant on Sundays.

Vagrants usually put forward the plea, that they cannot obtain employment, and the practised beggar assumes dirty rags and the appearances of being crippled, &c. to create sympathy, but this is not the case with the occasional beggars. In this district beggars have not been known to produce sores on their persons, and though disinclined to apply for relief in order to have their ailments cured, yet they are never known to have refused it. As was stated before, beggars here would wear good clothes if they got them, except perhaps the trading beggars.

Persons who have blinded or maimed children do not actually refuse to let them be taken into institutions established for their relief; there is, however, a reluctance, especially among the Catholic population, to send their children to certain institutions, where they fear their not being brought up in their father's creed. Beggars who have maimed children often take them about in wet and cold to make them cry piteously, and thus create commiseration for their wants.

Vagrants are in general of very dissolute habits; but they are not known to meet together for the purpose of dissolute carousing. There is too little community of feeling among them for any thing of that sort. They have not been detected either in many thefts, nor are they ever known to be concerned in any violent outrages, or to be parties to any assassinations.

With regard to the willingness of vagrants to emigrate, it appeared to witnesses that the confirmed vagrant would be unwilling to emigrate; but they added, it would be hard to say who is the confirmed vagrant, and who not; and as the means of emigration have never been offered to them, conjecture is all that can be had on the point. Perhaps the truth would be, that among the poor, the reluctance to emigrate would be in proportion to the confirmed habits of vagrancy.

The mutual affection of beggars and their children is about the same as among the other classes of the community. Beggars are not known to hire their children; but it is believed that they often lend them to one another.

Vagrants generally have large families of children accompanying them, and the proportion of illegitimate children among them is supposed to be much greater than among the other classes. There is a greater mortality among vagrants also, than among any other portion of the community, and more in town than in the country; but in this district a death from actual starvation was never heard of.

The knowledge of the character of those relieved is very trifling; in most cases there cannot be any, and would be utterly useless to inquire; so that the habit of indiscriminate almsgiving has a degrading tendency; though not to the degree that may be supposed when the injury of inducing habits of idleness is considered. Vagrants are in general persons who prefer their wandering mode of life to any settled one; yet originally they would have preferred to have lived as labourers, before they were driven to begging. Employment is seldom offered to beggars; so it cannot be said they would refuse it; in town they may refuse temporary employment, but not constant work. Mr. Dean states, "I have often offered beggarmen full days wages when they came to me, even late in the day, and though they seldom in words refused it, yet I never found that they would work."

A night's lodging is sometimes given to vagrants, but less in town than in the country; and even there the practice is greatly diminished, owing to the feeling among the better sort of farmers, that they are thereby doing themselves and their children more harm than the pauper good.

Potatoes chiefly, and meal and milk, constitute the relief given in the country to vagrants; money is more given to them in town, as the farmers in the country have no money to spare for such purposes.

There is no fixed limit as to the quantity given at each house, nor to the quantity given to each applicant; but witnesses were of opinion, that some farmers and shopkeepers give away in the course of the year as much as would enable them to employ two additional labourers. In town, also, there are a good many pensioners, supported by the bounty of particular families. It does not appear that there is a custom among the farmers of this district, of planting a portion of land with potatoes, especially for the beggars; a farmer usually plants as much ground with potatoes as he can manure, and it depends on the crop entirely how much he can afford to give in charity.

The relief of the poor falls chiefly on the farmers in the country, and in towns on the traders, as both these classes are more exposed to the annoying application of beggars than the richer classes. Even the very poorest labourers give the vagrant something, and are in the constant habit of sharing their meals with them.

It sometimes happens, that those who give too freely to vagrants in the beginning of the season, afterwards feel the want of the provision which they have given away. Farmers seldom attach a money value to what they give away in charity, from the difficulty of converting such provisions into cash. It was the opinion of the witnesses that those in town would would perfer a regular sum to the present mode of giving charity; but those in the country would not.

The Rev. Mr. Harman stated, "that in one season of great distress the gentry and farmers voluntarily taxed themselves, to an amount quite sufficient for all the poor." In reply to the question, why this system was not continued, he said, "it was necessarily abandoned when the emergency was over, from the impossibility of confining relief to residents. It is, however, far from certain that the farmers would be willing to pay a regular subscription."

The usual motive for giving relief to beggars, is the belief that the applicant is suffering great distress; and besides, there is a religious feeling about the necessity of relieving persons in want, which religious obligation, as witnesses think, would decrease in proportion to the certainty and extent of the relief to be voluntary. The fear of violence sometimes prevails over weak persons, and induces them to give alms; but the beggar's curse is not dreaded, though a beggar's blessing is highly prized by the peasantry.

Fevers are occasionally spread by the system of giving night's lodging to vagrants, and the morals of the peasantry frequently contaminated; so that, as the Rev. Mr. Harman observed, a man is thought badly of who gives a night's lodging to a vagrant; and in fabricating and spreading stories, "they are equal to a telegraph."

It seldom happens that persons who have for any time followed a vagrant life return to industry, but they usually become in the end a separate class of the community.

For the last ten years there have been no punishments inflicted for vagrancy. The magistrates have occasionally attempted to put in force the laws against suspected persons, or beggars who were suspected of extorting money by imposture; but, except in very few cases, the attempt proved futile. The feelings of the people in this district are strongly opposed to any rigorous measures against vagrants; and as to the abatement of such feelings, and the growing up of a desire to support rigorous laws if a provision for real want were made, witnesses thought that in town they would be more disposed to support such laws than in the country districts; but without knowing the nature of the provision, and the conditions that would be annexed to it, it must be useless to surmise concerning it. As the outrages arising from destitution, Mr. Harman said, "not hunger, but the dread of it, frequently leads on a man to crime;" and, he adds, "outrages, particularly those arising from the erecting of tenants, are supported by general opinion, and those who commit them are defended publicly both at the chapel and the forge."

There is no house of industry in the barony, the nearest is in Waterford; and as to the willingness of the poor to enter a house of industry, witnesses were of opinion, that the industriously inclined would, in some cases, accept it; but there would be the greatest reluctance, among the better class of the poor, to accept such a mode of relief; and if it were to be purchased with the loss of individual liberty, or separation of families, they would not accept it at all. In such cases, many of the magistracy would not be likely to enforce the laws against vagrancy. Those who did would have public feeling against them, inasmuch as charity would still be considered a religious duty by the mass of the community. Mr. Harman says, "that the separation of families and the obligation to work, would form the most unpopular conditions of a provision. That the people would not accept it, except by compulsion, and that the general feeling is against a provision of any sort."

OWING to the want of employment, vagrancy is certainly increasing in this parish; there are 50 in want now for one 30 years ago.

From May until August vagrancy prevails most, because distress is at its height then, from want of employment and scarcity of provisions. The great majority of those relieved in this neighbourhood are strangers, principally women and children, who go about mostly in families. The head of the family endeavours to get work, and the women and children are forced to beg.

Few able-bodied men are to be found begging, as there is a strong repugnance to giving alms to an able-bodied man; he has therefore no great temptation to beg in person. Very seldom do persons earning their subsistence by labour during the week beg on Sunday, and in this part of the country, cottiers are never known to seek alms; and though mechanics are sometimes reduced to beggary, yet those who have been engaged in small trade have but rarely sunk to such need as to be forced to beg.

A few instances have been known of small farmers having transferred their property to their children, and in their old age having adopted a vagrant life. But those who go to England in search of employment, never beg in this district; they always pay their way; but few go.

Carlow, Wicklow, Waterford and Kilkenny, are the parts of the country to which the vagrants who come here generally belong; and the principal portion of them are from the country districts.

The vast majority of vagrants have been reduced by misfortune. The continuance of heavy rents, high rates and fall of prices, are the causes to which they generally attribute their ruin. Fully nine-tenths of the vagrants are industriously inclined, but necessity drives them to begging.

An active beggar, exerting himself for a good many hours in the day, would obtain much more than a sufficiency of food; but there is but little collected from passengers on coaches, and nothing from the persons going to places of public worship on Sundays.

The quantity given to beggars will be increased if there be three or four applying in one family; and very often if the family be large, the members of it separate, and thus apply to the same persons with success. An infirm person will singly, more than an able-bodied beggar; but those with children get most, if they know their business.

Vagrants seldom give away their surplus food which they have collected; they sell it, and purchase spirits, tea, tobacco, &c., but very rarely clothes, for fear of lessening their means of exciting pity. Beggars also, in some cases, lay by in summer for the hardships of winter.

Vagrants usually beg under the plea of an unsuccessful search for work, and in many cases retain their rags and dirt, and assume the appearance of disease and of being cripples, for the purpose of moving compassion; they are likewise unwilling to be decently clad, and many have refused dispensary tickets, and rejected the means of having their sores cured, being anxious to retain the advantage of their exposure. Very frequently in towns, though not in the country, has the exhibition of those maimed and diseased persons been the cause of injury to females enceinte; and it is very difficult to induce beggars, if they have children crippled and deformed or blind, to send them to any public institution; on the contrary, they take them about with them, in cold and wet weather, to render them even more piteous objects, and thus more lucrative.

The habits of many vagrants are dissolute, and they often meet together to drink and carouse; and though they commit no violent personal outrages, yet the number of thefts and robberies committed by them is very considerable.

The confirmed vagrant is never known to emigrate to America, or go to England or Scotland, in search of work; his habits of idleness render work displeasing to him. In general, beggars are kind to their children; yet they sometimes ill-treat them, for the purpose of exciting compassion. It is not, however, known that they ever hire or borrow children.

Beggars have been known here to amass considerably. One instance was mentioned of a professional beggar giving 200*l.* as a marriage portion.

Vagrants have in general large families of children accompanying them.

As to whether an able-bodied man would receive more by begging than by labouring, it seemed that as a beggar he would not receive anything, "at least," (said Mr. Sparrow) "not from me."

Those who give to beggars have, in any case, very little knowledge of the character of those whom they relieve, and in general none at all. Vagrants, when once confirmed in their wandering life, prefer it to that of labourers; but originally they would rather have remained at labour if they could have procured employment.

A night's lodging is sometimes given, but less frequently now than formerly, and clothes are occasionally given to resident beggars; but the principal relief consists of potatoes and milk given by the farmers, who prefer giving food to money, from want of the latter, though the beggars would prefer money.

There is no fixed quantity daily given at any farmer's house; it depends entirely on the number of persons who happen to call, each beggar receiving some relief, so that many farmers give away in the year more than would support an additional labourer.

The relief of beggars falls principally on the farmers; they, as well as the shopkeepers, being more open to the visits of the beggar than the richer classes; but the humblest cottiers contribute their proportion, and even the mere day-labourer, who has but his cabin, gives towards the relief of the beggar.

As it is impossible to know how much a beggar may have received previously, more must occasionally be given in the course of a day to him than he immediately requires; yet this is not considered to lead to any waste of provision, as the beggars always sell the surplus.

The witnesses cannot form any exact calculation of the quantity given by a small farmer; but instances have been known where distressed farmers have severely injured themselves by giving to beggars; but it was not thought that giving charity was the cause of breaking down down their independence. The shopkeepers in general would prefer giving some small sum annually to the present mode of relief. Many of the farmers would not.

Relief is given through fear that the applicant is in great want, and by some because it is the custom of the district; but in general the people give alms from a religious feeling, and regard charity as a sacred duty. Relief is also frequently extorted by importunity and through fear of violence, and likewise from the dread of the beggar's curse.

Vagrants resting at night among the labourers have often spread diseases through the country, and by fabricating and disseminating stories, have in many instances produced great mischief, and by their dissolute habits have introduced much immorality among the labouring classes.

Persons who have for any length of time followed a vagrant life, rarely, if ever, turn to industry, and ultimately end in becoming a separate class in society.

Inasmuch as punishment would have but little effect in repressing vagrancy, it has seldom been used; besides, the feelings of the people are, and ever will be, under all circumstances, opposed to punishment for vagrancy, until some certain provision exists against destitution.

There is no house of industry in the district; but in the parish of Kiltumnel considerable funds exist, which are allocated in various allowances of from 1*s.* to 2*s.* 6*d.* a week.

If a legal provision were instituted for the poor, Mr. Goodwin thinks that the small farmers and cottiers would not like it. None but the practised beggars would accept it; and also, the laws could not be enforced quietly. But it was considered that were a comfortable provision afforded, such a one as would not on the one hand put a premium on indolence, nor on the other hand interfere too much with family ties, a large number would support the plan.

Mr. JOHN BLAKE.—WILLIAM GLASSCOT, esq.—JOHN ROSSITER, farmer.—JOHN USHER, esq.

THE number of vagrants in this parish is not exactly ascertainable; but there has been a decrease among them, both because many workmen have left the country, and there has been a great increase in agricultural employment.

From June to August is the period at which vagrancy most prevails, owing to the scarcity of food at that season, when families of strangers, mostly women and children, come here begging, their husbands having gone somewhere else in search of work. Sometimes also the cottiers, after planting their potatoes, go into distant parts of the country begging; but it seldom happens that when mechanics, or those who have been engaged in small trade, are driven to such necessity as to be forced to beg. From this parish very few go to England in search of work.

A great proportion of those who beg in this district are the children of beggars, and the majority are very idly-disposed, so as to be unwilling to adopt any means of industry.

Though beggars here do not obtain much money, either from passengers on coaches or at the doors of places of public worship, yet they get much more than a sufficient supply of food.

The quantity given upon any application for alms depends on the number of persons in the family who apply; and it is not an unusual custom for large families to separate, and then apply to the same persons successfully. An infirm person will obtain more than an able-bodied, but you seldom see an able-bodied man begging.

Vagrants sell any surplus food they may have collected, and obtain tea, spirits, tobacco, &c., but never purchase clothes, fearing their power of exciting compassion may be diminished if they were well clothed. Very few itinerant beggars in this parish are known to lay by in summer any small provision against the wants of winter.

Beggars often retain their dirt and rags, and assume the appearance of being crippled and diseased, for the purpose of exciting sympathy; but none except those who attend fairs for the purpose of begging are supposed to produce actual sores; neither are they known to refuse having their sores cured. It is a frequent occurrence to see beggars who have crippled or maimed children take them about badly clothed, in wet and cold, to move compassion more strongly.

The habits of the beggars in this district are not found too dissolute: even the number of thefts committed by them is very small, and assassinations are always the crimes of a better class of people. The confirmed vagrant never emigrates to America, nor could he be induced to do so; neither does he ever go to England in search of work. Beggars are sometimes known to amass considerable sums of money. Mr. Rossiter says, "one man, who was considered the most miserable poor man in the neighbourhood, left at his death 40 guineas."

The great majority of beggars have large families, but the witnesses considered that the chief portion of the children must be illegitimate, as the confirmed vagrant is never known to marry.

Few of those who give alms to beggars ever inquire into the character of those whom they relieve, so that the persons not in real want are sometimes those who receive charity, and thus the practice of private charity not unfrequently is the source of idleness. Although the confirmed vagrant would prefer the wandering life to one of industry, still few are found who at the outset would choose such a life to one of industry.

No effort is ever made to discover the character of those relieved, as indeed it would be impossible to ascertain it, so that relief is often given to persons to whose character the giver is an utter stranger.

A night's lodging is very often given to vagrants, but any thing in the shape of clothes is very seldom bestowed on them; the principal relief consists in potatoes and meal, and milk also is very freely given by the strong farmers, who prefer giving food to money, though, as Mr. Glascott says, the beggar would always prefer money, because they never are in want of food.

There is no fixed limit to the quantity given daily, so that many farmers and shopkeepers give more than would support an additional labourer through the year; many pensioners, too, are supported by clothes and money given to them by families.

The support of the poor falls for the most part on the farmers, and as they and the shopkeepers are more open to the beggars, consequently they are obliged to contribute more to their support than the richer classes; but the labourers cannot afford to give any thing worth speaking of.

As beggars frequently obtain more food than they actually require, it may seem to lead to a waste of provisions, but this does not take place, as they always are able to sell the surplus.

The quantity given by a small farmer could not be exactly ascertained, but they frequently give in the early part of the season to such an extent, as to cause inconvenience to themselves afterwards. The farmers in this parish would prefer paying a small annual tax to the present disagreeable mode of alms-giving. Mr. Rossiter says, " farmers holding 20 acres of land used, in times of great distress, to give two pounds voluntarily for a few weeks relief."

Relief is sometimes given through fear that the applicant is in great distress, and sometimes because it is the fashion of the district; but those who give from a religious motive would no longer feel it a duty to do so, if an institution were near where real want might be relieved. Importunity sometimes extorts relief, but fear of violence or of the beggars' curse has no effect here in causing alms to be given.

Diseases are often spread by giving a night's lodging to beggars, especially fever is often propagated in this way, besides much mischief frequently arises from the stories which beggars fabricate and carry about from place to place.

Persons who have long followed a vagrant life never are known to adopt any industrious course, but ultimately are sure to become a distinct class of the community.

There never has been any punishment inflicted here for vagrancy, nor would any be effectual except a very severe system, but against such punishment the feeling of the people is strong, nor could it be removed unless some very judicious plan of provision for the poor were devised.

There is no house of industry nearer than Wexford, nor is it known whether the people in a destitute condition would be willing to enter one, as such an offer was never made to them.

MR. HYNES, whose shop (almost the only one in the parish,) is situated at the meeting of the two principal roads, estimates the number of vagrants whom one would meet in the parish at this time of the year (December), at about 30. Of these, not more than two are natives, and permanently resident. All the witnesses concurred in representing vagrancy as having increased of late years, and Mr. Hogan said that he perceived the number of persons who came to these parishes in summer from other districts to be annually augmenting. Salmon exemplified the general growth of poverty, by stating that 20 years ago he would not see more that three or four persons collecting perriwinkles and limpets on the rocks at neap tides, and those were generally children doing it for amusement; but now, one may see them flocking thither in scores, and eagerly gathering them as an addition to their meal of dry potatoes. The acknowledged increase of vagrancy is attributed to the increase of a population which has no other means of subsistence than the tilling of land. The peasantry readily promise rents higher than they can possibly afford to pay for the smallest portions of land; of these, in process of time, they are dispossessed, after having run up arrears; and Hare, the carpenter, said that he knew that many of those who strolled through the country had come to begging by such a course of things. There is also much less employment than formerly; and Mr. Hynes observed that he found no difficulty now in procuring in the parish as many labourers as he wants in harvest time, while formerly at that season, his father used to be often obliged to hire them in Cunnemara, and to pay their passage across the Bay of Galway.

Hynes remarked that in July and August they had the greatest number of beggars, and he should say that for every one that was to be seen now there would be five at the least in those months; and the reason of this was clear, for then potatoes are getting scarce everywhere; work also is not to be had, especially in Connaught, where there is an abundance of labourers, and whilst the husband is looking for it, the wife and children go begging about from one place to another. Not one in 20 of those who beg from door to door are natives of the neighbourhood. This class of vagrants generally consists of women with young children; the husband often accompanies the wife, but he is unwilling to ask alms in person, and he remains after her in the house where they have got their last night's lodging, and in the afternoon he goes near to the place where he expects to be able to pass the next night. It is not usual to see old men or women among the regular vagrants, because, as Scanlan said, it was more in the course of nature that such people should beg; they are less ashamed of it, and therefore more apt to stay at home and ask alms of their neighbours; neither are there many young people amongst them, and certainly no young persons without children. The young men and women get situations as farm-servants, and it is not until they have children that poverty comes upon them and compels them to quit their homes. There are no beggars to be found begging there on Sundays. Mr. Hynes said that he had several labourers who get only 6*d.* a day, and he was convinced that none of them would allow their wives and children to beg; but there were many others who do not get two days' work in the week, and the wives of these are often compelled to ask for potatoes from those who know them. From all the witnesses, it could not be ascertained that more than three cottier tenants had taken to begging during the last summer; even these, however, had not done so the previous summer, and it was by no means a custom of any of them in the two parishes. Gilloghy, the weaver, said that, speaking from his own feelings, a tradesman would be more averse to begin a life of mendicancy than a cottier tenant, because having probably lived in better circumstances, he had never contemplated the possibility of being reduced to it. Hare also observed, that he has seen more mechanics of his own trade asking for alms latterly than hitherto, but that it was the practice of such people not to beg promiscuously, but to apply to some of their own body for assistance. According to Mr. Hynes, there were a great many cottiers in the parish holding as little as 2½ acres, but even if they had but one acre, he was convinced that they would not beg. Hogan stated that many instances were known of persons who had gone out to beg after having surrendered their farms to their children, but they have always been reluctantly driven to such a course, in consequence of quarrels and disagreements, which made their homes miserable, but no one was known to have given up their farms thus with the express intention of begging. No labourers ever go from this parish in search of work to England, but several go as far as the county of Tipperary for the harvest. O'Loughlin, the labourer, said that he knew four men who went there last August, and when they returned in October they were looking very miserable, and told him that they had worked for 2*s.* a week and their diet, near Thurles, and that they had not been able to bring back more than 4*s.* or 5*s.* along with them.

It may be said that vagrants come from Connaught in general, but more especially from Mayo and from the western parts of Galway. They principally, if not altogether, belong to the country districts. Scanlan, the schoolmaster, remarked that townspeople were very unwilling to adopt the system of begging through the country, because they are not able to get any money there, and, secondly, because they are not accustomed to carrying wallets.

Mr. Hynes observed that the proportion of vagrants who are themselves the children of vagrants, is very small indeed, except among the Mayo men, and vagrancy is so common a practice in that country, that the parents of most poor people have followed it at some period or other of their lives. The greater number, however, have occasionally earned their subsistence by industry, and the female vagrants almost always attribute their misfortunes to their large families. Many are supposed to have recourse to mendicancy under the pressure of temporary distress, who become afterwards indisposed to quit that mode of life when their necessities have ceased, after having learnt how much easier it is to live by it than by labouring.

Potatoes in this neighbourhood are plentiful, from the abundance of sea manure; so much so, that they form an article of barter for turf from the Galway coast, there being no fuel in the district they are in. An able-bodied beggar, it was thought, could easily collect four stone of potatoes one day with another in winter, and in most summers he would get at least a stone and a half in the course of the day. As he could not possibly consume more than one stone himself, as he often gets a share of the peasant's meal, over and above what raw potatoes he receives, it can scarcely happen that he is ever without some surplus. —(Salmon, a farmer.)——No public vehicle or conveyance passes within six miles of any part of the parish. A beggar is seldom to be seen at the roman-catholic chapel, the only place of worship in the two parishes.

If the family, consisting of a father, mother and three or four children, were to apply for relief, they would certainly get more than double what is given to a single person, but still not exactly in proportion to the number of the applicants; and therefore it is that vagrant families find it to their advantage to separate into two or more parties. This practice is very well known to the country people, but it is looked upon as a very venial fraud. As to the relative quantities generally given to the able-bodied and the infirm, it was observed, that at any given house the former would probably get less, and at some houses perhaps nothing at all; but still, as he is able to go about to a great many houses, and also to many places out of the road, to which the latter does not apply himself, he would in the course of the day have collected just as much as the infirm man, and sometimes more.—(O'Loughlin.)—— Both Scanlan, Hare and Serjeant Norton, of the police, observed that of all vagrants, the persons with the children had the worst trade of it, because though they usually have enough to eat, they rarely or ever have any surplus to dispose of; and the Serjeant said that five out of six of those who come to sell their surplus collections at the barracks are hearty men under 60; very seldom a man with children comes, and a woman with a family never, except one whom he suspected of being a prostitute.*

The chief object of the sturdy beggar is to collect for sale; his personal wants are soon satisfied, and everything else is carefully accumulated. With this in view, it is not unusual for a mendicant to have two wallets, and when he approaches a hamlet, he deposits the one that is full in a place of security, and after he has made his rounds with the other, he goes back for the one he had left. He then finds a purchaser for the whole, in some labourer who is without mock ground, or else in some person who, though no beggar, is far more destitute than himself. The money acquired in this manner is seldom spent in drink in this quarter of the country, but chiefly in tobacco, &c. The vagrant shows but little inclination to purchase any clothing except shoes, because, as Finn, the tailor, observed, he knows that if he was well clothed he would be suspected, in a place where he was not known, of not being so bad as he believed, of not being so badly off as he looked. Serjeant Norton stated that one fellow who had been in the parish for the last eight months, frequently brings eight stone of potatoes to dispose of; and yesterday, hearing the Serjeant ask for the change of a pound note, he offered him 13 s. in copper and the rest in silver. Winter is decidedly the best season for him who continues a mendicant throughout the year, as the potatoes are then plentiful, and most of the Mayo vagrants are at home at that time subsisting on the produce of their con-acre.

It is as frequent with those who ask for alms, that they have no land to live upon, and that they cannot get any work; they know that they are safe in making this assertion, because such is the number of unemployed persons in the parish, that no one will offer them anything to do.—(Hynes.)——The witnesses in general thought that even if the vagrants were inclined, they could not procure better clothes than they have, and that the place itself not being a thoroughfare, there was not much deception practised. Neither fairs nor markets are held in either of the parishes, and they are, therefore, in a great measure free from the visits of those notorious impostors, "the boccoughs," who are only to be found where alms are given in money, and who never give themselves the trouble of collecting food in a rural district. The five policemen who were quartered here were, however, successively imposed upon during the last week. One of them, of the name of Saunders, stated that two miserable-looking women came to the barrack, and told them that they were from the King's County, and that they had the dropsy. Some of the police were were from that county, and they gave them meat and some money. He afterwards came suddenly upon them in the ruins of the abbey, where they were washing their faces, which they had coloured with some kind of herb. They were stripped and were going to change their clothes, and he did not see a finer woman than one of them was; and they only laughed at him, when he upbraided them for their tricks. Mr. Hynes stated, that in other places they bring false recommendations to the gentry, in order to get money from them, but there is not a single gentleman residing in this quarter, and the poor give charity indiscriminately to all who ask for it. There is no dispensary or physician nearer than 12 miles, and there was, therefore, no opportunity of ascertaining whether vagrants ever refuse to have their sores and infirmities cured, from the assistance afforded to them thereby in exciting pity. It is not in the power of any one in the parish to afford an asylum to crippled or blind children, or to the deaf and dumb, but it was not thought that the parents would refuse to part with their children if there was any such provision for them. Deaf and dumb children are seldom seen here, but when they are, the parent cannot help keeping them with her when she is begging, be the weather ever so bad, as the peasant thinks it enough to give a night's lodging to such people, without taking care of strangers' children during the day.

The vagrants who frequent that part of the country are rather an idle than a vicious or dissolute class; and Serjeant N. stated that in the course of the four years that he had spent there, he had had but one occasion to apprehend a mendicant for theft or any other illegal act. There are no houses in the parish either to which they are in the habit of resorting for the purpose of carousing, as elsewhere, and indeed they have not the means of procuring drink. It was the general opinion that the confirmed vagrant would not be inclined to emigrate to America. No one from that part of the country goes either to England or Scotland in search of work. Mendicants in general have not been observed to be deficient in affection for their children. As to the point of their sharing their earnings with those more destitute than themselves, Salmon observed, that of late years there was no necessity for their doing so, as they all get enough to eat at least. With regard also to the fact of their hoarding their earnings, it was generally supposed that they were inclined to do so. An instance had been mentioned before of a vagrant who had accumulated a pound, and it was the opinion of those present that few able-bodied men who have no families are without some ready money, as they have always some tobacco. It was observed with regard to mendicants borrowing or hiring children, that it sometimes happens that in the case of where a grandmother resides in the house of a poor man, she is sent out with some of the children, while the mother takes out the rest. A suspicion of this practice arises from seeing young children with women too old to be their parents. It is not, however, thought that children were borrowed under the circumstances, and certainly they were not hired for the purpose mentioned.

Very few beggar women are to be seen with less than two children, many have more, and the number of children may safely be set down as the chief cause of their wandering life. Marriages seldom take place amongst persons of this class; but Hynes informed them that a large portion of farm servants are the children of such persons, and that as they have approached the age of 15 or 16 years, they have generally relinquished their idle habits and have sought employment. It is among the female servants of this origin that the greatest number of bastards are born; and both males and females, though nearly the poorest in the community, are remarkable to their propensity for early marriages. In the absence of any connected evidence of the relative mortality among vagrants, it would not appear that it is not greater than among the other poor and labouring classes, more especially from the fact that no beggar had died there at any time from the cholera.—(Norton.)

On Mr. Hynes being requested to compare the state of the labourer with that of the able-bodied beggar, he said that he had no hesitation in declaring the comparison to be in favour of the latter. "Revert," continued he, "to what you have been told with respect to what a beggar would collect in the day; remember also that the highest wages given here are 6*d.* a day, and that, with the exception of the men whom I myself employ, no man in the parish can find employment for more than five months in the year, and you will only be surprised that so many remain in their cabins and struggle on in their misery, when they could at least obtain a greater quantity of food by mendicancy." This was the general opinion; and O'Loughlin observed, that he had seen the beggar to whom he had given a night's lodging eating bread for his supper, whilst he and his wife and his family had nothing but dry potatoes.

No attempt is ever made to ascertain the characters of the persons who apply for charity; and Mr. Hynes was inclined to attribute the daily increasing amount of mendicancy to the promiscuous manner in which relief is given; and in fact the man who has once commenced begging must be very independent in principle indeed if he relinquish it for the precarious subsistence afforded by occasional labour, and yet few resort to it originally, except under the pressure of great necessity. Work has been offered to vagrants at the ordinary wages, and they have sometimes declined it, accompanying their refusal always with various excuses, such as that they are lame or sick, or otherwise unable to work. Others of them have accepted the offers of employment, knowing that it would not be given to them long, as there were so many natives without it to whom a preference would be naturally given.

No precaution is ever taken as to inquiring whether the vagrant has already received sufficient relief, and alms are never refused even to beggars about whom nothing is known.

In the country the mendicant finds his night's lodging in the first cabin where he may choose to ask for it. The inhabitants of villages are rather less disposed to admit strangers, and large families decline doing so altogether, but they never refuse as much straw to the wanderer as will make his bed by the fire-side of the peasant. It would be considered most inhuman inhuman to refuse it; and Mr. Hynes estimates that he gives away two tons of straw at least in this manner throughout the course of the year. Very little clothes are given to mendicants in this quarter of the country by the peasantry; there are but few large farmers there, and the small holders are in many instances not better clad than the mendicants themselves. The usual relief given consists solely of potatoes. In the neighbouring mountain parishes, however, where potatoes are scarce, and where the land is only fit for sheep feeding, wool is often given in lieu of food, and the Assistant Commissioners met beggars who had come from a distance to collect it in small portions, intending to have it spun on their return home into worsted for the purpose of making frieze to clothe themselves. Sometimes also, at the thrashing time, a handful of corn is given as alms, and at that time the mendicant is accustomed to provide himself with a small bag to carry what he gets, and he sells it afterwards. Milk is not much given, owing to the rocky nature of the soil; it is rather scarce even among the farmers. As to money, the small farmers could never give any, for the price of their grain and bacon is generally anticipated by their rents, and nothing remains with them but their potatoes. It is clear, however, that beggars would always prefer the money, from their anxiety to convert their surplus collections into coin as quick as possible.

During the winter months there is no limit to the quantity given; even at the poorest house every applicant receives something, and the difference in the amount of what is given away by a rich man and by a poor man is not to be measured by the number of those who get alms at their respective doors, but rather by the quantity given to each individual, the former always giving "a better alms," in the words of the mendicant. A poor man gives three or four potatoes, while the wife or servant of the small farmer will give a single or a double handful, or may be more, where there is a long family.—(M'Dermott.)——There is no person in that parish assisted throughout the year by receiving food or clothing as a pensioner on any wealthy family; but there is an old man and his wife of the name of Beattie, who had been in better circumstances formerly, who are relieved from the necessity of begging, by contributions received from a few of the upper class of occupiers.—(Mr. Hynes.)——The witnesses were of opinion that there was only one man in the parish who gives away anything near the value of an additional workman; this was Mr. Hynes, who, as a large farmer, and the only shopkeeper, contributes very extensively to the relief of the poor. Many persons, however, give quite as much daily as would suffice for the food of an able-bodied man, and even some give more.—(Salmon.)——But no one was in the habit of giving regular weekly allowances to beggars, nor was it the practice to plant specific portions of ground in order to appropriate the produce of them to the relief of the poor.

There is neither landlord nor any person of independent means residing in this or any of the surrounding parishes, the relief of the beggars therefore falls exclusively on the tillers and occupiers of the soil, and amongst persons of that class; the burthen presses with peculiar severity upon the holders of under 20 acres, who form the majority, and who give far more in proportion to their means than any others, except indeed the cottiers who live by the side of the main road; "and these," exclaimed Mr. Hynes, "are absolutely robbed by the shoals of mendicants in summer;" even those who have no con-acre give a little, and when potatoes are scarce, and they have none to spare, they yet assist the vagrant with a night's lodging, which is never refused.—(Scanlan.)

Where all are relieved without distinction, and where a single able-bodied man gets so much more than he who is impeded with children, it must happen that much more is given to some than is necessary for their absolute wants, but it cannot therefore be said that any waste of provisions takes place in consequence, for they are carefully preserved to be sold at the first opportunity.

There appeared to be much reluctance on the part of all the witnesses present to compute how much they were in the habit of giving away in alms; they did not wish to measure what they bestowed for the honour of God; and it was mentioned that it was a common saying, "that what was given away in charity never diminished a man's substance, and that his crops were often increased by it." Mr. Hynes, however, thought that there was no man holding 10 acres of land who did not give away from three quarters to a stone of potatoes one day with another, giving more when they are digging them, and less when they grow scarce, during the winter months and in summer. Scanlan observed that he knew several cottiers living about him, who during the scarce seasons needed as much as the beggars what they gave away during the year, and who if they had it back, would not be obliged to borrow potatoes on credit, for which they always pay an exorbitant interest. As to the giving of a regular sum annually, in preference to being constanly annoyed by beggars, Mr. Hynes, who is the only shopkeeper in the two parishes, said, that speaking as such, and as a landholder, he would much rather give a regular sum annually, if it was to exceed by a little the value of his present contribution, than be exposed to the perpetual annoyance of being obliged to give in small quantities to the daily increasing number of mendicants. Most of the farmers also who were spoken to on the subject, agreed with him.

Salmon, however, said he would prefer that matters should remain as they were; for that when he gives potatoes to beggars at his door, he has the satisfaction of giving them to those whom he likes, and that he is also saved the trouble of bringing them to market, which he would be obliged to do, in case a new tax were imposed upon him.

Scanlan observed that it seldom happens that relief is given under the idea that the applicant is suffering from immediate privation, but rather with the intention of preventing such privation. Much almsgiving, however, is thought to be actuated by the custom of the country; and it would appear, also, that it depends in some measure upon a religious feeling, which latter motive, though perhaps not uppermost at the moment of giving charity, is yet one from the contemplation of which the poor people derive much pleasure.—(Scanlan.)

Norton, the police-serjeant, was of opinion that fear of violence had not much influence in extracting charity, and as to the dread of the beggar's curse, that is daily decreasing; "for," as Salmon said, "a man would be ashamed to say he was afraid of a 'boccough,' and no other beggar would curse him."

Mr. Hynes, jun. stated that contagious diseases were not unfrequently communicated by beggars where they receive lodgings at night, and the Assistant Commissioners were able to trace two cases of small-pox to infection received in that manner. The moral injury inflicted by vagrants upon those whom a night's lodging thus brings them into contact with, is not thought to be very great in this remote part of the country, where vicious characters from the towns do not often penetrate; but there are a few old women, well known wherever they go, who are more than suspected of lending themselves to the amours of those who require their services, one of whom was implicated in a gross case of abduction which occurred in the neighbourhood two years ago.

Those who have long followed a vagrant life have never been known to return to industry. No vagrants have ever settled here, yet they are always looked upon as a separate and distinct class of the community.

No punishments for vagrancy have ever been inflicted here. There is not a single magistrate residing in this or the neighbouring parish, nor are any petty sessions held in the entire barony. The people there would never approve of the application of coercive measures for the repressing of vagrancy, unless some provision was made for those whom they look upon as destitute. Even those, however, who disapprove of instituting such a provision through the instrumentality of the laws, declare that they see no objection to a vagrancy law, if they were taxed for the support of the poor. There had been no outrages in the neighbourhood immediately attributable to actual destitution.

There is no house of industry in this county nearer than that at Ennis, a distance of 20 miles. Some of the mendicants who are old and infirm express no reluctance to enter into a mendicity asylum; but middle-aged vagrants to whom the question was put, invariably declared their unwillingness, on any account, to part with the power of roaming about freely on all occasions.

THE Assistant Commissioners requested some of the witnesses to count the mendicants residing in the parish, and Miers, the publican, said, that in Cruverahan there were three; in Ballymore two, and scattered up and down the parish there are about at least 15 more; making not less than 20 persons who live on the charity of their neighbours: and besides those, there is not a day in the week on which six or seven do not come asking him for alms that he never saw before. And Hurley, the shopkeeper, observed, that one day with another, he counts at least eight or 10 strangers going about begging; he also agreed with Miers as to the number of resident beggars; and indeed, the computation of this class by all the witnesses only varied from 15 to 20.

There was the most unaccountable discrepancy in the statements of the different persons as to the increase or decrease of vagrancy, and the causes of it. The Rev. Mr. Sheehy asserted that it had decidedly diminished, that there was more employment then than formerly, in consequence of the extensive reclaiming of lands, and that the people every day were getting more industrious. On the contrary, Hurley observed, that he saw much more beggars passing by now than formerly, and that many of his neighbours who used in their day to work hard are now forced to beg. Curray also remarked, that he had travelled the barony for the last eight or 10 years, and he saw two to one more than he used. The poor creatures are turned out of their cabins and their ground; their things are canted, and what have they left but to live on charity? Hurley remembered the time when they were paid 13 d. a day, and well treated; and now they only get 8 d. without diet, and that not regularly. Miers observed, that he was not employed more than half the year, and that he would be well inclined to work for 6 d. a day. When the meal was distributed during the scarcity a few years ago, the people worked cheerfully during a long summer's day for 3 d. without breakfast or dinner. Mr. M'Namara said he would undertake to have 2,000 labourers ready by the next morning to work for 6 d. a day.

Vagrancy is most common from the 1st of May to 15th August, but July is far the worst month; in that month those who have potatoes left, said Hurley, think it too much to feed themselves. The potatoes are then getting scarce everywhere; and it goes so far in this parish, that the priest is often obliged to tell the people from the altar not to give charity to strange beggars, for that it was enough for them to support their own poor. Though there are 20 persons in the parish whose only means of subsistence are alms, it by no means happens that each of these, or perhaps even one of them, calls on many individuals of the parish each day. Many of these resident mendicants are in some degree supported by their friends, and sometimes get as much in one day as will keep them for several; but by far the greater amount is given away to strangers; and Hurley said, that if they had only to give to their own poor it would be but little. Timothy Gorman, a small farmer, said, that he sees many days strong able-bodied fellows going about who would be able to work if they were willing; but the greater number of beggars are women, with, for the most part, three or four children; and he cannot help believing them when they tell him that they are widows, for out of 10 persons that would call on him, not more than one would be a single man, and he seldom sees even an old man. Sometimes he asks the women with growing-up children with them, why they do not send them to service, at a farmer's for instance, and they tell him they must keep them to carry about the young infants. The reason why the majority are women is, that while they are begging in one place, their husbands will be either looking for work or actually working elsewhere; but it is not the custom for labouring men belonging to that parish to send out their wives to beg, at least at home. The greater number of male vagrants are infirm old men; on the whole, however, the proportion of men to women is trifling. Very few are to be seen at chapel on Sundays, and those who do attend are not resident in the parish: some have even been known to have had work during the week. The Assistant Commissioners observed, that the practice of cottier tenants or employed labourers begging was very rare. They made many inquiries before they could discover a single instance of it; but at last Miers said, he recollected having seen two cottiers of that place begging in the neighbouring parish of Kilfidane; both were idle fellows, who were much given to drinking, but they still had decency enough to be ashamed to be caught begging at home. "There is Michael Nash," says he, "who has no potato-ground; he earns only 6*d.* a day, and has a wife and seven children to support on that, and I never yet saw any of them begging, and I am sure I do not know how they avoid it sometimes. There is Jem Daly, too, with a large family. He takes his own boat up to Limerick with turf, and for going and coming, and spending may be days in Limerick, while the wind is against him, all he can earn is, perhaps, 2*s.* 6*d.*; yet I never saw any of his family begging either." Gorman, the small farmer, said, "I know some men of this neighbourhood who hold two or three acres of ground, and who go off to the strong farmers in Tipperary or Limerick to make their harvest: they save what they can to pay for their 'mock ground' at home, of which the rent is from 6*l.* to 8*l.* an acre. I know no able-bodied person going off from this place to beg; but I know many who want employment sadly. I seldom see tradesmen begging; they are extremely averse to doing so in public. They often get petitions drawn up, and go about privately to gentlemen's houses; but they will not go to a poor man's house, they would be ashamed to do so." Servants, also, are rarely to be seen begging; they are more apt to set up a public-house, or some other little shop, upon what they have saved; and if they have not saved anything, they will try to begin on credit. When cottier tenants are driven to beggary, they are sure to go elsewhere; but in the course of nine or 10 years, Burke did not know of three persons who had gone to beg where they were known. Of the strangers who pass through, it is believed that many of them are in the possession of small pieces of ground at home; but that from the sterility of the soils, and perhaps in a few cases from illness, they have had resort to wandering about and living on charity for at least a portion of the year; that is, until their potatoes are fit to dig. None of the small farmers have been known to give up their property to their children for the express purpose of begging; and though many are alive who have resigned their land to their children, yet there is but one such person in the parish who has been reduced to mendicancy: this was a poor old woman of the name of Bridget King. On the death of her husband, she gave up eight acres of land, a cow, and a horse, to her son. He soon got married to a girl who brought him a fortune of 60*l.*; but she would not agree with his mother, and she forced him to turn her out on the highway. His uncle then gave the old woman a cabin; but such was the spite of the daughter-in-law, that she induced him to have it thrown down. The poor old woman has now nothing to live on but charity. The country people generally give lodgings for nothing to those going to England for work; but in the villages they are obliged to pay 2*d.* for their beds. They mostly get their victuals for nothing, wherever they go; and the Rev. Mr. Sheehy said that if they have any money, they generally hide it.

"The greater number of the strange beggars that visit Kildysart come from the county of Kerry," said M'Mahon, "and they are seen in crowds of a fair-day crossing the ferry between Cahircon and Spring Rice's Place, at Mount Trenchard; they pay nothing when they are coming over; but on their return (if they have made a good day of it), they give the ferryman 1*d.*, or some potatoes, if they have not collected any money; they are for the most part natives of the country." On the witnesses being asked how they could distinguish a countryman from a townsman, they said that they would readily know them by the latter wearing of gentlemen's cast-off clothes, and especially by their speaking good English; in the remote parts of this parish the English language is hardly if at all spoken, and many individuals are to be met who speak nothing but Irish.

Hurley observed, relative to the proportion of vagrants who are themselves the children of vagrants, "Joseph Nash came here begging with his two daughters; he took the fever and died. Michael Hallaran gave his children a cabin; and one of them since has had three children by several men up and down; and both she and her sister have nothing to live on but begging. These two women are the only grown beggars in the parish, who are also the children children of beggars. As to the strange ones, we cannot tell who they are." As to the different classes of vagrants, some have become infirm through old age; others are the widows of day-labourers who had not any ground; and a few have been pauperized by being turned out of their farms. Margaret Carmody, a middle-aged woman, whom the Assistant Commissioners met begging, accompanied by three children on foot, whilst she carried two infants on her back, stated, "that she never asked anybody for as much as a potato until about three years ago; up to that time her husband held a farm in Kilmurry, of M'Mahon, but he gave it up, and took another of about 10 acres, which at first had been vacated; but the first night they entered on it the Terryalts came, and after beating him in a dreadful manner and breaking one of his arms, they swore him to surrender the farm; he was then unable to get back his first farm, and since then they have had nothing to live on but charity." They afterwards met her husband, who was begging on the same road with two more children, and he confirmed her story, by giving the same account. Rev. Mr. Sheehy stated that he did not know one of the resident beggars who was able to earn his livelihood; but a great many vagrants pass through, who would be able to work if they were made. Halloran observed, that the beggars called on him the Saturday before; of these, six were women with children, and the other four were men; and of them, but one was a man, he would say, that was able to work.

Hurley stated, that at this time of the year (November), whilst the potatoes were digging, a beggar with two children will, after eating enough, have three stone over in the day; but times may be that he could not spare one stone; and in summer he would not get much more than he could eat. Those who travel the country are not able to carry what they get from one day to the other, they therefore sell it as soon as they can find a purchaser. Those who live in the town get as much in one day sometimes as will do for them for two, and they are then able to stay at home when the weather is bad; these latter collect much less in the end than strollers. Serjeant Scott, of the police, said, that he and his men were in the habit of buying the greater part of the potatoes they consume from the beggars, and that they find a great convenience, as there is no market in the village. Frequently one beggar has as much as 10 stone to sell, and that they cannot sometimes carry on their backs. They generally sell higher than the current price, taking advantage of there being no market. An able-bodied man would not get much more than he could eat; if he called at the house while the people were at meals, he would be asked to take his share; but they would give him nothing to take away, or at the most they would give him a little wool to make a pair of stockings. If he were to stop at a strong farmer's, however, he would not be allowed to boil any of the potatoes he had with him, but he would be fed whilst he remained. Gorman said, "I saw my wife refuse alms to a woman yesterday; and I asked her why she refused on a Monday (a thing we consider unlucky for the rest of the week); she said the woman had been coming to her for the last three days, and that she had a stout able-bodied son who would not work, but preferred living on the sale of what his mother collected." There is but one public car at Kildysart, and the beggars do not find it worth their while to attend it. Hurley observed, that he did not think that any beggars would get more than 3*d.* at the chapel; there were but two there the day before at last mass, and they did not get much, as the priest was making a collection for a family sick of a fever up the mountains.

Hurley observed, that they make a great difference between a large family and a small one, and he knew that the country people would often give a large family as much as half a stone of potatoes. He further added, "In the village we could not stand giving as much as some of the folks in the country do; we have more beggars calling, and we must decide as well as we can what we have to give them; but we always feel for a family of children." At the post-office, perhaps, 40 or 50 persons will call in the day, and every one will get something from that house. Those independent persons sometimes say, when they have not got enough, "May you not get over this day twelvemonths;" but most of the beggars pray for me, whether I give it or not, adding, "If you have not it for us now, you will have it some other time." The men who look sickly, and who are followed by the young children, always get most alms. It is not usual for beggars to divide their families into different parties in winter, when provisions are plentiful; but in a dear summer they often see them splitting (dividing); they will make one family into two and take different directions. And M'Namara said, "When we see an old man with a child, we suspect that there is a wife on some other road, or not very far behind; and it often happens that she will call some time after her husband; this is the kind of imposition most generally practised in summer; and when my wife discovers this, she refuses to give a second time." The best illustration of the feelings of the farmers upon the point of the relative quantities given to an able-bodied person and to an infirm one, was thus given by M'Mahon: "The able-bodied person I should not feel for; I would tell him (except perhaps in July, when the potatoes are exceedingly scarce for employed labourers) that he could turn himself to some employment; to the old person I should always feel well inclined, and may be if the children were at their meals, I should ask him to come in and sit down, and share it with them." Notwithstanding the above remark, all present agreed that, generally speaking, the following observation by Hurley would hold good: "I think the able-bodied man (not a young man, but a fellow of 45 or 50) would have most to spare at the end of the day. The poor woman with children, each of whom might have a bag, would collect most, but then she would require more for her own use, and that the able-bodied man would sell most."

He also added, "They always sell the surplus over what they want, and some of them make up the price of a handkerchief or a gown; but the men will buy tobacco or shoes. They come to me often to buy herrings, which sell for a halfpenny a piece, or 1½*d.* a couple; or or a grain of meal to make a drink (gruel) for themselves." Gorman observed, "There would be some respect for the person well clad who was unable to work, and I would like him the better for being clean in his person; but if he went into the mountain parts of the parish, the people there would say, 'By the law, he is better dressed than myself, and I will not give him anything.' I would tell him or her they ought to go to service sooner than beg." Serjeant Scott observed, that he frequently saw some of the old people who were known to the parish make themselves look as clean as possible; but he invariably observed that the strangers whom he met in the out-of-the-way parts of the parish were badly dressed, and too frequently unnecessarily dirty in their persons. M'Namara said, that the itinerant beggars do not require to save in summer, for they will invariably collect more potatoes in winter than they want; he has known them succeed in getting enough in winter to do for three days, during which they are often obliged to stay at home, from the stormy state of the weather.

M'Namara also stated for this subject, that the majority of the vagrants being women with children, do not find it necessary to represent themselves as unable to find employment, they generally say that they have been left widows, and claim compassion for their orphan children; others allege that they are quite unable to support their large families whilst they stay at home. However, when an able-bodied fellow begs, he is sure to state that he is unable to find work, and, unfortunately, as we have many hands unemployed at home, we are always unable to put him to the test by offering him anything to do. The Rev. Mr. Sheehy said, with regard to their fostering their wretchedness in order to excite compassion, that it was unnecessary for the resident beggars to cherish the appearance of being worse off than their abject poverty compelled them to be. It rarely occurs that clothes are given to them, but when they have been, he observed, however, that they were made use of, and that they even took care of them.* "I have never had any reason to suppose," said he, "that vagrants have produced sores for the purpose of exciting compassion; but about six weeks ago, a woman, the lower part of whose face was enveloped in a cloth, apparently saturated with a serous discharge, was very successful in collecting alms from the congregation as they came out of mass. In the course of the day I had reason to suspect that she was an impostor, from the rapidity with which she devoured a very abundant dinner which was given to her by a charitable individual. I had the bandage forcibly removed from her face, and she was found not to labour under any disease whatsoever. As a caution to the by-standers, I pointed out the deceit which had been practised on them, and I had the greatest difficulty in preventing them laying violent hands upon her." Mr. O'Grady said that few strangers come to this part of the country with recommendations either forged or genuine; sometimes what is called "a genteel beggar" will go about with a petition, to which those who give him anything attach their names, with the sums which they have given; and sometimes also a man who is known in the neighbourhood, and who has suffered any misfortune, such as if his cabin had been burnt, or his horse or his cow had been killed, will get a document drawn up to that effect, and will solicit charity, and generally with success, on the strength of his loss.

Doctor Geary observed that he never knew an instance of mendicants refusing to have their sores cured; pregnant women are observed to be much averse to passing afflicted and diseased objects of the kind. But though they frequently complain of suffering much injury from them, and express fears that "what they carry will be the worse for it," yet he could not recollect an instance where he had been able to trace mischief to such sights; nevertheless he thought them quite capable of producing serious harm in women of weak and irritable dispositions. No offer has ever been made in that parish to afford asylums for the blind, crippled, deaf and dumb children of beggars. Hurley observed that it was only a trick of town beggars to take their children afflicted in that manner about in the wet and cold. And Gorman said, that sometimes in bad weather vagrants have asked him permission to leave their children in his house whilst their parents went about seeking for provisions for them. He also stated that "there is a class of beggars distinct from common wanderers, who pursue their trade mostly at fairs, and travel about from one such place of meeting to another. They invariably appear to labour under some infirmity, and are notorious for their audacity, and for the lusty voice with which they proclaim their misfortunes. They manage to collect a good deal from the charitable; but the people are at length beginning to believe that they are for the most part impostors. Last fair-day we had a great many such characters; and the morning after I had occasion to be up at four o'clock, before it was light, and on the hill above the town I met nearly 20 of them, with their asses and cars, which they had left at a distance during the fair; and they were preparing to go off; and even at that hour some of them were drunk."

Most of the resident beggars are decent, well-behaved people, whom distress has reduced to their present condition. There are many thefts committed by strollers, and no later than last assizes, a Kerry woman, observed Serjeant Scott, with three or four children, who had stolen a blanket from one Patrick M'Auley, who had given her a night's lodging, was tried and transported for stealing some yarn, which she knew Mr. Scott of Cahericon sometimes purchased, purchased, and which she offered to him for sale. The quantity she offered excited his suspicion, so he detained her, and was able to trace the theft. Nevertheless common strollers are not observed in general to be a dissolute class; and he did not remember having seen any of them drunk. But those who take their stations at fairs are a most disorderly set, and have often fixed houses of call, at which they spend whole days in every kind of debauchery; and wondered how the people who knew this are such fools as to give them anything.

* Major Ross Lewin observed, that this remark did not apply to strange beggars, whose clothes were frequently patched in such a manner that there would not be one piece in them larger than a square inch, and would have the appearance of being put together in this ingenious manner in order to give the appearance of poverty.

The Assistant Commissioners were not able to learn that any kind of beggars had been concerned in outrages on the person, but it was generally suspected that they acted as carriers of intelligence for those who took part in the Terryalt disturbances. Miers observed, that they would be the last people in the world that would be willing to emigrate; they find themselves comfortable enough at home without the trouble of working. The common vagrant is never known to go to England in search of work. Mr. Sheehy stated that the greater number of vagrants whom they see in Kildysart are persons bred up in the country, and he never observed any remarkable degree of unkindness in them towards their children; he could not however help thinking that a woman or man is fond of their children, when he sees them on a hot summer's day carrying two or three of them on their backs, besides what potatoes they may have collected. It is not thought that beggars are disposed to share their earnings with one another, on the contrary, their constant endeavours and anxiety to acquire are little calculated to dispose them to give away without a consideration what they have had considerable difficulty in obtaining.

Miers, Gorman and Hurley observed, "We have an impression that one class of beggars do hoard, namely, sweeps and tinkers, for whilst they are working, their wives are begging, and between them they must save something."

Rev. Mr. Sheehy said, "Last winter I was on a visit with a brother clergyman in Wexford, and he delivered into my hands the sum of 70*l.*, which had been given to him by an old beggar-woman on her death-bed, in order to be forwarded to her son, who was a poor idiot living on charity in the neighbouring parish of Ennis. This old woman had been in want of something to drink on her death-bed, and would not consent to procure it for herself, saying, 'that she was without a penny.' He gave the money to her son, but he has since understood that he has been duped out of it by his depraved associates in the town."

Gorman observed, that many old women go through there with infant children that cannot possibly be theirs from their ages. If there be an old grandmother, however, in a distressed family, she will be apt to take the young children to beg whilst the son and the wife remain at home. "Last summer," said he, "a woman passed through with six children, two of which, being young twins, she carried in a blanket behind her; we afterwards however discovered that she had borrowed these from another beggar-woman who was unable to travel, having sprained her ankle, and who was confined to a man's house who had taken her in through charity." Most beggars have large families; very few are to be observed without children, however they may come by them. Single persons rarely appear in the character of mendicants, and it cannot therefore be ascertained whether the recklessness produced by vagrancy tends towards early marriages. Mr. Sheehy stated that he had married but one beggar couple during the last five years, and both the parties were old. Many however of this class apply to him to marry them, but he is very cautious in complying with their requests, lest he should be accessary to their committing the crime of bigamy, otherwise he would be rather disposed to encourage their early marriages, in order to stop promiscuous concubinage, for he had much reason to suspect that most of the children of strange mendicants are illegitimate. Hurley observed, that previous to fairs he generally sees a great many hearty young women coming into town, who pretend to be begging for charity, but he knows them to be of bad character, for he sees them after it is dark walking about with young men. The mortality among beggars has not been observed to be either greater or less than in the ordinary classes of the population; they generally live better than the labouring man, and vagrant beggars have in many instances attained a great age. Miers stated, that "this time last year a beggar-woman came here, and she was suddenly taken sick. Biddy Kennedy took her into her house, and gave her everything she wanted; and when she died a small collection was made for her among the neighbours, and she was buried as decently as any person could be. She had plenty of candles burning at her wake, and the priest charged nothing for the mass he said for the repose of her soul."

It was agreed on all hands that the condition of the labourer with children was inferior to that of the able-bodied beggar with a family, but if alone, the able-bodied man would not get much by begging. Hurley said, "I know there are many labouring men much worse off than beggars. Now, there are Michael Nash and John Miers, and Moran and Honigan, hard-working, industrious men with large families, and many calls upon their 6*d.* a day. They have to pay rent for their cabin and 'mock ground;' they have to buy a quart of milk, or may be some kitchen for their herrings, none of which the beggar has to do. He gets his lodgings free; he gets potatoes more than he can eat, and milk too; and when he sells his potatoes, he has money to buy whatever he may want. There cannot be a doubt but that the man who is independent in spirit, and stays in his cabin, has hard work sometimes to live." M'Mahon said, "A poor man would surely collect more by begging than by labouring. We see the beggars come in sometimes twice a day to sell their potatoes; there is one of them of the name of Lillis, who goes about with his wife who is blind, and we see him frequently selling three or four stone of potatoes at the scales, sometimes even seven or eight stone. I bought three stone from him myself to-day. Yesterday morning I saw a beggar cleaning the scales and balancing them, to see that he did not lose by the bargain. I hear the small farmers and labourers often say, when too many beggars call on them, 'By God, my my honest woman, you are better off than ourselves.' In short, destitution is not to be sought for among the beggars."

It is seldom attempted to ascertain the character of strangers, as they pass by but once. It would be impossible to rely on their statements.

M'Namara said, "that private charity has not been observed to produce very ill effects on the morals of the labouring population." As the greater number of vagrants are infirm through age or disease, it would be difficult to ascertain whether they would prefer mendicancy to a life of labour with equal earnings; as for the women, what they could earn by industry would never equal what they could collect by begging. Able-bodied vagrants are in general decidedly lazy; when work has been offered to them, they have made all manner of excuses, such as they are going to the salt water to bathe, or that they were returning from it, &c. They are disinclined to accept work, because if they were known once to do any, they would cease to be considered objects of charity.

Such a precaution as inquiring into the characters of applicants is never taken. Alms are given indiscriminately, without asking any questions.

It seldom occurs that a wandering beggar is able to obtain a night's lodging gratuitously in the neighbourhood of the village, or in the country; he would be more likely to be received by a labourer or by a cottier than a farmer. In the village itself a vagrant seldom asks for lodging, because he knows he would not get straw to lie on there. Many of the resident ones pay 3*d.* or 4*d.* a week for their lodgings. Clothes are seldom given to beggars, except by the upper classes, and relief of that kind is exceedingly limited in that parish. M'Cabe observed, that the parish priest will sometimes give a shirt or some other article, and to deserving objects he sometimes gives a suit of new clothes.

The usual form in which charity is given is potatoes; hardly ever is meal given, even at the houses of the more wealthy.

Hurly observed, that almost every beggar carries a tin can; and in the summer, when milk is plenty, most people give it to them. In the winter this can serves to contain broth, cabbage, &c., and it is seldom to be found quite empty. Farmers prefer giving food to money, because they have not the latter so readily; very little is left after paying the rent. Gorman observed, that most of the transactions in that district, between the labouring classes, were carried on without the aid of money, merely by the exchange of labour. Rent also, in many cases, was paid by giving work for it, for which a very low rate was allowed. Miers said, "that it was indifferent to the beggars there whether they got food or money; they would rather prefer food there, because as there is not any market they cannot strike their own bargain for the provision." Serjeant Scott said, "You will seldom see a young woman with children selling her potatoes; it is generally the middle-aged, who have left off their work, and can scold and wheedle. This kind it is who generally sell to the police."

It did not appear that in any house in the country parts there is any limit to the number who shall receive alms, except perhaps in the cabin of the very poor man, whose store may be run out. Hurly said, "In the interior of the country, where there is not such a fall of beggars as here in the village, they give to all; but here the people are sometimes tired out of all patience, and often refuse towards the latter end of the day; the strong man, who can go up into the mountains, gets the most in the long run." M'Namara stated, that if a woman with a large family came, she would probably get a double handful; but if a single man comes he certainly will not get more than one handful, and sometimes perhaps not even that. There is not an individual in the parish who owes his entire support to any one family or person; but there are several who are in the habit of receiving an occasional meal at the houses of the charitable.

M'Namara said, he gives away, in the course of the day, quite as much as would support two additional workmen; but as potatoes are but 1½*d.* a stone, not as much as would amount to the hire of an additional labourer. Gorman and others agreed in this statement, making the same distinction between the amount given and its value. Gorman added, that he had heard many farmers complain of the constant interruption to which their women servants were liable from beggars, without at all adverting to the quantity distributed. Hurly said, that the shopkeepers in Kildysart were not in the habit of giving regular relief; they are on a very small scale, and the relief given by them in kind does not often pass a small bit of tobacco, or perhaps half a herring or a grain of meal.

Burke, the baker, said, that without any doubt the burthen of the beggars fell upon the small farmers, shopkeepers and labourers, because that class are more numerous and more in the way of being applied to. It presses more heavily on those in the vicinity of the village than those far off in the country. John Murtagh, a beggarman, said, that he would sell his chance of all he could get in the week from great gentlemen for 6*d.*, but that he never comes away empty-handed from the poor. M'Namara said, that a labourer of his, of the name of Kelly, lives opposite to him. "When this man is digging his potatoes," said he, "I see him throwing them into the open sack of the beggar, without even looking to see what was in the bag before. I am sure at that time of the year he often gives a stone to one person, and if the beggar humours him, perhaps two." Even the labourers possessing no "mock ground" (con-acre), and who are obliged to buy their potatoes, never refuse alms; however, it is more usual for such classes of persons to exercise their charity in giving a night's lodging to the wanderers, a practice to which the upper classes of farmers are becoming every day more disinclined.

If the wants of a beggar are to be measured solely by the quantity of food which he can consume, it may safely be stated that all get as much as they require, and the greater number get more. Serjeant Scott said, that in six cases out of 10 they are able to sell something, and that there were more waiting often at the police-barrack gate than the men can buy from. It cannot be said that provisions are wasted; they are sold, and the money thus produced by them is all the beggar in this rural district has to purchase anything.

It is thought that there is scarcely a 10-acre farmer in the parish who does not give away, one day with another, nearly a stone of potatoes; in the season for digging them he often gives away three or four stone. M'Mahon said, "We do not set much value upon what we give during the winter, but in summer we are hard set for it ourselves; if six or seven sets were to call on me I could not give them less than a stone, or a stone and a half amongst them." The shopkeepers present agreed that they gave away about 2*d.* a day in food and money. As the people give in small quantities each day, according to the number of persons who call on them, they are able to check their hands when their stock falls low, or when they have reason to fear any scarcity. The general opinion of the farmers with whom the Assistant Commissioners had an opportunity of conversing, and still more extensively among the small shopkeepers of the village, was, that it would be their interest, and that they would save considerably by making a fixed annual payment, and by being freed from the present influx of beggars. They would be still more disposed to such payment were they assured that it would be devoted solely to the relief of their own poor, who constitute by far the smaller portion of those who seek their bounty. Some said, that their only objection to such a mode of provision for the poor was, the probability of a misapplication of the funds levied; and they added, that they would rather continue to dispose personally of what they thought proper to give. Finnacune observed, "I would rather have the dividing of it myself, to see that those persons who wanted it got it; I know how it would be if we were taxed."

The fear that the individual seeking relief may be suffering under privation cannot often, except perhaps in summer or in scarce seasons, be the motive which induces the giver to accede to his request. Such an idea would be often checked by the appearance of the full wallet of the mendicant. The real motive is religious feeling, continued and supported to a considerable extent by habit, and by the custom of the district. Many of the labouring classes assured them, however, that the motive would cease as soon as any sure sources of relief were opened to the vagrant. "Under such circumstances," said the Rev. Mr. Sheehy, "I would think it my duty to dissuade my flock from almsgiving. Females," said he, "may be sometimes terrified into giving charity by a sturdy beggar when alone in the country, a class of vagrants which is gradually disappearing, and whose curse would not frighten a child now-a-days, though some people think a great deal of his blessing."

"When beggars are refused," said M'Namara, "though they may be sulky enough, they seldom persist in their demands; and still less have they ever given reason to think that they ever had recourse to violence, in revenge for a refusal."

As to dissemination of disease, Dr. Geary said, that a kind of tetter or running sore had frequently been propagated by beggars; and he has repeatedly known it to have arisen in that parish from intercourse with beggars, who in the poorer houses are admitted not only to the same room, but often to the same straw bed as the inhabitants. The dissemination of fever and small-pox is of frequent occurrence where vagrants have been lodged; and amongst mendicants they find those mischievous individuals who contribute to the spreading of small-pox, by innoculating with the matter of that disease.

As to the influence of strollers on the moral condition of the labouring classes, it is not very pronounced in this rural parish, where persons of that kind are rarely harboured for more than one night.

There is no reason for supposing that a confirmed vagrant ever will return to industry, but it is presumed that many of the poor cottiers who come there in the winter return in summer to the tilling of their farms. M'Mahon observed that mendicants ultimately become quite a different class; and that if a beggar had 20*l.* to give his daughter, he would not get her a husband, unless another beggar. Rev. Mr. Sheehy considered that this remark only applied to the confirmed vagrant, who becomes notorious throughout the country, and in his old age degenerates into the "boccough."

Parishioners have never been indicted in Kildysart for vagrancy, and it is much doubted whether the laws as they now stand would authorize it, except where the vagrant has been guilty of some crime. Both Mr. Scott and Major Ross Lewin agreed that it would be inhuman, and indeed nearly impossible to put them into execution, unless there were more alternatives offered to the beggar; if there were such a support in a workhouse or otherwise, they say that there is not any reason to suppose that they would meet with any difficulty in putting repressive measures into operation; and they add, that they have reason to think that the exertions of the magistrate in this respect would be seconded by the feelings of the people, who would soon see the advantage of being relieved from a source of imposition and fraud. Wandering beggars are often detected in petty larcenies, but they are not the class amongst whom destitution exists. Major Ross Lewin did not recollect a case of outrage attributable to destitution. There are no houses of industry nearer than Ennis, a distance of 18 miles. There was the most decided unwillingness expressed by the beggars to become inmates of a house, where the food and lodging should be equal to what they usually get. They are all impressed with the idea that severe and harsh measures enter into their ordinary discipline. The Assistant Commissioners represented to many that they would be provided with an abundance of what is now their ordinary food, and that they would have a warm house and a fire to stay by, instead of wandering about as at present. However, as a mendicant is never without enough to eat, they could not find that the additional comforts held out as inducements were sufficient to tempt them to consent to the loss of their liberty. This reluctance has been in some respects produced by the exertions of a dissolute woman who, having been once in the Limerick workhouse, seizes every opportunity of inveighing against the treatment she received there. They discovered that she had been turned out of it for misconduct.

ANDREW CLANCY, farmer with 100 acres.—Dr. COSTELLOE, of the dispensary.—Rev. ANDREW DAVORAN, protestant rector.—MICHAEL HEHIR, innkeeper.—JOHN KEANE, a farmer of seven acres.—MATHIAS KEARNY, an extensive farmer.—Rev. P. M'GUANE, roman-catholic curate.—JOHN MAGUIRE, blacksmith.—DANIEL M'KNIGHT, weaver.—THOMAS MOLONY, blacksmith.—F. G. MORONY, esq., J. P.—Mr. MORONY, postmaster.—MICHAEL MURROUGH, farmer of 11 acres.—PATRICK MURROUGH, land surveyor, and a farmer holding 10 acres.—JOHN OWENS, grocer.

THE opinions of several witnesses taken at different times almost entirely agreed as to the number of resident beggars. The Rev. Mr. Macguane and the Rev. Mr. Davoren both said that they amounted to about 15; and Mr. Kenney, an extensive farmer, estimated them at about one to every ploughland in the parish, that is, about 20; but he added, that there is not one to the ploughland to which he belonged, that of Freagh, a deficiency, however, which is made up by the one in which the town of Miltown Malbay is situated. Some persons were disposed to attribute the very perceptible increase of vagrancy during the last few years, to the clearing of lands on the estate of Lord Egremont in that neighbourhood; but on investigation, the Assistant Commissioners found, that though the operation of this system had been productive of abundant misery, none of those who have suffered under it have at least as yet betaken themselves to mendicancy; but it was the general opinion that many would eventually be forced to it in the coming year, when they shall have spent the trifling sum that was allowed to them on their being dispossessed. Mr. Kenney, Mr. Macguane and others, said, that the increase of vagrancy had, during their recollections, and they were old men, kept pace with the increase of population, while the amount of employment has in some manner remained the same, for many persons now, from the low price of agricultural produce, are obliged to employ less labourers than hitherto, and several small farmers now till their land with the assistance of their sons and family, who used formerly not to engage in manual labour at all.

In summer the number of vagrants is considered to be increased at least tenfold, as compared with the winter months, partly because when potatoes become dear in the interior of the country, the beggars flock to that quarter, as being a place where that article is cheap, and more plentiful in consequence of the abundant supply of sea manure afforded by the coast; and partly, said Molony, because Miltown being a bathing-place much resorted to, the number of those who came from a distance to live upon the charity of its visitors, keeps peace with the growing number of these visitors. "I know," said Hehir, the innkeeper, "several instances where poor persons have come here begging from distant estates, in order to get some relief from their landlords, who spend some time here bathing in summer." Mr. Clancy said, that by far the greater proportion of the mendicants are strangers; he should say that there were at that moment upwards of 30 strange beggars rambling about the parish asking alms; but if there be one in summer, there are at least 300. This computation appeared reasonable to all present. Some of the poor of that quarter, from a disinclination to be seen begging at home, go away to beg at remote places; but that was not the case that year, as potatoes were very plentiful. Mr. Clancy remarked, that at least two out of every three of those going about were women, chiefly above 40 years of age, nearly all of whom had children; very few men have children with them, except they be in company with their wives; they find it more profitable to travel singly. As to the causes which have sent most of these people thus upon the world, one must depend in a great degree on their own assertions, as they are for the most part quite unknown. The women often say that they have been reduced to poverty by the death of their husbands, or by having lost their lands, or else that their crops have failed, and that they are only begging for a time. The husbands of many of these are known to be seeking employment elsewhere, but are able at least only to find it occasionally. Those present agreed in thinking that full one-half of the mendicants in that district were able-bodied persons, and applied the remark especially to the females; but it was admitted in extenuation, that there was little or no employment for the latter, by which they could subsist at home. There is very little begging in the country generally on Sundays, because most of the houses are shut up, the owners being at mass, and "boccoughs" are only to be seen in the towns on that day, as other beggars would be sure to meet their neighbours. Nothing but a year of unusual scarcity ever compels the wives of employed labourers or cottier tenants to beg in that part of the country; the exceptions to this remark were very rare; and Keane, the small farmer, said, that there was not one such in the neighbouring parish of Kilmurry and Ibrickane that year, though there were one or two instances of it the year before. As for the cottier tenant himself begging, an instance had not been known of it since the year 1822. Not one in twenty of those who came begging there was supposed to be a mechanic or tradesman. There had not been any opportunity lately of forming any opinion as to whether a cottier tenant or small tradesman would feel most reluctant to commence begging, as none of the latter had been so far reduced; but some one present stated that he knew several journeymen weavers, who many times during the last year have not had enough enough to eat oftener than three times in the week, whose spirit would not allow them to ask for as much as the loan of a stone of potatoes, though there were many who would have given them with pleasure. As to disabled or unemployed servants begging, it was observed that there were but few male servants at all in the parish; the Population Returns of 1821 having given but five of all ages. There were none now begging who come under that designation. Murrogh, the surveyor, observed, that of late years there was no inducement for cottier tenants to go elsewhere to beg, because there was no place where they could find food more abundant than there. However, the wives of many cottier tenants came there that summer from the neighbourhood of Nenagh to beg, where they said the potatoes had failed, and were as high as 4*d.* a stone. As to the transfer of property by old men to their children, it was observed that small farmers, as they became advanced in age, and incapable of attending to the cultivation of their ground, generally transfer it to their children, with the reservation of a greater or less portion of it for their own wants. The old people continue to live with the last married child; but in many cases domestic quarrels arise, and they are at length obliged to have recourse to a mendicant life. However, they were unable to ascertain more than one instance where a father had voluntarily surrendered the support derived from his family, and had become a regular mendicant, and this person finds a beggar's life so easy, that he refuses to return to his family, many of whom are settled in the parish. Very few labourers, if any, from that quarter go as far as England in search of employment; but many go to look for work in the summer to the province of Leinster, and return after two or three months' absence, with from 10*s.* to 12*s.* saved, and these are specially appropriated to paying the rent of their "con-acres;" they are generally young men who act thus, and it was not thought that they beg upon their road.

Tipperary is decidedly the country from which most beggars come, particularly that part of it which lies to the north-west of the "Galties," and is called "The Golden Vale." They cross the Shannon at Killaloe, where the counties of Clare and Tipperary meet, and disperse themselves in all directions. Many other strollers have their permanent places of abode in the neighbourhood of small towns, where distress and the process of the ejectment system had driven many from the country parts. The city of Limerick also sends some of its inveterate beggars, whose faces are often recognized by the citizens of that town when they come there to bathe in the summer season.

There is but little reason to suspect that many mendicants are the children of mendicants: the small number of persons in the prime of life who are seen following that trade, leads at least to the conclusion, that few have followed it without interruption from their childhood. It may be possible, however, that some may have been thus reared, when the number who have been reduced to a state of mendicancy at one time or another is taken into consideration. The greater number of vagrants are females, and it is considered that their husbands, if they be widows, had in most instances been more or less dependant during their lives on labour or on ground, and that the loss of the ground and the insufficiency of it to support a large family had reduced them to poverty. As for the male paupers, they are few who are not past their labour. Mr. Macguane said that he did not think that many adopt this mode of life originally through idleness, but he was convinced that several of them having satisfied themselves how easy it was to live well by it, continue it much longer than the existence of the circumstances which first led them to adopt it.

The amount which an able-bodied beggar could collect one day with another is entirely dependant on the season of the year. "At present they are digging the potatoes," said Kenny: "I have no doubt such a man would have four stone in his wallet at the end of the day; but there are many days in summer, especially in scarce seasons, when, including what he consumes himself, he would not raise more than a stone." Mr. Clancy observed that this remark applied chiefly to able-bodied vagrants, whether male or female, who had children; for if alone, and young, they are not much pitied. There are, however, many of 60 and upwards, who, though not strictly able-bodied, are yet strong enough to travel a good distance in the course of the day, and to carry a good lot in their bags. These latter are the most successful as to the absolute quantity collected. It follows, therefore, from what has been just observed, that as a stone of potatoes is more than any man not employed in labour can consume in the 24 hours, there is no beggar, particularly of the description last mentioned, who does not get as much as his personal wants require. Upon this question being put, John Byrne, a labourer, exclaimed, with a laugh, "By God, master, if you ever look for an empty belly, you had better not go among the beggars to look for it, but among the like of us." Mr. Hehir said, that he has heard some beggars express a regret that they had no chance with the public car which runs from Miltown Malbay, as it leaves too early in the morning for them to attend it. On its return, however, in the evening, it is followed by the resident paupers, but they are not often successful in getting anything. Very few beggars are to be seen at the chapels on Sundays. "We think it quite enough," said Murrogh, "to be giving on week days; besides, as we never give money, and cannot carry potatoes about with us, there would be very little use in asking us for anything then. If we have any halfpence we put them into the poor box."

The duty of giving alms almost always falls to the share of the woman of the house or her daughters, and their feelings are in favour of those who have families of young children. Still the increase of the quantity given does not bear an accurate proportion to the number of the applicants: what would be given to a family with children, would perhaps be double that given to a person with one child, but would not be doubled or quadrupled if there were three or more. Molony, the blacksmith, observed, that his wife was in the habit of giving more freely to the beggar with a family; that when many call, such a person is always sure to get the best "maun" (alms), whilst if a single man came, she should only throw him a small handful. As to the different members of a family separating and going in different directions to beg, it was observed that beggars were well aware of the benefit of this system from experience; and in order to avail themselves of it, the father and mother often go different ways, each taking two or more children, if their numbers will allow it, and ultimately collect more than if they had remained together. This practice is well known to the inhabitants, and is scarcely looked upon as an imposition. It might be at first supposed that an infirm or aged person, from his inability to travel to any great distance, would at the end of the day be much worse off, as to quantity collected, than the able-bodied man; but such is not the case, for, next to the woman with many children, he is the most pitied, and seldom meets with a refusal. On the other hand, the able-bodied fellow is often told that there is nothing for him, and though his numerous demands may ultimately procure for him as much as the other, yet he has to travel further for it, and to endure more fatigue. Mr. Macguane said, that both these descriptions of persons have more reason to be satisfied with their calling than the poor women with young children, for they are both observed to have some surplus to dispose of, while the other has hardly more than sufficient to satisfy her own wants and those who depend upon her.

When a beggar has collected more than he can consume, it by no means follows that he will waste it or even give it away, for he never fails, when he arrives at a village, to find purchasers for it; and many poor persons who have no con-acre to furnish them with potatoes, consider it a great convenience that they can procure a small quantity from him. The vagrant sells his surplus without any concealment, and is often to be seen at the public crane weighing it out to those who want it. The money thus acquired is usually disposed of in the purchase of clothes and other necessaries. Maguire, the blacksmith, observed that beggars decidedly enjoy better food than the majority of those who relieve them; for whilst the labouring man is confined to potatoes during the entire year, with the exception of very few festivals, "I often see beggars," said he, "sending in their children to the baker's shop opposite me to get loaves;" they seldom buy tea, but they are never without tobacco; and two or three of that class, when questioned on that point, allowed that, one day with another, they spent at least one halfpenny a day in procuring it. Resident beggars, whose faces are known to all, never show any disinclination to wear comfortable clothing when it has been given to them; but, as Kenny observed, "they are seldom tempted." Clancy also said, "As to anything of a good article, I do not think the strangers would wear it; they often get good cast-off clothes from the gentry who come here in summer, and I know that they mostly sell them." Still this unwillingness to be decently clothed only proves that they think by being in such a condition they would cease to be objects of charity. It does not, however, indicate any general tendency to dissipation; for as far as inebriety is concerned, they were assured that it was rare to see any of them drunk. Mr. Davoren observed, that the smaller number of beggars in winter arises not from those persons having saved anything in summer (as the reverse is more likely to be the case, that is, saving in the winter for the summer), but because, with the cessation of the scarcity and high price of potatoes late in the autumn, the temporary causes which have driven many to mendicancy also cease. "At any rate," said Clancy, "if they were once used to collecting, they would care very little for the short black days of December."

Vagrants do not find it necessary to have recourse to any deceptive measures for exciting sympathy when they solicit alms from the peasantry or farmers; those classes are always willing to give that which alone the beggar seeks from them, namely, potatoes. There are a few vagrants who give themselves out as distressed tradesmen, who are rarely observed to ask for charity, except where they think they will get money, as at gentlemen's houses, or from travellers, &c. Murrough said, "The mere country beggar comes up to the cabin door, and, standing on the threshold, he puts his children forward, and asks for something for the honour of God." It was not suspected by any of the persons present that sores or deformities are ever produced or simulated for the purpose of exciting sympathy; but they said when any one, by natural causes, became afflicted with any striking infirmity, it afforded a temptation (which was seldom resisted, if the person was in a state of poverty,) to make it an object for appeal to the pity of the public; such persons profit accidentally by their ailments, and become a distinct class of mendicants, called "boccoughs." They are well acquainted with the days on which fairs are held, and portions of almanacks containing such information have not unfrequently been observed in their possession. To such meetings they resort in great numbers, and they dispose themselves in the various roads leading to the town, and proclaim their woes in voices that generally indicate anything but delicacy of health. These also never look for food, money is their object; and Dr. Costelloe observed that they were a serious annoyance on market-days to pregnant women, and are sometimes even malicious enough to frighten horses by suddenly protruding their crippled limbs in a crowd. The practice of innoculating with the small-pox matter prevailed very generally in that quarter, and they were not therefore surprised to hear that there were a few cases of blind persons, both young and adult, in the parish; but those are not to be seen begging as often as might be expected, for persons of this kind turn their attention either to the bagpipes or the fiddle, and they have a complete monopoly of the music at wakes, weddings, and other merry meetings; and in this manner, if they chance to be good performers, they pick up a very decent, though rather precarious, livelihood. The Assistant Commissioners were unable to discover any trace of that cruel practice which has sometimes been detected in towns, of beggars wantonly exposing their children to cold and wet, in order that their cries and the misery of their appearance might excite the compassion of the passers by; on the contrary, beggars in this rural district are not observed to be deficient in affection towards their offspring.

Mr. Davoren, the protestant rector, and a magistrate, observed that the resident beggars are not to be considered as a dissolute class, and that an ordinary vagrant had not been brought before him under the imputation of any crime, during a period of 20 years. These remarks, however, did not by any means apply to the "boccoughs," who are notorious for their habits of drunkenness, and their frequent and successful attempts at fraud. One or two houses were pointed out in the village of Miltown where these persons are known to meet in numbers, both males and females, on the evenings of fair-days, and where they spend the nights in debauchery and gambling the gains of the day; they carry packs of cards about with them, and often entrap the unwary countrymen at thimble rigging and other low games. Mendicants have been sometimes suspected of stealing potatoes, but not often; there is little need of resorting to such means, when they are so abundantly supplied by the charity of the peasant. "Such thefts," said Clancy, "are more likely to be committed by distressed labourers who are out of employment, whose stock of mock potatoes is exhausted, and whose spirit will not allow them to beg. When such losses have occurred to me, my suspicions have generally fallen on that class of people." As to emigration, there was little reason to hope that the confirmed vagrant would be induced to adopt it. There is a remarkable reluctance on the part of the peasant to do so: either he is ignorant of the advantages to be obtained from it, and impressed with an unusual dread of the dangers of the sea, from having constantly before him on the coast of the county of Clare the prospect of a furious ocean on which no vessel larger than a canvass "corrack" or canoe is ever seen, except when on the verge of shipwreck. Out of 80 heads of families, lately dispossessed by the orders of Lord Egremont, on the lands of Freagh, not one was found willing to take advantage of a free passage out, and of a grant of land on their arrival. The confirmed vagrant is never known to go to England in search of work. In answer to a question as to whether beggars share their collections, Molony, the blacksmith, observed that there was a jealousy among the depraved class of beggars above mentioned which prevented their doing so with the money they had gathered; and that as to the others, who usually receive potatoes as alms, there is no necessity for their doing so in ordinary times, but that in scarce seasons he has seen them do it. It is not supposed that beggars are ever able to hoard any considerable sums from their earnings; what they receive is for the most part in kind, and they consider themselves very fortunate if they are able to accumulate as much as will provide them with coffins when they are dead, and allow the purchase of some tobacco to be smoked at their wakes. "To these purposes," said Mr. Davoren, "most aged mendicants direct their attention and economy; last week an old man who had been begging in the parish for several years came before me crying bitterly, and complaining that he had been robbed of a pound note, which had been stitched up in his small clothes, and with which he had intended to get himself decently buried. What made him inconsolable was, that he thought he would not live long enough to repair the loss."

Very few female vagrants are without children, and the greater number are accompanied in general by a great many of them. Molony said, that if he were to speak from what he observed himself, when employed in the Government works in the county of Mayo, he would say that large families are rather the cause than the effect of vagrancy. In that county the peasanty are especially prone to periodical mendicancy; and he has remarked that when a woman has several children she was sure to take a start of begging in the summer. The persons present all agreed that this remark applied, in some measure, to that district also; and added, that they did not recollect any instances of young persons getting married while mendicants. "If they commence begging young," said Murrogh, "it is because they find their father's cabin too small for them, and they have no other place to shelter themselves." Mr. Macguane said that he was inclined to think that the majority of children who accompany vagrants in general were legitimate, but that he has sometimes known beggar-women to have had several children by different fathers. On the whole, however, he did not think that bastardy was much more frequent among vagrants than among the labouring population. No remarks have been made even by the physician of the district on the relative mortality in the families of mendicants; it is permitted to conclude, therefore, that it is not greater than the average of other classes, from the fact, that not one strange beggar has died in the parish during the last year, nor was one of them attacked during the prevalence of the cholera by that disease. Thomas Crowe, the oldest man in the parish, he being 96 years of age, was a mendicant.

On applying to the better classes, who were present at the inquiry, as to the fact, whether an able-bodied man could procure more by labour, or under the circumstances alluded to before, by begging; a question calculated to elicit whether labour was justly remunerated or not; the Assistant Commissioners found them very unwilling to acknowledge that the condition of the beggar, as to daily gains, was even nearly on a par with that of the labourer; they represented that the labourer is employed but seven months in the year at farthest, and that only at an average of 7*d.* a day; that he has to pay rent, tithes and taxes, and after all, that he has nothing to subsist upon but dry potatoes in most instances; that on the other hand, the able-bodied vagrant with a family will, at a low computation and one day with another, collect two stone of potatoes, worth even when cheapest 3*d.*, and often more; and that he is altogether exempt from the items of expenditure which weigh heaviest on the labourer; but they were unable to alter the previous opinion. Kenny and several small farmers and tradespeople decidedly said, that the beggar was better off; and their admission did not arise from a contemplation of the above parallel, which was not drawn in their hearing.

The peasant or small farmer rarely, if ever, endeavours to ascertain whether the person who asks for alms is deserving of them or not; and Mr. Macguane observed, that he was only only surprised that the readiness with which charity was always given had not tempted half the labouring population in the parish to shut up their houses and take to the road. As to the preference for that mode of life, several present observed, that most of those who have practised mendicancy for some time, prefer the continuance of it to the resumption of habits of industry, from a well-founded conviction that, bad as it is, it is more profitable than working; but it would be impossible to point out any, at least in this part of the country, who had originally resorted to such a disreputable mode of life from such a conviction; however, let the causes of his becoming so be what they may, the vagrant, in nine cases out of ten, is found to be an incorrigible idler, and indisposed to exert himself in any way. Kenny observed on this point, that formerly when pressed by harvest, or otherwise, he at times engaged such persons to work; he found, unless he was constantly looking after them, that they preferred lying in the ditches or sitting on the potato ridges to any kind of exertion; at present, though he sometimes offers them work by way of experiment, he always hopes that they will not accept it, as he knows he would be only throwing away his money on them.

No inquiry is hardly ever made as to whether the applicant has got relief in the previous part of the day; and both Murrogh and Keane observed, that it was the constant custom, both every day and in every cabin, to give alms to the vagrant without any previous knowledge of his character whatsoever.

As to their mode of shelter for the night, it was agreed, that when darkness overtakes the mendicant on his road, he seeks his night's lodging, and readily obtains it, at the first cabin that presents itself. It is observed, that he prefers applying for this accommodation to the smaller farmers, because the larger holder is daily becoming more indisposed to admit him, and instead of doing so, gives him the straw, with which he makes his bed in the only room of the cottier. In summer, a good deal of clothes are given away by the gentry, but assistance of this kind is not to be much looked for from the farmers, who in general are on a small scale and cannot afford it. Relief to mendicants is almost exclusively given in potatoes, for such is the chief food of seven-eighths of the population; milk is also given by a few, less than one-half the families in the parish only being possessed of a cow; and from the miserable and exhausted pasture upon which she is fed, she seldom gives more than three or four quarts in summer, and is quite dry for some months during winter. Farmers always prefer giving relief in food, not only because it is more ready at hand, but because, when there are many applicants, it can be distributed better in small portions singly of less value than any existing coin. And Keane added, that many a man that could afford to give a handful of potatoes, could not give a copper halfpenny if he was to die for it; and if the beggars were depending on money they might starve, for very little the farmer has of that after paying his rent. Murrogh said, that the beggar, in most instances, would prefer money, except where he has many children, and his chief object seems to be that he may collect as much as he can, in order that he may sell it.

In summer, when the potatoes are scarce, it appears that the peasant exercises some discrimination in giving alms; applicants are then so numerous that towards the end of the day he finds it necessary to reserve his charity for what he deems especial objects, principally those who have large families of young children. At other times, he, or rather his wife, gives something, however small, to nearly every person who asks for it: the quantity thus given is generally a handful of potatoes, sometimes a double handful where there are children. There is no such thing known there as an individual directly and mainly supported as a pensioner by the bounty of any family; but it is thought that there are not a few farmers, holding over 20 acres, whose average daily givings would be sufficient, as Clancy expressed it, to "diet" an additional labourer, but not to provide him with wages. From the numbers who apply to the shopkeepers who are thus interrupted in their business, they are rather more deaf to solicitations, and in the small town of Miltown, by no means give away as much as would support an additional workman. None of the shopkeepers are in the habit of giving regular weekly allowances to beggars, being solely guided by their own discretion; neither is it customary for farmers to allot the produce of any specific portion of ground to charity.

All parties agreed in the opinion, that the relief of beggars fell almost exclusively on farmers of every extent, and next on shopkeepers; such persons, especially the former, being in every sense more open to, and more annoyed by, vagrants. Molony said, "The potato heap stands opposite every poor man's door, and when a christian stands on his threshold and asks for alms, how can he be refused?" Those who are possessed only of a potato garden, even the day labourers who have none, do not refuse their mite when asked "for the honour of God." And Maguire observed, "You would see beggars enter the house of a poor man who lived near a gentleman's gate, and go away after receiving charity there, never thinking of going up the avenue, as he knows full well that he would either find the gate shut against him, or that he would be told that there was nothing for him."

The effect of the promiscuous mode of giving thus described is, that there is more given to some than they can consume, but not more than is sufficient, by disposing of the surplus to supply their own wants, such as clothing, &c., and there is no reason to suppose that any of the food which they so carefully collect is ever wasted, though it may have been sometimes improperly bestowed.

Upon debating the question as to the quantity which a farmer with 10 acres of land would be likely to give in charity one day with another, the persons present agreed among themselves that such a man would give away, under the circumstances, about a stone of potatoes in the day; in the digging season, however, he would often give a great deal more.

And

And Keane observed, that those who have obtained the reputation of giving a good "maun" to the beggars are well known, and their doors are never passed by without an application. It is rather more difficult, however, to estimate the amount of the daily donations of a small shopkeeper, for to one he gives a bit of tobacco, to another a handful of salt, and to a third, who may appear sickly, a little meal; but altogether, as Hehir and Owens observed, a small shopkeeper could not afford to give, and does not give away more in the day than 2*d.* or 3*d.* worth. These computations surprised some of those who were present, and who showed much reluctance to enter into them; "lest," as they expressed it themselves, "it should appear as if they were reckoning what they gave to Almighty God through the poor." —"If all that be true," said Molony (meaning the amount thus supposed to be given), "many is the man that at the end of a season would want what he gave away more than those he gave it to."

As to the preference of a regularly yearly sum, Owens and some other shopkeepers said, that they would much prefer giving such, provided they were assured that it would not increase indefinitely each year, to being exposed to the annoyance of the present system of granting relief, and to the frequent certainty of being imposed upon. On the other hand, the farmers all cried out against the imposition of any fresh tax; and Clancy swore, that it made his flesh creep to speak only of a new cess. Even he, however, after some time, listened to reason, and allowed that he would be a gainer by the alteration.

It is not difficult to explain the difference in the feelings of the two classes upon this head; both consider themselves bound to give, in some shape or other, to the necessitous; but the farmer contributes from that of which he has a great abundance, and which it would cost him some trouble and expense to bring to market; whilst the shopkeeper gives either in money, or in commodities for which he would find a ready sale, and he is convinced he would be called on for much less under an organized method of assisting those in distress.

The principal motive of bestowing alms is to be sought in a religious feeling, in an idea that in so doing the donor is benefiting his own soul. And Mr. Macguane observed, that custom must have some share in keeping up the practice, since not a few seem unable to understand that they would be absolved from their obligation of giving to the mendicant, if the laws provided a sufficient subsistence for him.

Importunity is not often resorted to to elicite alms, for refusals are rare, and the thought never occurs that the applicant is suffering from privation. "Last Monday," said Keane, "a fellow came to my door whilst I was at dinner, and I offered him some boiled potatoes out of the dish; he refused them, and was saucy enough, and the reason was, because he would rather have raw ones to sell them." Mr. Macguane observed that charity is seldom if ever extorted by acts of violence; and there are very few people now-a-days who care much for the beggar's curse. Such, however, was not always the case, for when first he came to that parish, he received many complaints of the imprecations used by vagrants, and was often solicited to counteract the mischief which they were supposed capable of effecting.

As to the dissemination of diseases by mendicants, Murrogh says that he had been for 20 years in the habit of giving a night's lodging to poor wanderers, and that he never had reason to repent so doing; but he knows that all his neighbours have not been so fortunate, for some of them have missed both their lodger and their property when they awoke in the morning, whilst others had got into scrapes for what they had said incautiously before those whom they had admitted, who were acting as spies and informers. Doctor Costelloe said that he had often been able to trace to the above practice the spread of many disorders, and especially of fevers and many cutaneous distempers.

There is but one instance in the parish of an individual returning to domestic habits who had for some time followed a vagrant life. This man chanced to find a sum of money, and was induced to invest it in the purchase of a small house. In endeavouring to collect his rent for it from the several poor families to whom it was let, he by degrees became more and more stationary, until at last he gave up wandering altogether. He has since taken about an acre of land, which he tills himself; and about a year ago he got married to a young girl who had a fortune of a milch cow.—(Molony.)——This however is a rare instance, for in general the vagrant finds it impossible to relinquish his vagabond habits, and ultimately forms one of a class quite separate from the rest of the community.

It has never been attempted to suppress vagrancy in any manner in that district. It is a growing evil; and the magistrates and many of the inhabitants say that it would not only be inhuman, but perhaps impossible, to resort to any coercive measures for the purpose, unless the alternative of a support somewhere could be offered. Mr. Morony said, "That is all which is wanting to make a system of repression palatable to the people; and I am sure I would have it in the cordial co-operation of a majority of the respectable occupiers of land."

There is no mendicity institution or any similar establishment nearer than Ennis, the county town, at a distance of 18 miles.

P.—And several others, farmers, tradesmen and labourers.

SPEAKING of the number of beggars in this parish, Hare says, "I do not suppose I have ever seen four of our residents begging." As to the strollers, both the Rev. Mr. Comyn and Shillogh estimate them in one ploughland of the parish, one day with another throughout nine months of the year, to be not less than 30.

The parish is very extensive, and it is stated that there certainly are as many as 100 going about asking for alms during the greater part of the year. In summer, during the bathing season at Kilkee, when there is an influx from all parts of the country, the Rev. Mr. Curry is positive the number of strolling beggars coming to the salt water cannot be under 200, one day with another, during the months of June, July and August. "They follow," observed Shillogh, "the quality then." Curtil remarks, that the facility of getting turf, which abounds in this parish, and the ease with which solkane (a preparation of sea-weed) can be procured, materially increase the influx of beggars into this parish; and he has heard them observe, that this is altogether one of the best parishes in county Clare for them to come to.

In summer, when provisions are scarce, many of the poor people who are too proud to beg, and would rather starve than be considered regular beggars, are often reduced to one meal of potatoes mixed with pressagh (a kind of wild mustard), the use of which is very injurious to the health. "The consequence is," adds Hare, "that many of the children get very sickly at that season; and illness will most frequently be found in those houses where 'pressagh' is obliged to be used." Shillogh observes, "The beggars have been much increasing for the last three or four years. The markets are getting every year lower and the rents higher; the village is increasing in size, and the bathers more numerous; added to which, the facilities of getting from Limerick to Killrush by the steam-boat, owing to the kindness of the owners, who will generally give their passage to the poor going to the salt water gratis, when their grievances (their wretched condition) are made known to the captain. All these things send a great number of strange beggars from all parts of the county Limerick and Kerry to this parish."

In June and July, when the provisions are exhausted and little work to be had, "then it is," said Hare, "the Kerry people come here in swarms. They cross from the county Kerry to the county Clare, where they continue begging until their potatoes are fit for digging." "In this parish the beggars are all strangers; and it is really wonderful," said the Rev. Mr. Comyn, "what shifts our people make rather than beg in summer. There are several dispossessed families living on a hill near me, many of whose children are quite naked, and others wretchedly clad; and as for food, no animal can live on a worse description. Although it would be advantageous for these people to go out and beg, I am sure they would all rather starve than allow it hereafter to be said that either themselves or any of their children had been mendicants." The greater number of vagrants consists of women and children; "though," says Hare, "I see some men among them able to work if they had it; but the men mostly stay at home, and their wives and children go to beg; and I am sure, from their decent, quiet manner, that they are not old hands, and many are so ashamed that they will scarcely look at you in the face when you speak to them." Among the vagrants who come here, there are some few aged and infirm persons, but comparatively they are but few.

As to persons begging on Sundays who have been labouring during the week, Curtil says, "It never occurred in this parish on Sundays; there are not so many beggars as go about on other days. If they have got enough on Saturday, they do not like to beg at all on Sunday. I see many of them at mass." Cottiers never go out from this parish begging; they may sometimes, when in great distress, represent their case to the neighbours, who will help them as well as they can. "I think, however," says Pat Kennedy, "from the appearance of many of the strangers, particularly those from the county Limerick, that many of them are one and two-acre men, whose crops of potatoes I understand have failed a good deal there."

In the course of the summer weavers and other mechanics are sometimes found begging here, nor does any greater reluctance to beg characterize them than others who are equally reduced. Gentlemen's servants also come here occasionally seeking relief from their former masters; these are in general observed to be great cheats, and frequenters of punch-houses.

Curry says, "It is the county Kerry people send their wives and children here while their potatoes are growing, and indeed it is hard upon us, for there are always long families, and how can we refuse the poor creatures?" Hare adds, "In the summer season, when the bathers are here, a great many beggars come here from the town of Limerick; we know them by their language and general appearance."

Shillogh states, several mendicants have settled here from other places, but there are none of these now begging. Janet Armen and the Walshes came here some time go as beggars; they are now industrious, honest people. Beggars generally however go home to their own country; and out of the 100 mentioned before as seeking relief here, not more than three have remained for six months.

The native beggars of the parish, four in number, have been obliged by misfortune to beg. Two of them are too old to work, and the other two have met with accidents and are disabled. They have no relations or friends able to support them. Curry says, "It is almost always poverty and misfortune that send them out at first; but when they have once taken to begging, they find it easy work, and will not readily give it up. In this parish there are many would rather starve than beg." The Rev. Mr. Comyn observes, "There are many families ejected from their holdings; they are driven to towns; they soon find they cannot live there; they then take to begging, and their doing so is not noted. This will often explain why in most places the natives of a parish say they produce no beggars."

In this season of the year (November), an active beggar would certainly collect three stone of potatoes in the day; even in summer he will get enough to eat. But Pat Kennedy says, "If he has anything with him, then we would refuse him; he that has a long family has it reserved for him."

With regard to what beggars receive at the chapel, Mr. Comyn says, "Notwithstanding the influx of beggars to this place in summer, I never saw more than two of them begging at the chapel; but this is because I beg myself for the chapel to pay for its building, and the people give to me in preference to them. If I were to stop there would be plenty of them."

A difference is always made between a single beggar and a family applying for alms; the large family is looked on more kindly. To the question, Were the numbers ever counted? Shillogh said, "The beggars come to the door and ask in the name of the Lord, and by a cast of the eye we see how many they are, and we are liberal according to the size of the family." Upon the point of a large family dividing and begging in divisions, Hare says, "In winter they have no occasion to split; but in summer their plan is this: one or two of the children will go first to the house, and when they go away, some other part of the family will follow; and frequently I have known them leave the bag of potatoes with one of the children, for fear of its being seen, whilst some of the family will take to the door. And the farmers know full well that they are imposed on in this way; but they say they have neither time or inclination to look after these things."

These tricks are practised when beggars are most numerous, viz., between May and September, during which period mendicancy is felt as a great burthen on the farmers. As to the comparative quantity given to an able-bodied and an infirm beggar, the able-bodied, unless potatoes are plentiful, will get but little; whereas the old and infirm will be kindly treated. John Daly, an able-bodied beggar, when asked how much he had collected, replied, "All this blessed day I have been walking about the parish, and I have not been able to collect more than is in my bag." The quantity was weighed, and was exactly 1 ½ stone. Soon after an elderly man appeared, and stated he had been out only two hours, and only on the high road from Killkee to Kilrush; his bag was extremely full; he acknowledged not less than three stone; but he said he had several orphan grandchildren, and he did not think he would be able to sell more than one stone, which would enable him to buy tobacco.

But the general opinion of the witnesses confirmed what has been told in other parishes, that one day with another throughout the year, a middle-aged man would be able to make more by the sale of his potatoes than the old man or woman, who would not be able to go out of the high road, or make as many applications.

The beggars generally buy tobacco, and sometimes shoes, with their surplus collections. Both Daly and the old man generally had enough to buy tobacco. Daly said, he would rather go without his breakfast any day than without his pipe. The old man said he had pains in his bones, and he should die if he were not allowed to smoke; he generally consumed 1*d.* in the course of the day. When asked how they got their clothes, the old man said he mostly got them from a kind farmer. But Daly saved a little of his earnings, and now and then bought some rags to cover his nakedness. "If they were well dressed," said Hare, "they would not surely be so well entitled to charity; the poor person with his skin exposed must always get more." As to laying up in summer some of their earnings against the severity of winter, Daly says, "There is no occasion to do it, it is in the winter I get most alms; when the weather is bad, I must stay at home with the kind people who give me a night's lodging in the honour of the great God, and they will take pity on me, and ask me to share whatever is going with the children."

The women with children, who are by far the most numerous class of mendicants in this parish, represent themselves as widows; others again complain that their families are so large, that they cannot support them at home. It would be difficult to say whether beggars wear rags for the purpose of exciting compassion. "But," says Hare, "I never knew a beggar who dressed himself well when begging; but they often appear at mass on Sundays with good clothes, and are seen again on Monday with rags." "Strollers often bring recommendations with them, but we pay little attention to them," says the Rev. Mr. Comyn, "because we know them to be forged. There is a set of people going about the country, called wandering sailors, who are in general impostors, and these carry about plenty of letters and documents." On the point of beggars being reluctant to have their sores cured, inasmuch as their exposure creates compassion, Dr. Ryall says, he has generally found them unwilling to submit to any cure. As there is no asylum here for maimed or blind persons, it cannot be stated whether vagrants would be willing to permit their children to enter such an an institution. Dr. Ryall, however, mentions, that there are a great many blind people in this parish, owing entirely to the practice pursued by a class of travelling inoculators of small-pox, who have done a vast deal of mischief, and ought certainly be prohibited by legislative enactments.

There are many decent, honest people going about as vagrants; but the poor here complain very much of the numerous thefts committed by the strollers. "It was only the other day," says M'Mahon, "that I let a decentish looking fellow come into my house near the road-side, and lay down his wisp of straw near the fire, which was the best place my poor cabin could afford him; and I will tell you what he did for this kindness; he robbed me of a new pair of shoes, the only ones I had been able to buy for the last nine months by my little savings, and the shirt which I had put out to go clean to mass the next day (Sunday), was also missing." The Rev. Mr. Comyn confirmed this statement, by saying, "My parishioners come frequently to me to know what they are to do, as their clothes, which they generally lay out to dry, are taken away. This is principally what I have to complain of in the present system of mendicancy, which is going on, more or less, the whole year through." To the query, Would the confirmed vagrant be willing to emigrate? M'Narney said, "I am sure there are many of them would go, if they knew how to manage it; at the same time it must be observed, that when a person casts away the feeling of shame, and once goes out to travel (to beg), it is very difficult to get him to do any kind of work, as soon as he finds out that he can do what he likes and never want for the day." M'Donnell says, "The confirmed vagrant will never work." As to the affection of beggars for their children, the feeling of all present was well expressed by M'Donnell, who said, "The beggar is as fond of his child as the nobleman; often I see them give the bit out of their own mouths to the children." With regard to beggars hoarding their earnings, Shillogh says, "that when the currency was changed, beggars came in crowds to get their tenpenny pieces changed for shillings." Simon Curry "had known more than one instance of beggars saving money; but the most notorious case was that of a man now living in the next parish; his wife would be away, wandering up and down in strange countries, where nobody knows her, and where, from her civil manners and decent appearance, she would often collect a great deal more than she wanted. I knew her husband well, and a more comfortable-looking chap I think I seldom saw; but no wonder, for Peggy the knowing one, as we used to call her, would, to my certain knowledge, every now and then come home to her husband with a pound note, which she would get by selling everything she would receive from the Christian neighbours; this money he would lend to the poor at what I consider great interest." Whilst Curry was relating this story, a beggar-woman, who was attentively watching the proceedings, suddenly pushed in her head, and cursed him violently for "telling tales, and not minding his own business."

Beggars have in general large families, which are supposed mostly to have been the cause of their resorting to begging; but it was not considered that mendicancy had a tendency to increase families. The Rev. Mr. Comyn had never been applied to to marry beggars, nor is it believed that they frequently marry whilst in beggary. Curtil does not think there are more illegitimate children among beggars than among any other class. With regard to beggars dying of starvation, Bolen, a labourer, says, "I never heard of any beggar starving; it is more likely to happen to one of us, who are often hard driven in summer, if sickness comes upon us; 'faith, I believe the beggars never die, for I see many of them at the salt water quite crooked with age, and these people I have seen here year after year for the last 20 years."

The Assistant Commissioners addressed this inquiry, conceiving it to be one of the most important, to 37 labourers living on different roads within a circuit of two miles of Kilkee, and in no one instance was there the slightest degree of difference from the following remark made by M'Donnell: "Though the beggar may not earn more by begging than he would by honest working, I'll warrant you his life is a far easier one than that of any of the 37 labourers to whom this question was put. What has the beggar to care about in this world? he has no taxes, no tithes, and sure he has no outgoings at all. The beggar has a hard trade of it when the potatoes are scarce; but even then he can get enough to eat, and is better off than the labourer, who must buy his potatoes as well as he can, and can get no employment of any kind."

Kennedy says, "We never try to know anything about the character of the beggar; a man walks up, asks for alms in the honour of God; the woman (his wife) reaches them to him, no more passes between us; the he goes away and blesses us." When Hare was asked whether indiscriminate almsgiving had any prejudicial effect on the morals of the labouring classes, he remarked, "Of course, the giving of diet to fellows who follow the quality must make them more careless of gaining anything by labour."

On the point, whether they would prefer labour to begging, Kennedy said, "It is hard to say; they are mostly strangers; some of them would work for a part of a day, and then, if they found it hard work, they would throw down the spade and walk away." All present say that such instances have frequently occurred to them. Pat M'Mahon, who had been sometime since a workman of Shillogh's came to him, and gathering a rag about his leg, which was quite well, said he could not work, and the devil a stroke of work he would do. And Shillogh remarks, "I can hardly blame them for not liking to break their hearts for 6*d.* a day."

A night's lodging is freely given to beggars in this parish, and they mostly resort to the poorest sort of farmers, such as two and three-acre men. The large farmers will admit an old man who is not a "boccough," because they know them to be very bad characters; but they are afraid to admit a young able fellow. With regard to getting clothes from the farmers, Haly, the beggarman, says, "I am sure there is not a farmer that would not give the the beggar clothes if they had them to spare." The principal relief given by the farmers consists in potatoes. If a disabled man applies during harvest, he will get a handful of corn or a little flax seed; in short, whatever the farmer has. Milk is given in summer to old people, or if there be a very large family; but now in November there is scarcely any among the farmers. Mr. Studdart is certain that three-fourths of the farmers in the parish of Kilferagh do not possess a cow. As to farmers preferring to give food to money, M'Narney says, "They have not the money, and it is the custom to give food; moreover, they have no coin small enough to divide among so many applicants." Haly, the beggarman, says, "We would rather get the money, because it is easier to carry it than a bag of potatoes; and how can we do without tobacco? and how could we get that without money?"

There is no limit to the quantity given at each house. Kennedy says, "Everybody who lives in the parish gives as well as he is able; sometimes, however, when a great many call in summer, we must refuse; we then look into their bag, and if they have a tolerable load we let them pass on. In winter this never happens; then every man gets more or less. Curtil says, "We always try to give a long family a 'maun' (i. e. a good handful)." It is thought by the farmers that there is not among them, not even the most liberal, any who give, one day with another throughout the year, one stone of potatoes per day. "We seldom take into consideration," adds Hare, "what we give, because it is the wife who hands the alms; still we see sometimes the numbers of beggars who come to the house, and we can give a tolerable guess. How is it possible, then, that a farmer's alms could maintain an additional labourer? Perhaps you do not know that the farm servant must have 5*l.* besides his diet, washing and lodging; and if he is well kept he will not cost us less than 15*l.* per annum." With regard to alms given by shopkeepers, there are few in the parish able to give any weekly allowances; they as well as the farmers give every day, and chiefly in provisions.

To the question, on what class the relief of the beggars chiefly falls? M'Narney said, "I think the man who holds two acres will give as surely as the man who holds 20."

The average size of the farms in this parish is about six acres; and it is considered by all present, that the burthen of supporting the strollers falls on the small farmer, who can least afford it. The only resident gentleman is Mr. Studdart, a middle-man; and the owners of the soil, who live away, completely escape the annoyance and the severe tax which those least able to afford it are obliged to bear. "The rich man," observes Haly, "will not allow the beggar into his house nor into his kitchen; the servant will keep him off;" and Curtil says, "Often when I meet a poor person he will ask me if there is any kindness towards the beggars in such and such a large house, meaning a gentleman's house." Daly, the beggarman, says, "If it was not for the poor people, such as poor farmers and labourers, we should starve. What do the gentlemen care for us, and how can we get at them?"

Upon Curry and M'Donnell being asked the question, the latter replied, "It is such as we must all do for the strollers. I have half an acre myself; I pay a heavy rent, and I give the beggar as much as I can." Daly, upon hearing this, with tears in his eyes, remarked, "The great God above knows it is true what Curry has said, and they will get their reward for their charity. I have gone to M'Donnell's when he had scarcely food to put in his own belly, and he has always welcomed me like a good Christian."

With regard to beggars sometimes obtaining more food than they want, and thence a waste of provisions arising, the Rev. Mr. Murray observes, "It can scarcely be said to lead to waste of provisions, because the money which they make by the sale of potatoes is seldom laid out except in necessaries."

In the village almost all the farmers hold farms of different sizes, so that they may be looked upon as farmers, and all give as much as they can; and the Rev. Mr. Curry says, "The poor labourer and cabin-holder will not consider whether he will have enough for himself and family to-morrow before he gives to-day; neither do they think that they will have more by withholding from the beggar."

All the farmers and shopkeepers were consulted as to whether they would prefer an annual sum to the present mode of giving; and the following are a few of their replies: "I do not think it would be as heavy on us as it now is, if we could tax the absentee landlords double as well."—(Hare.)

"I am afraid if the tax was levied on us, we would have the same thing as the tithes; the tenants would be saddled with the whole."—(M'Narney.)

"I would certainly prefer to have some of the burthen off of our shoulders. We have not a resident landlord in this or in the next parish."—(Kennedy.)

"I should certainly like it would be put on those who are better able to bear it than myself. I would cheerfully give according to my means, if the cess were not too high; and though I think many of the farmers might object to it the first year, I am sure in the second they would find out it would be for their advantage, and much the cheapest way of supporting the poor in the end."—(Shillogh.)

The latter part of this remark excited some discussion amongst at least 15 farmers present, and they all united in saying, that if it could be managed without great expense, "Shillogh had spoken well for them."

A variety of causes seem to influence the majority of persons to give to the beggar. Though a fear that the applicant is suffering from great privation may find a place in the train of ideas which accompany almsgiving, yet it is admitted by all, that custom and religious feeling have more effect in awakening charity, agreeably to the remark made by Kennedy: "It will never lessen what I have given in the honour of God; and it is a great delight to me to hear the beggar say good prayers in honour of my soul." The Rev. Mr. Comyn says that the certainty of relief being at hand for any beggar would, as he thinks, remove that feeling of duty entertained by the community now as to the necessity of relieving mendicants.

As to the influence of the beggar's curse, Hare says, "We are getting too enlightened to mind such things in these days; but I am quite positive the fear the women have of being cursed makes them give to 'boccoughs,' who have always a pack of oaths ready to make use of as they think best."

Dr. Ryal states that he has no doubt fever is spread by the system of giving a night's lodging, when it breaks out in a district; he has frequently seen the bad effect of mendicancy in communicating a disease called "tetters," which is very common among the beggars.

The regular strollers, who make begging the business of their lives, never return to habits of industry; and even those who, from the size of their families, are obliged to go out for a short period of the year, are less industrious than others. It gives them the habit of starting off when a little distress comes on them, and they will not bear half as much as the person who has not known what begging is. With regard to their being a separate class, Mr. Fitzgerald says, "Except the boccoughs, who certainly form a distinct set, I have no reason to believe that any other class become so."

The petty sessions are occasionally held during the summer months at Kilkee, and no punishments have been inflicted for vagrancy; neither at Kilrush, where the magistrates sit once a week; neither is it thought that it could be done, unless relief were extended to the really deserving objects. Mr. Vandeleur says, "I do not think vagrancy laws could be enforced unless relief were given to the impotent poor; but it is absolutely necessary that we should soon have some means in our power to repress vagrancy. Mendicancy, as it exists, is injurious to the morals of the poor; and particularly in a town of the size of Kilrush, one cannot but be struck with the bad consequences that result to those who give lodgings to beggars, as they carry about disease, and frequently rob the poor people. Almost all the petty larcenies that have lately been committed there, and brought before us as magistrates, have been clearly traced to strolling mendicancy." Still it appears that there is a great repugnance to enforcing severe laws at present; "but," says Mr. Studdart, (Mr. Vandeleur fully concurring with him,) "if a provision were extended to the poor, the repugnance on the part of those who would be entrusted with the enforcement of a well-digested vagrant law would be removed."

There is no house of industry nearer than Ennis, a distance of at least 20 miles. Several beggars were examined as to whether they would go into a house of industry; and they all expressed the greatest horror at the idea, as they said, of being deprived of their liberty. One or two of them said, "they knew well what it was; they had heard their friends screeching and calling out for help when they were to go to the Mendicity at Limerick; and would such places be recommended to them?" One of them said, he knew he would never hear mass there; in fact, there was no excuse left untouched, and all the cruelties which report has assigned to the management of mendicities were pictured to their minds in the most exaggerated horrors. The following is the history of Tom Haly, at present a resident mendicant of Kilkee: "I was born and reared at Birshill, in the county of Tipperary, and worked with Mr. Gowing as a labourer for 5*d.* a day, from whom I held one acre and a half of ground, the rent of which I used to work out by my labour. With him and with others I was employed about 42 years, and I am now past 74. I have a wife and children, who are all in employment, except the eldest girl, who has the falling sickness; one son gets 5*s.* a quarter from a farmer, and the others get 6*s.* 6*d.*, and, as God is my judge, they cannot afford me a stone of potatoes. When I first came to this parish, I was able to work and to pay my little calls by my labour." When he was asked what induced him to come from Tipperary to Kilferagh, he replied, "I was turned out of my little holding by Mr. Gowing, because I was not able to take a large farm of 20 or 30 acres when he was getting rid of the small cottiers. I wandered up and down the country then till I chanced to fall in with a kind farmer, who gave me work as long as he had anything for me to do. When that was over, myself and the creatures (the children) were necessitated to beg, and we travelled a long, long way, and at last we got to Kilkee, where we knew the quality would be. Blessed be the Lord, however, the strangers were good; and as I was still able to work, I got labour and a little piece of work ground (con-acre); but the work was so severe I could not stand it long, and when the Almighty God was pleased to deprive me of my health, I was ashamed to beg with those whom I had worked, so I left this place and went to a friend of mine in the county of Tipperary, who gave me 10*s.*, and then I bought a little 'bannow' (a little pig) with which to pay the rent of my lodging. I begged my way here to my wife; I have now sold the pig to pay up the calls, and do not know how I must pay the rent, excepting depending on the great God and the Christians." (He meant he would receive it by begging in the summer, when the gentry resort to Kilkee.) "I used to get a trifle from my eldest boy before he was married, and that he did at 18." When asked why his son married so early, he said, "My conscience would not allow me to forbid him, because she was blasted by him when they were living as farm servants in the same house. I would not like to go into a poorhouse, because I do not know the course of things there, and I do not think I could live without a start (a walk) now and then. I do not think I should be allowed a smoke of tobacco, all the comfort I have had of late, and I would rather die than do without the tobacco."

INQUIRIES were first made as to the number of paupers subsisting on charity in the town of Killaloe, and it was estimated that they amounted to about 16. "But," says the Rev. Mr. Vaughan, "the beggars are for the most part strangers; but it is my opinion that there are in the whole parish about 100 families, or about 1,000 persons who are occasionally obliged to beg; and I do not think I know the face of more than one in twenty that I see in the streets." Mendicancy has much increased of late; people come here to get relief from those who are employed. The number of employed persons has increased much of late, owing to the work given by the Navigation Company. The company, moreover, employ a great many strangers, and consequently the resident people do not benefit at all by it.

The Rev. Mr. Vaughan observes, "that the inundation which occurred high up the Shannon has destroyed the comforts of many, and has sent a great many individuals as beggars here;" and it is most likely that mendicancy will be much increased next year on account of the very low prices, while no reduction is made in the rents.

Mr. M'Dowell also remarks, "that it is impossible for any one to foresee what will happen next year, if the landlords continue their present rents."

Mr. O'Brien also attributes to the driving of tenants for the present high rents and tithes the greater part of the mendicancy which is brought on amongst the farmers and cottier tenants of this country.

May, June, July and August are the months in which vagrancy most prevails; for at that time, says Mr. M'Dowell, "the victuals are so high that the poor cannot purchase them; and the weather being fine, as soon as their potatoes are planted, they wander away, having sold everything they had to purchase the seed potatoes."

The beggars chiefly consist of women, and if ever the husbands accompany them, they do not beg, but let the wives ask for alms, and walk on before them, or perhaps separate for the day, and meet in the evening to partake of the food procured by the women.

James Ryan says, "Male beggars sometimes accompany the females in asses' carts, and stop at some distance without the town, and there meet each other in the evening. I was coming home on Thursday last from Mrs. O'Brien's, and met two men in an ass's cart, with two dogs chained under it, and a man, who appeared to be blind, with his hand laid on the back of the cart. I observed them closely, and saw them afterwards in this town (Killaloe) going about perfectly well; and this plan is often carried on by strangers in this part of the country."

M'Dowell thinks "these beggars, who split their families for the purpose of collecting more, are great schemers, and all farmers think badly of them."

The females beg, from their being less employment for them than the males at a certain time of life. By far the greater number of the men who beg are infirm through age or disease; for if able-bodied, they would be ashamed to beg. "According to my knowledge," says Burke, "there is not an able-bodied man in Killaloe to be seen begging."

No person who earns his sustenance through the week begs here on Sunday: there are fewer beggars on that day than any other, as they remain in their lodgings on that day, living on what they have procured on the Saturday.

None are to be seen at the chapel, except those who may be considered rogues and impostors, from the exhibition they make of their sores; on which account, I discourage them. Few of the cottiers held less than two or three acres of ground; and no instance is known here of a man holding ground taking to begging; but many pass who say they have crops in the ground elsewhere, and have nothing to live on until they are ripe.

Mechanics are never seen begging; they would not stoop so low; a feeling of pride from having served an apprenticeship prevents them. "I have known them," says Mr. Vaughan, "to pawn their things privately at Limerick, taking them away at night, lest the neighbours might discover their poverty."

M'Dowell adds, "They would be taunted with not having saved out of their 2*s.* 6*d.* a day. I have heard people say to them, 'Why have you not saved; you were much better off than the labourer?'"

Small farmers, when they become aged, often give up their property to their children, but never with the intention of taking to begging. When they give up their farm to a married son, they stipulate, sometimes in writing, sometimes verbally, for a return of the land, if they do not like the wife.

M'Dowell's father lived with him for 10 years after giving up his farm, bargaining only for clothes and snuff.

The Rev. Mr. Vaughan says "that he hears very few complaints from fathers of their children, and that if ill treated they would be sure to refer to him."

"It is such a reproach to a man," says Cuneen, "to behave badly to his parent, that he cannot bear to face the world after such a transaction."

"Very few from this part of the country go to England to look for employment; and I never heard," says Blake, "that an honest labourer, like those who travel to England, would degrade himself and his family by begging, though I have heard of their wives begging through strange parts of the country when they are from home."

"The beggars generally come from the counties of Galway, Mayo, and west of Clare, and in the dear summers from Tipperary and Limerick, where I hear the lands are dear, and where it is difficult for the poor man to get land in which he can sow his potatoes, as a rood of pasture land broken up will let as high as 6 l. an acre."—(Mr. O'Brien.)——"I find," adds Mr. Vaughan, "that almost all the beggars are from the country: town beggars find it better to remain in a large town where they have many associates, and to which they are generally very much attached."

Mr. O'Brien thinks the children of occasional beggars may turn out honest, but that the children of regular professed beggars will often follow the same trade, and that there is little doubt but the child who follows its mother for a long period, and then gives up strolling, will upon any little distress occurring, beg with less reluctance than the person who had never known what it was to beg; and how easy it is to get relief, if they once allow the spirit of independence to be broken down.

Ryan says, "I know the greater part of the families of beggars who have settled in Killaloe have turned out industrious, hard-working people, and I do not think that begging descends from father to son; but as the parents cannot stop long enough in one place to have their children instructed in religion, the latter often turn out badly."

Not one of the town's people (that is, the men) beg while they are able to earn; but as the strollers are for the most part unknown, it would be hard to decide as to them.

Ryan thinks that able-bodied beggars could collect by three degrees more food * than they could consume.

Judy Moynahan, a town beggar, said that she had purchased a young pig at the fair of Scariff, which she hoped to fatten with the † food her neighbours would give her.

Jim Daly, a labouring man, states "he has often seen a beggar pass with two or three stone of potatoes on his back."

So that it seems strange that the labourers do not envy the condition of the beggars. At the church nothing is given to beggars; what the congregation give they put in the poor-box. The few beggars who attend at the chapel are always undeserving objects, and meet with no success.

"When I give money, I give a halfpenny, no matter what the number is; but when I give victuals, I proportion them to the number of children in the family."—(Burke.)—— And all say they would rather give where there are children, than to the old blind "boccoughs," that do be strolling about the country. Able-bodied are rarely met begging, except in summer. Many labourers said "they would not be likely to open the hand much to us."

Pat Curtis states, "If an able-bodied man came to the door when the potatoes were on the table, he might eat his share, but sorra a much he would take away with him."

As to whether many children are an advantage to a beggar, Judy Moynahan said, "that she had had plenty of offers of marriage, but dare not take any of them, because she would be likely to have more children, so that she could not make as good a day's work begging, as she does now, if she was hampered with many children."

It is the universal practice of beggars to dispose of their surplus collections for money, which in this neighbourhood is laid out for tobacco and necessaries. Very few, and those mostly impostors, lay it out in whiskey. They often dispose of potatoes for meal, but they never sell their collections below the market price, but always above.

Mary Malone here says, "They will always want the price of cups for lumpers, and the reason I pay them them so high is, that they will make me out a small quantity when may be, I have only a halfpenny to buy my supper, and could not get less than a stone in the market."

Ryan says, "I have known them to make as much as 2*d.*, 3*d.*, or even 6*d.* in the day; and if they were resident they would be apt to keep these sums to buy clothes." And Tim Daly and others of his class stated, "that a beggar would be thought better of if he were known to make a good use of what he got." Gilmore says, "I would rather give to a beggar, if he was genteelly dressed; they are better behaved than those who are worse dressed."

There are a good many beggars in summer from temporary destitution, but the regular strollers are as numerous in winter as in summer, as provisions are then plentier and more easily obtained.

The plea of the want of work would be superfluous in this district, as those to whom the request would be made are already too well aware of the lack of employment. "They generally ask alms in God's name." It is thought that strange beggars retain their rags and

* We questioned of the labouring classes on this point, who all agreed that beggars rarely (if ever) fail to procure, in the course of their day's walk, as much food as they can consume. Indeed, the lusty appearance of many of the beggarwomen would denote that they did not suffer from want of food.

† Some labouring men present exclaimed, "Why not; how else could she get a bit of tobacco and some clothes?"

and dirt for the purpose of exciting commiseration, but many of the poor creatures in the town, whom the Assistant Commissioners visited, boasted that they kept their little rags as clean as they could.

It is not supposed to be a very general practice to retain sores; but Dr. Purdon pointed out to us a whole family of a scrofulous constitution, who refused his assistance to cure the sore eyes they are afflicted with, in order that they may continue greater objects of charity.

Mr. Ryan adds, "I was one day standing at my door, when a friend came up to me and said, 'Come, and I will show you what these villains are doing.' I went with him, and looking through a window, I saw a beggar irritating a sore with salt and water. The next day I met this same man at a fair, exposing his leg and supplicating charity." Mr. Burke adds, "There is one fellow who frequents this side of the country, who ties up his leg before him, and carries a child upon it. I have seen this fellow when drunk in the evening let down his leg and fight like a Trojan."

Dr. Purdon says, "I have known a woman to be delivered of a child with a hare lip, who had been frightened by having a beggar's child forced on her notice who was afflicted in that way. Pregnant women are often observed to bless themselves, when passing a disgusting object, for good luck."

A great many robberies and petty thefts are committed by the mendicants; they have been known to rob the peasant who gave them a night's lodging.

Tim Daly says, "One of them ran away with a 30*s.* note from him, and that he has never since let one of them inside his house after night fall."

Burke, a shopkeeper, says, "They are much addicted to shoplifting; one of them lately got into the cholera-hospital and ran away with some of the sheets from it. Beggars, however, have not been known to be concerned in any outrages on persons." It was not considered likely that a beggar would be willing to emigrate. "He is not an industrious person."

Gilmore says, "A beggar came here to-day, a strong-looking chap, and I told him there were gentlemen come to Killaloe to send him off to a fine country where he would have 40 acres of good land. 'I would rather die,' said he, 'than be sent out of Irish ground to the finest country in the world.'" Beggars show the greatest kindness to their offspring, and even to others more destitute than themselves. Gilmore says, "Last summer, I saw a beggar-woman complain of thirst to another who immediately gave her milk which I had given her a short time before."

In many instances beggars are known to hoard money. One case was mentioned of a beggar coming to Mr. Carrig for gold for 4*l.* 10*s.* in silver; he at the same time stated that he had upwards of 100*l.* in the hands of different persons.

O'Brien saw a beggarman offer a woman 50*s.* to marry him, and when she refused, he went to a public-house and drank the money with his comrades.

Beggars generally have lots of children. Those who travel about are disposed to marry very early, or at least they have women with whom they cohabit; the resident beggars are in general lawfully married; they are in general better fed than the labouring classes; and Dr. Purdon adds, "very few of them fall victims to the cholera or other epidemics; and no case has ever been heard of in this quarter of a beggar dying of starvation."

An able-bodied labourer could not procure as much by begging as by labour; but as the labourer often is not employed for more than two days in the week, and the beggar can go out every day, the latter makes more in the long run.

Cuneen says, "All I get at the best of times is but 10*d.* a day, and it is hard with that to give enough to eight children, besides paying the rent of the cabin. God knows, many of the beggars are better off than us poor cabin-keepers." Relief is generally given by the lower classes as long as their means last.

Mary Cuneen says, "We give freely as long as our means last, and we hope God will not forget it to us."

Burke says, "that he thinks the men would be willing to work if they could find employment;" and Pat Curtis adds, "I see many a stout fellow going along, who is as well able to work as I am, but it is so long since some of them handled a spade, they would not know how to use it."

The character of a beggar is seldom a matter of consideration with the poor. "What signifies what they are?" says Mary Cuneen; "God knows why we give, and it is better to give to all we can, than perhaps refuse the most deserving."

A night's lodging is rarely, if ever, refused. There was an instance mentioned where a beggar and his three children have been living with some poor cottiers for the last three weeks. The man goes out in the morning and returns with the produce of his begging which he shares among his children, without allowing anything to the owners of the cabin In the town, however, gratuitous lodging is not so common. Those who are resident beggars pay a weekly rent of 4*d.* or 5*d.* a week for a certain number of square feet on which to place their bed of straw. There are even lodging-houses devoted to the reception of beggars, and kept by persons of the same class, who make a good trade of it, according to Mr. Ryan.

The peasants never give any clothes to beggars; "and could we," says Curtis, "when we have hardly enough to keep out the cold ourselves?"

In the town, however, cast clothes are sometimes given by the better classes to the poor. Potatoes form the chief food given to the poor beggars. Edwards, a man engaged in the eel-fishery, says, "Nine or ten beggars called on me this morning, and I gave them what I had; I gave them a share of the eels I had for the market."

Farmers will often give meal, especially to the old, because they cannot carry a great weight of potatoes. Beggars sometimes get milk also from the large farmers. Beggars seldom get money from the farmers. "Very little money they have for the poor or for themselves." The beggars would prefer money, which is evident from their converting their collections into money.

Patrick Hare, an old lame man, who had with him his daughter well dressed, and carrying bed-clothes for her father, stated, "I am returning from the salt water to hospital in the county Limerick; I get a night's lodging whenever I ask for it, in the name of the Lord, and my victuals just in the same way. I would not as much as bring a wisp of straw with me to the house where I stop; it would be an affront to offer to get anything for myself. The poorer sort give freely whatever they have; the rich do not feel for the likes of us at all. The strong farmers are very boorish and inconsiderate in comparison to the poor cottiers."

This old man had walked since morning seven miles on crutches, and expressed a great antipathy to his daughter's continuing the life of a beggar when she was grown up.

"We give to all who come, as long as we have anything. Sometimes when we are at dinner, two or three people will come; they sit down and take their share; sometimes when they pass and look in, they get a handful of potatoes, and we would give more if we had it."—(Mary Doyle.)

There are none altogether supported by any one private charity; a few poor people, however, receive 1*s.* a week from a fund instituted by the late Bishop of Killaloe, and continued by the present. This trifle goes towards paying the rent of their cabins. The relief of beggars falls principally on the farmers and poorer classes, and of this the poor themselves are quite convinced, and think it unfair that the burthen should fall on them. Burke says, "I know the poor are as benevolent as those who have an income. I am sure, if a person came and asked them for a night's lodging, they would sooner give it than any rich man; they would have no chance with them."

Captain Martin says, "They feel more than the higher orders what real distress is, and I am sure the poorer they are the more readily they give."

James Daly, a wretched looking beggar, who evidently from his manner had seen better days, stated "that he had been obliged to beg for the last six years, and there was nothing in the world the poor labourers would not give him. Sure, they give the straw, firing and lodging for any length of time, in God's holy name."

Mary Cuneen says, "Sure, I am the wife of a poor labourer, at 10*d.* a day, and that only now and then; and I can safely say, the poorest house gives in the year 12 stone of potatoes."

This at 1½*d.* per stone would be 1*s.* 6*d.* in the year. Curtis, a decent small farmer, says, "As to the amount given to the beggars, begad! I would be hard set to say. I am not much at home, but the old woman gives a handful to everybody that calls, and I think it would be worth 2*s.* 6*d.* at the end of the year."

Burke, a shopkeeper in Killaloe, says, that he thinks 4*d.* or 5*d.* a week would express the average contributions of the shopkeepers of the town.

Mullins says, "I am sure we give according to our means as much as any rich man in the parish, but we scarcely know what we give; a few handfuls in the day are scarcely missed."

The farmers and shopkeepers differ as to preferring a regular sum to the present mode of giving. The shopkeepers are anxious for it, but the farmers fear it would be a great expense.

Burke, a shopkeeper, says, "I would rather give a small sum according to my means; the beggars come in crowds to the door, and interrupt my business."

Gillmore adds, "When I was a tradesman, I would certainly have given a small sum, but now, as I am an innkeeper, I can shut my door and give when I like."

Michael Burns, a small farmer and a herd, observes, that he also would be glad to get rid of the strolling beggars, but he knows full well the salaries of matrons and other costs would more than keep the whole poor of the parish.

Another farmer said, "If any other cess was laid on them, they might as well quit the place at once."

Pat Curtis says, "A penny a year would pay my share of the cess, if there was a poor-house to keep the beggars out of the parish, and there were no strollers."

They have a general idea, that if somebody does not give to the beggar he must starve. "I know," says Mary Doyle, "the beggars are far better off than us poor cabin-keepers. It is the custom of the county to give."

Burke says, "About two years since, there was a soup-kitchen established in this town, and though it did not afford quite enough of food, yet it did pretty well; but there were as many begging as before, and we gave our 4*d.* or 5*d.* a week as usual."

Still it was considered, if a permanent house of relief were established, neither townspeople nor country people would feel themselves bound to give to the same extent. Fear of violence seldom procures anything for the beggar.

Burke says, "Though they give ill language, I should not feel more kind towards them; on the contrary, they are the persons to whom I would not give. There might be some fear if a woman stood alone in a shop; a curse then might go a great way."

Most of the witnesses agree in saying, that without doubt diseases are spread by beggars.

Dr. Purdon expressly states that they carry disease from place to place. There is a kind of tetter, or plaguedemic sore, which he has often traced to infection received from them. He adds, that the only cases of syphilis he has seen in the parish have arisen from connexion with beggarwomen, and that farmers' sons and labourers are often infected by the strange women women whom they are obliged to hire in the hurry of harvest work. There is a woman here present now with twins in her arms; these children are labouring under confluent small-pox. The woman states that they caught the infection in a house in the county Tipperary, where she received a night's lodging. Since then she has travelled about the country, and been freely lodged each night; and there can be little doubt of her having disseminated a most malignant disease, against which the poor are the less secured, as Dr. Purdon states they seldom or never are vaccinated.

The Rev. Mr. Vaughan has found it necessary to take precautions against unknown beggars taking up their residence in the parish.

If a woman cannot produce a character, or have not her husband with her, he generally succeeds in making her quit the parish.

Mr. Scanlan, roman-catholic clergyman of a neighbouring parish, says "that he has a townland in it, where every house lodges a vagrant each night, and they are a most profligate set inhabiting it, and never go to their duties."

Mr. Martin mentions a young female carried away by a beggarwoman, and by her hired out as a prostitute. As to whether beggars are the means of spreading discontent by fabricating stories, they certainly are apt to speak ill of those who have not been sufficiently charitable. They have told Edwards that another farmer did not behave like a Christian.

Mr. Duncan, who attends the petty sessions, says, he does not recollect any serious quarrel being fomented by them.

Burke says, they would tell any lie to make a penny.

Ryan declares, "I have never known a confirmed beggar become an industrious person." This opinion was held by most of the witnesses. "Many of them," says Duncan, "are able to work and do not."

No punishments are inflicted on vagrants, except where a crime has been committed. One able-bodied young fellow was committed lately as a vagrant, but was dismissed at the ensuing sessions. Whatever power the law affords is never resorted to; and as matters stand at present, there would be decided disinclination to enforce any rigorous measures. Everybody thinks the beggars have a right to exercise their calling. "What else can they do? they cannot starve."

Somers, a weaver, says, "I would never go to beg. I am sure there's many able fellows going idle about the world. Make poorhouses, and put them in by constables."

This opinion is held more by tradespeople than by country people. Some persons who are too proud to beg will not hesitate to steal, so that petty thefts of provisions have frequently taken place from destitution, and have been punished.

Mr. Westrop's potatoes were stolen some time ago by persons who were in great want, but would not beg; they were fined, but not being able to pay were committed to gaol.—(Mr. Martin—Mr. Duncan.)

Among all the different beggars who were asked, would they go into a house of industry? there was a manifest reluctance to enter, and all have assigned very characteristic reasons.

Pat Doolan, a poor decripet old man, whose appearance manifested extreme destitution, said, "that his time here was but short, and that he would rather die among the neighbours."

When pressed for a further reason, he said, "he feared he would never get mass." But there will be a chaplain. "Still I do not like it."

The Widow Slattery at first expressed her willingness to enter, but when told it would be necessary to separate her from her children, she answered, "she would rather die than part with them."

Judy Moynahan, a sturdy beggarwoman, who sometimes works, but more frequently begs, and who is much better off than those just mentioned, says, "that she would go in if she saw others going."

John Hare, a travelling beggar, remarked, "that a poorhouse would be much more convenient for his equals than to be travelling about in the wet and cold."

not have amounted to less than 70 or 80. Mendicancy has greatly increased in that part of the country, owing to several causes; want of employment, for instance; the increased popularity of the bathing-places on the Clare coast; the cheapness of potatoes in that district, from the facility of procuring sea manure; and the complete prostitution of the manufacture of frieze and linens for home consumption: all these circumstances combined have caused a considerable influx of beggars into that and the other neighbouring parishes. Mulqueany, a small farmer, said, that many came there on their travels, and stopped when they found the country cheap. He never saw so many in his life; and if he had half an acre of potatoes for the beggars, he could not give a handful to each person that called upon him. This poor man had about an acre of potatoes last year; and he gave away so much, that he was obliged to purchase considerably more than he had been accustomed to do this year, on account of this great increase of vagrancy. Morrissy, the weaver, remarked, that all the weavers are worse off than the beggars. Many of his friends, who used to inhabit comfortable little houses, in or about Ennistymón, paying a rent of about 30*s.* or 40*s.* a year, have been obliged to sell them; and after wandering about different parts of Ireland in search of employment, they have returned and taken up their abode there as lodgers, at 6*d.* a week, and are living in a most wretched state. He himself could not earn more than 2*s.* a week, and that is better than many of them. If he had work constantly, he might make out about 8*d.* a day, or 4*s.* a week. The Assistant Commissioners were informed, that this poor man's children were so badly clothed, that it would be considered indecent for them to appear in school in that state. "Consequently," as Martha Morrissy, their mother, said, "they are obliged to remain at home in idleness; and God only knows what will become of them when they grow up." Keane, a small farmer, observed, that while taxes are every day increasing, and the produce declining awfully in price, the landlords make no abatements, and reports are circulated that, not content with their present exorbitant rents, they intend still to increase them more; and thus they will drive them all to beggary, for they are not far from it now.

Vagrancy is not common during the summer months, commencing in June and ending about the last week in August. This is produced by the total exhaustion of the old stock of potatoes, and the want of employment at that particular period, when, as Higgins the labourer observed, a man might walk through the whole parish, both morning and night, asking for work, and would consider himself most lucky if he succeeded in getting himself hired once a week. As to the class of mendicants who are relieved in the neighbourhood at this season of the year, they are principally strangers; they come from a great distance, and many of them with the excuse that sea bathing had been recommended to them, as an infallible cure for all descriptions of pains in the bones (a common term made use of by the poor people to express weakness, or any other ailments they may be troubled with). They thus take Ennistymon on their road to the several watering-places. Others again (a most numerous class at that period,) are supposed, from their appearance and modesty, as well as from their youth and decent behaviour, to be the wives and children of labourers, and of persons holding an acre of ground or so, who, from absolute necessity, are driven to beg in a hard summer. With regard to this class of poor persons, Mulqueany said, "I really cannot help crying sometimes, when I see these poor girls standing at the door, shaking all over, and hanging down their heads, as if to avoid being seen; and when you give them anything, they seem so thankful and grateful, that I know by their very manner they are deserving of our compassion. These poor persons are far too sensitive to approach any gentleman's house, where they would probably be refused relief on account of their respectable appearance, or to visit even the houses of large farmers, who are known frequently to be in the habit of refusing these the most deserving objects, from their mixing so little with a class so inferior to them in importance; and therefore, knowing so little about them, their support then principally falls upon us cottiers." With regard to the proportion of those who go about in families, or to travel singly, it was observed that, except in the summer season, when they roam about in groups, those who are known, and who may be considered as resident beggars, stroll from house to house singly, supplicating charity. The women greatly exceed the men in number; and this preponderance is attributed by all the witnesses to a feeling which is known to exist among the men, that, generally speaking, they would rather perish from want than beg; whereas the women are less reluctant, and do not regard begging in the same degraded light in which it is generally looked upon by the men; besides, as Lysaght, the labourer, observed, it is not considered advantageous to a strong able-looking man to go beg, for they would not collect enough for a large family; but the woman will always get enough with her children during the day to feed her, at the different houses she goes to; and she will often have a little something at the end of the day for her supper. The greater number of the resident beggars are supposed to be too infirm to be able to work; but the strangers in summer are generally well enough able, if they could only get it. Persons have never been observed begging there on Sundays, who earned the means of subsistence during the week by labour; and Archdeacon Whitty remarked, that he met very few begging who were able to work; and he has very rarely encountered an able-bodied man begging in the parish at all; he seldom, in fact, saw an individual seeking for public relief who was not an object of charity, except in the months of July or August. The wives and children of employed labourers and cottiers are not found begging there. Though it is not customary for the cottier tenants, after planting their potatoes, to go wandering about the country, nor is that habit regularly pursued there as in some parts of the province of Connaught, yet it was admitted by all the witnesses to be getting more frequent and common. Two small cottier families went away that year, the potato crop having been a failure in that district. One family consisted of six children, besides the man and his wife; and they held about about half an acre of ground. According to the testimony of several labourers and tradesmen, the cottier tenants and tradesmen are far more reluctant to beg than the labourers; and it was well known that many of the labourers in the town were much worse off than several of those who are now begging belonging to the labouring classes. M'Namara, for instance, who had been used to superior comforts, and was an intelligent man, could read and write well; was ready, as he expressed it himself, to work like a horse, as a labourer, at 8*d.* a day, when he had no employment as a weaver. He is not able to make by his trade, with the greatest exertion, 4*d.* a day throughout the year. He has a family of six children, besides his wife and an aged parent, whom he supports as well as he can, and that is badly enough; and his old father says he must go begging soon, as he cannot get enough to eat to keep body and soul together. This has been the wretched condition of M'Namara's family for the last three years; and the labourers and cottiers expressed themselves decidedly of opinion, that had they to bear such hardships for so long a period, they would rather beg in their own parish even than endure such privations for such a length of time. According to Mr. Nolan, there must be a great many broken down tradesmen amongst the great crowds of beggars who pass through Ennistymon; but Thynne, the shopkeeper, said he did not think so. He frequently discovered impositions; and a great many say they are tradesmen, because they think thereby to excite greater compassion. There were no servants either disabled or out of employment begging there. Carrig remarked, that if there was one class more able than another to economise, it is the farm servants while they are young, and provided they are prudent. The gentlemen's servants too have great opportunities of laying by; and he knew four of them in that parish who regularly sent their money to the savings' bank at Ennis. There are a great many cottier tenants begging in that neighbourhood, who come from the county of Galway during the summer season; but there were no instances of persons holding even the smallest portions of land leaving that part of the country to go beg in others, which had come under the notice of any of the witnesses.

Upon the subject of the old men resigning their property to their children and going to beg, it was observed that they might, and frequently do, give it up so when they get old, reserving for themselves a small portion of land, just enough to produce food for their own consumption, and to enable them, by selling a little, to procure tobacco, which is considered quite indispensable in this country, both to old and young; but then, when a very hard season comes on, and the family can scarcely support themselves, the old person will go out; and there has never been an instance known of an individual becoming a mendicant under such circumstances returning to fix himself again with his family. "Shame wears away," as Dogherty remarked; "and every body knows that an old man or woman will have more comforts by going among Christians, than if they stopped with their own."

Many labourers leave that part of the country for the counties of Tipperary and Kilkenny, to mow the hay, dig potatoes and reap the harvest. These are called "spalpeens," and are induced to leave home on account of the higher rate of wages that they get there. Lysaght, a labourer, said, "It seldom amounts to a penny a day more than they would get in the county of Clare; but one halfpenny, in addition to what we usually receive, would take us far away from home, even to where we subject ourselves to hard treatment; for we are worse treated in those times by the farmers than the slaves in the Indies. A few dry potatoes, three times in the day only to eat, which we must swallow as hard as we can; plenty of rough words, and a little straw, which is chucked into an outhouse or shed, just as you would treat a pig, serves us for a bed; and in this way we must make ourselves as happy as we can for three long, long months." Higgins also said upon this point, "About two years ago three men went from this parish to England, and they brought back good news; there was work there, and they were well pleased; they each brought back about 3*l.*, and a second-hand suit of clothes, which they purchased there. I dare say more will go over next year, when the fright about the cholera in England has passed away, and when the other labourers hear that those men were so fortunate." None of the labourers who go to the low countries ever beg.

The mendicants who visit this district are chiefly from the counties of Tipperary and Limerick; and Malone, a cottier, observed, that he knew well, from what he heard them say, that they were from the neighbourhood of small towns, of which there were many in those counties. When he asks them where they are come from, they generally reply they are from near Thurles or Limerick, or some other town of the kind. Archdeacon Whitty said, "The reason why I think so many come from the counties of Tipperary and Limerick is easily given. Our labourers go to the counties to work during the harvest season, and of course they communicate the localities of the county of Clare; and as a great many gentlemen come to the sea-bathing places on this coast from that part of Ireland, the beggars follow them in the hopes of reaping a rich harvest, in which I believe, from all accounts, they are tolerably successful."

It was thought by all present that no persons beg from choice; necessity is the great cause; and invariably, when the feeling of pride and independence is once lost, habit, and the profits arising from mendicancy, induce individuals to continue that mode of life in preference to steady work and industrious means of earning a livelihood. This remark, however, does not apply to the labourers' wives, who are sometimes compelled, in unusual seasons of distress, to crave alms for six weeks or two months or so. They will always, however, stay at home while they can get on at all; and besides, their husbands will not allow them to go out while they can procure work themselves.—(Keane.)——Daly, the innkeeper, said, "It is to the high rents and the taxes that they attribute being driven out to beg; and very often they tell us that they were in opulence and comfort at one time. We are bound to believe them, as they are generally civil and inoffending, and because they address us decently." All present agreed in saying that some persons of course adopt this line of life, owing to the facilities afforded by it; and there seemed to be an unanimous feeling that a system of workhouses would considerably diminish the number of mendicants; and one or two intelligent witnesses mentioned the effects of the mendicity at Ennis in proof of this assertion. The beggars there had diminished in number; and as Mara observed, the deserving were relieved, and the undeserving would not accept relief, as they did not like to be deprived of their liberty.

As to the quantity of meal and potatoes which an able-bodied beggar would be likely to collect in a day, it was agreed that, at the time of potato digging, they will often have four or five stone weight, at 16 pounds each; but at that time they are plenty and cheap.

In summer they would do well if they could bring in a stone; a middle aged man without children, according to Donoghue and others, can collect much more than he requires himself; but a man and a woman with children will not have much to spare, as they require more than their own consumption, according to their numbers. "In this town," said Thynne, "it is the single men and women who regularly sell their potatoes after coming home to the poor in their neighbourhood, and nobody has ever seen a beggar with a family disposing of what they have been enabled to collect. It is therefore quite clear that the least deserving objects are best off: the single persons eat as much as they require, and smoke a great deal, whereas a large family, who are in the greatest want, barely get more than is absolutely necessary for the day's use." There is only one car or public conveyance through the town, and the beggars occasionally get a few halfpence from the passengers. Collections are also frequently made at the roman-catholic chapel for poor householders; the regular beggars are aware of this, and therefore do not attend in numbers at the chapel doors to seek for alms.

In answer to the question whether the quantity of relief given at a farmer's door would be increased in proportion to the number in the family applying, John Malone, a cottier, remarked, "that when you see a woman with a large family, you must give a little increase, but by no means in proportion to the numbers, when they exceed three or four. It is the most common thing in the world for families to divide in summer, one part taking one side of the country, while the remainder go on another way; and he has often remarked to his neighbours in the country, that he had seen a family thus divided, unite themselves going into Ennistymon." He also at several times has seen them so large, that they would bare dividing it into three parts. With regard to whether an able-bodied man or an infirm person would get more in the day, Mahony said, "When you see a man that is able to walk well, you say to yourself, 'that fellow is able to travel, and if I refuse him, he will get it somewhere else;' but when a woman with children presents herself, she will always get more than an infirm person; and we give because we know she cannot travel quick, or go to many houses in the day." It is a small portion, however, will do for an old man. It is generally believed that, though an able-bodied person without children will collect less on the whole than a person with them, yet at the end of the day they will have far more to sell, inasmuch as the man or woman will require almost all they can collect, if the family be all at large, for their own consumption. It was remarkable there, as well as in every district the Assistant Commissioners visited, that families seldom, if ever, have been observed selling their potatoes, whereas few of the single beggars refrain from doing so.

Those single persons who are thus in the habit of disposing of their surplus collections, lay out their profits in buying quantities of tobacco; those with families, therefore, are accustomed to lay up the profits of their surplus, fearing that they might not have enough at another time, when the weather might prevent them from going out as usual. Thynne said upon this subject, "I know five or six resident beggars, who regularly sell their surplus potatoes at the crane in Ennistymon, besides an indefinite number of strangers. I have observed some of these poor creatures buying cheap quilts at 2*s.* 6*d.* each, or other decent matters of the kind." They do not often buy tea, and rarely if ever spirits. As to the point about their profits being affected by their being well or badly dressed, M'Carthy, the cottier, observed, that "if a well dressed resident beggar, who was well known, applied for relief, he would be welcome, and get as much as he wanted; or if a sickly stranger came, he would receive enough too; and though a great many persons might be suspicious when a well dressed stranger applied to them, yet one would be apt to say, 'he must be poor indeed to induce him to beg.'" As to saving any provisions in summer, or at any other time, it was generally agreed that those who have families never have more than 48 hours provisions at any time. It is not thought that they ever save for the winter, inasmuch as provisions are more plentiful and cheaper than in summer.

The beggars very seldom say anything when they apply for charity. The real objects just stand at the door of the cabin, and the woman always knows what they come for, and what they want, and she gives them alms accordingly. Mulqueany said, that the only remark he hears them make is, that they have not broken their fast for 24 hours. Upon inquiry whether rags or dirt and misery were not often fostered for the purpose of exciting pity, more than one of the persons present indignantly replied, that the greatest number of the beggars could not help dressing themselves in rags, and that those very rags were all that many of them had to sleep in at night. Archdeacon Whitty also observed, that he is quite sure that 80 out of 100 of the children who apply at his house for charity, have not even the semblance of a pair of trousers, and it was only the day before that a boy, who was stark naked, appeared shivering in the cold, asking for relief. Lysaght also said, that an Irishman was far too proud to go about in rags, if he could afford to do otherwise. It was stated that it was only the "boccoughs" who had recourse to such practices as encouraging sores on their bodies for the purpose of exciting greater sympathy. There was a man there some time ago.

ago, who used to tie up his arm to make it look shrivelled, and in the evening he oiled it to give it its natural appearance and elasticity.

Vagrants were not considered in that quarter to be dissolute in their habits. It was the custom, however, for the "boccoughs" to meet in the evenings and drink, but not for the regular beggars. The ordinary mendicants were never known to be concerned in any outrages upon person or property in that quarter of the country, and such a thing never was heard of there as a confirmed vagrant emigrating to America; and so far from their going from that quarter to England, that many come from places nearer England than that place. When the witnesses were asked as to the different degree of kindness exercised by the beggars towards their children, and by the lower orders in general, some one observed that they were just as fond as the King was of his children, and that the mother will often take the bit from her own mouth to give it to her child. Archdeacon Whitty said that beggars do share their earnings with one another; and it was no later than last Sunday that he saw a poor women give a halfpenny out of 2*d.* she had collected to another mendicant, and he was sure that if they were able to spare it more frequently, they would often be found willingly sharing it with one another. Their kindness and attention, in fact, to each other is unbounded, and scarcely can be mentioned. As to hoarding their earnings, the beggars in that district scarcely ever leave enough to bury them, and the consequence is that halfpenny subscriptions have frequently to be made to cover their funeral expenses.—(Keane).——This clearly proves that they are not able to hoard in that quarter of the country. It is to pay for the wake, and the mass for their souls, that the old beggars are in the habit of scraping a little together, and this they will do if possible under any circumstances. It has not been known that the children with mendicants have been either hired or borrowed, and it is not even suspected, because the poor in general have families large enough.

The families of mendicants, beyond all doubt, exceed five in number on an average. It rarely happens that a beggar gets married whilst leading a vagrant life; they are more frequently reduced after marriage. Archdeacon Whitty said, that for 15 years he did not recollect a beggar's marriage. There certainly are 10 vagrants in that parish who have bastard children. They could not speak for the strangers, but they suspect that many of the young women who are going about there with children have had no husbands. No mendicants have recently died in that neighbourhood, except from ordinary causes; and Dr. Finucane said that they are in general a very healthy class of people, in consequence of the constant and regular exercise they take.

There can be no doubt that the condition of the beggar is far preferable to that of the regular labourer, and yet it seems strange that so few young able-bodied labourers attempt to avail themselves of the advantages of a vagrant mode of life. Shame, and the feeling of being outcasts from their homes and families, can be the only barrier against so tempting a change. In all the visits of the Assistant Commissioners to the abodes of the village beggars, they invariably observed that they are better supplied with pigs than their more unfortunate neighbours; and several instances came under their observation of women with two or three pigs going out to seek relief from the public. The dunghills also in front of their cabins were invariably larger, and better stocked with manure, than those of the generality of poor labourers; for, as Lysaght remarked, when the labourer is depending upon five or six months' hire, the beggar can stick to his trade every day, bad and good.

Thynne observed, as to the extent of knowledge they have of each applicant, that "they know nothing indeed about them in general; they suppose they are objects, and in want, and they give for the honour of God, and for the good of their souls." Although the witnesses could not be got at first to acknowledge the mischief arising to society from the present system of mendicancy, they succeeded at length, with the assistance of the more reasoning individuals who attended the examinations, in extracting from their opinions, proving clearly that the present system of relief has, and must have a tendency to increase pauperism. All present agreed that a mendicant will never forsake a strolling life; and according to Dogherty, he will never give it up; his spirit is broken, he finds it an easier life than that of the labourer, and he is well inclined to remain in his degraded situation. They have always been found too to have every objection to work. And Daly said, "I have often given employment to boys who were begging, saving turf, &c., but I always found them go off after getting their bellies full."

No attempt is ever made to ascertain the character of the beggar before alms are given; and Malone said, "If you made any remark upon a man whose bag was full, he would say 'he had a family at home,' or he would tell you any lie that would come into his head."

A night's lodging is invariably given to the beggars by the poor labourers, or the very small farmers, and it was ascertained that few farmers holding more than nine or ten-acre farms would offer a night's lodging, unless under very particular circumstances. The better description consider that they have performed their parts of the duty, by giving the mendicants the straw, which is then taken to the poor man's house. It is clear, therefore, that the man who can least afford to be sick, or to have his little things carried away, is the very person who, from his charitable feelings, runs the greatest risk in catching any contagious diseases which may be prevalent, or of being robbed of his shirt, trousers or shoes, articles of the greatest value to labourers, and which they have frequently lost by thus harbouring mendicants.

The greater number of beggars do certainly wear the cast-off clothes of the farmers, who are much in the habit of giving them to the poor people when they are almost worn to rags; "and bad enough they are then," said Malone, "for we are too poor to give them away until they almost fall off of us." In summer seasons the farmers give sour milk extensively, and many of the poorest of them, when potatoes are too scarce to give away, offer a drink of milk instead. There is little meal made in that district, and none given away. The relief afforded to the beggars is principally in potatoes, and the farmers prefer giving provisions to money, because the former is always close at hand, whilst the other is scarcely seen from year to year, except when they are making the rents up. The beggars themselves would invariably prefer money to provisions, as they would then be able to purchase a variety of different articles besides food. Tobacco, which is so generally used amongst them, cannot be had except with money. Several instances were known there of beggars refusing potatoes when offered them, owing to the low prices which they would sell for when exposed to the scales; but Keane remarked, that this has only happened when potatoes were very plentiful.

There is no limitation whatsoever to the quantity given away, but none have a better chance than those who come first; and Daly said they all know this well, for he has seen them jostling one another when coming along the road towards his house. With regard to the quantity likely to be given, it was observed that the women, who are generally the dispensers of charity, never look to what they give, they would consider it sinful to do so. Mr. Daly said upon this point, " At the time of picking the potatoes, I have often told the beggars to help themselves to what they required, and I have always observed that they took about the same quantity which my wife would have given them; they know very well the quantity usually given to each person, and they help themselves accordingly." As to the fact of any persons being supported as pensioners on the bounty of the gentry, none of the witnesses present (at the moment they were very numerous) knew of a single instance where a poor family was supported by a rich person in that parish. Upon inquiry into the fact, whether any person would give away as much food as would be equal in value to the maintenance of an individual workman or labourer, none of the farmers present thought that they did give away so much, and the shopkeepers, after some consideration, entertained the same opinion; but they all agreed that Mr. Thynne, a most benevolent tradesman in the town, gave away as much in charity as would keep three or four additional shopmen. No such practice exists of the shopkeepers giving regular weekly allowances to resident beggars, for every day is helping day at Ennistymon. It is not customary either for small farmers to plant portions of ground and to give the produce to the poor.

No persons present found any difficulty in answering the question, on whom the burthen of supporting the poor chiefly fell; both high and low, all agreed that it rested chiefly on the poorest classes, those in fact who were least able to bear it; for not only do the poor support the beggars while they are alive, but the burthen of burying them when they die devolves upon that class also.

As to the inconvenience of beggars to the different orders of society, it was observed that the shopkeepers are certainly in some degree annoyed by their frequent visits to their shops and houses; yet at the same time they agreed that it has seldom happened that an illnatured or abusive word has been applied to them. The richer classes in that district are few in number, and these persons, as usual, take the precautionary means to avoid the annoyance of visits from wandering mendicants. As to the proportion in which the different classes give charity, it was agreed on all hands that the industrious give all, and that the rich man's donations in that part of the country would not keep five beggars from starving. The labouring men never refuse, if they have anything in the house to give away; and Carrig observed, " I have frequently to collect at the chapel for desolate and sick people, and I often see the labouring man give a halfpenny while I cannot get one farthing from some of the rich farmers who attend mass on Sundays." The day labourers cannot often give away many potatoes to the beggar, for he is worse off himself, but he lets him have a night's lodging for the honour of God, and often fire to boil his potatoes.

As was mentioned before, the fact of several beggars selling their surplus potatoes proves that many of them get much more than they require. This uncertainty of ascertaining how much each beggar has received does not exactly lead to improvidence, it was conceived, but rather to a misappropriation of charity.

It was found quite impossible to ascertain how much was given away by a farmer holding about 10 acres of land, for there was the greatest reluctance to answer the question; and as Malone observed, " It is God only who knows what we give away, and it is not men's business." They could ascertain no instance of a person having given away so much as to be afterwards left destitute himself, by failure of crops or other emergency. The same difference of opinion was found there as elsewhere about the preference of giving a yearly sum to remaining open to the constant annoyance of beggars; for while the shopkeepers on one side, headed by the benevolent Mr. Thynne, warmly expressed themselves in favour of a provision for the poor, as being the means of more fairly distributing the burthen at present so unequally proportioned, the farmers on the other side, excepting one or two of the most intelligent of them, dreaded the imposition of any fresh tax, conceiving themselves already assessed far beyond their means.

It was agreed that charity was generally given from the fear that the party applying was suffering from great want; custom and religious feeling were another motive; but according to Malone, the delight experienced by women in listening to the prayers of mendicants has the most powerful influence in urging people often to give beyond their means. It was well known in that part of the country, that the beggar who would say the longest and best composed prayers would inevitably meet with the greatest success in collecting alms. The Assistant Commissioners were assured by the roman-catholic clergyman and many of the people themselves, that if any provision was extended to the poor, the benevolent would no longer feel themselves obliged to relieve travelling mendicants; and as Donoghue observed, " We would tell them we paid for their support, and they must go look for it to the others, who were managing the business." Violence is never resorted to in that rural district to extort alms, and the mendicants are, generally speaking, quiet and civil. O'Reilly said the "boccoughs" will talk and scream, and make you give them something, and if you refuse they will often spit at you. Very few people now care about the beggar's curse. A woman with child would certainly never refuse relief, let the person be ever so unworthy of it; and Mulqueany said, "I know my wife always gives when she is big with child, and she says she must do it, or she would have a miscarriage."

Diseases have frequently been spread through the country from the system of giving night's lodgings to beggars, and fewer have been observed invariably in that district to break out in the poor man's house. Amongst many recent instances of the bad effects resulting from this custom, the following was mentioned to the Assistant Commissioners: "A few days before that, James O'Brien took in a beggar woman, not knowing at the time that she was infected with fever; he soon discovered it, however, for in 36 hours he was taken ill of it himself, and after a short illness died. His poor children took it one by one, and they were then lying at home with very little chance of recovery. The doctor is kind and attentive to them, and the parish priest, who is a good man, goes to them every day. A collection was made for the wife and children at the chapel the Sunday before, and if the family do recover they must live on the charity of their neighbours for a long time, as they have nothing left in the wide world to support them." It had not been observed there, that the moral habits of the lower orders were injured by their association with beggars; for though they might amuse the poor people by their different stories and tales, yet no mischievous effects can be said to have arisen in consequence of their fabricating any of them.

There was no instance known in that part of the country of a vagrant returning to habits of industry after having once adopted that mode of life; and the Rev. Mr. M'Nally observed, what inducement could he possibly have, while the condition of the generality of labourers was so wretched and bad, and so much inferior to that of most mendicants? Archdeacon Whitty also remarked, that he knew from experience it was unnatural to suppose a person would give up a good thing for a bad one. The beggars get as much as they require without work; while the labourer, let him be ever so willing to work, is likely to be without a sufficient quantity of food during part of the year. The "boccoughs" so invariably become a separate, and in the eyes of the people, a very degraded and immoral class of mendicants.

It seemed to be a very general feeling among all the better classes, that in addition to some relief for the impotent poor, a vagrant law would be necessary to repress mendicancy; and Archdeacon Whitty observed, that if work were provided for all the able-bodied men who were then wandering about the world, he individually could see no earthly difficulty in strictly enforcing laws to repress vagrancy.

There is no house of industry or mendicity institution whatsoever in that district. Among the number of persons who were asked by the Assistant Commissioners whether they would be willing to go into a house of the kind, and lodging would be equal to that usually enjoyed by labouring people, there always appeared to be the greatest reluctance to enter any institution at all where they would be deprived of their personal liberty; but though the great body of the mendicants prefer their present condition, yet individuals were frequently met, who, from old age and accident, were so incapacitated, that they readily assured them no greater boon could be conferred on them, than the establishment of some institution for their reception and relief.

VAGRANCY was stated to have increased in this parish, owing to high rents, low price of corn, and the want of employment for labourers. "Several families," says Dixon, "have been ejected within the last three years in this neighbourhood; and although they are not as yet reduced to the last stage of destitution, if employment be not given to them, which seems very unlikely at present, they must inevitably add to the already great number of mendicants belonging to Corofin and its immediate vicinity. These poor ejected tenants drag on a very precarious existence, and are sheltered by the farmers, who are in general very kind, and occasionally give them employment." The exact number of vagrants was not, however, ascertainable, but they are very numerous, and mostly from the village of Corofin. Several of the farmers exclaimed, "that they were worried all day, and from morning to night, with the number who called at their houses." The opinion, certainly, of several of the witnesses conveyed this impression, that the numbers who solicit alms in this and the adjoining parish cannot be less than 90 or 100. "It is not surprising," says M'Namara, "that there should be so many beggars in this district, when you consider how difficult it is for for a labourer to get any work at all." Several labourers, with whom the Commissioners conversed at Corofin, were in the habit of going and returning, nearly seven miles daily, to work on a road at which they had been engaged for a short time, at the rate of 6 d. a day in the winter, and 8 d. in the summer, without diet. Soon after the arrival of the Assistant Commissioners at Corofin, the road, which had employed no less than 40 of these poor creatures, was finished, and the whole number was left without any employment whatsoever, so much so, that they assured the Assistant Commissioners that they were prepared at that moment not only to engage themselves, if the Government were inclined to offer any employment, but to bring with them at least 200 more, who would be happy to work hard for 6 d. a day.

June, July and August are the periods at which vagrancy prevails most here, when there is little work, and scarcely any food in the country. "The mendicants relieved in this neighbourhood," says Hickey, "are mostly our own; and though this may seem strange, it can be easily accounted for: the name of property which this place has acquired, holds out no inducement to their flocking hither." Vagrants are principally widows and children; a few are the wives of distressed and sickly labourers; and scarcely any are the wives of mechanics. Kenny says, "The resident beggars go about singly; they leave their children at home, or send them to school. The strangers, from their circumstances not being known, invariably take their families along with them, in order to excite compassion." The reason why women and children principally constitute the class of beggars seems to be, because the majority of the women are too infirm, and the children too young, to be profitably employed. No instance was known of a man earning his hire allowing his wife to beg, but there are four or five persons with long families, who sometimes are unable to provide for them, and then send out their wives to beg potatoes. This district is almost entirely agricultural; yet it was admitted on all hands, that the weavers, who are a most distressed class of mechanics in this parish, are strikingly reluctant to seek for alms; they will not beg until the last penny is gone. The cases are rare of small farmers making over their little holdings in their old age upon their children, and becoming beggars; but there are many persons in the commons of Kilnaboy holding one or two acres, who were known to have transferred their property in that way, and to have become mendicants. No persons go from this parish to England, in want of employment. Many, however, go to the county Tipperary at harvest, chiefly to the district about Thurles. Being young men, they never beg. The distance is short; two days will bring them there; "and," says Hogan, "2 s. will be the outside it will cost."

It is generally believed that the children of beggars, when they grow up, either go to service or enlist in the army. "I do not know," adds Kenny, "any one beggar in Corofin, who has not at some time or another earned his bread. Bad clothing, bad health, and scarcely anything to eat, have made many infirm, and reduced them to go out then and face the world." Mr. Fitzgerald remarks, "that the facilities of procuring relief must have some effect in increasing the number of vagrants; and it is only surprising, considering how easy it is for any but the able-bodied to procure alms, that one half of the people do not become mendicants, for their situation is decidedly preferable to that of the majority of labourers."

Most of the persons present were of opinion, that on an average, during six months of the year, two stone of potatoes in the day would be about the quantity collected by each beggar, and though several mendicants were in the habit of selling their surplus collections, yet a beggar with a family would scarcely procure more than sufficient for them. A labourer present quietly remarked, that "want is out of the question with the man that is satisfied to beg."

The quantity given is proportioned to the size of the family; the greater the family, the greater the compassion. When the family is large, strangers sometimes separate into parties, and beg in that way; but the residents cannot be deceived thus, they are too well known. At any particular application, an infirm person will get more than an able-bodied, but the latter, though often refused, will have more to sell at the end of the day.

When beggars obtain more food than they can consume, they sell the surplus generally to poor labourers with large families, who are much worse off than themselves, but are too proud to be seen begging. These poor creatures are glad to have opportunities of buying small quantities of potatoes, which they could not otherwise get at the market. "We pay," says M'Mahon, "rather more than the market price to the beggars, but this we do not mind or feel, because they will let us have as small a quantity as we want at a time." What they procure by selling their surplus collections they expend in tea, and more frequently in tobacco, but never in spirits. Tobacco, they say, they must all get, of which they use a great quantity; and they affirm they would rather die than be without tobacco. Very few of the mendicants can be said to dissipate their earnings; this character applying more to the boccoughs, who frequent fairs and markets. "But," says Dixon, "there cannot be a doubt that they enjoy advantages, nay, one may almost add luxuries, compared with the majority of the labouring classes." The Assistant Commissioners, in support of this view, conceive it their duty to add, that not only in Corofin, but almost in every village in which mendicants congregate, which they duly visited, the general appearance and internal arrangements of the houses of professed beggars, betrayed a degree of comfort that was quite foreign to the habitation of the wretched but contented labourer. Whilst at Corofin, they were particularly struck with the immense heaps of manure that were piled up against certain houses in one of the back lanes, and upon inquiry it was ascertained that these were the abodes of many old women, who are well known as mendicants, and who daily leave the village in search of alms. These dung heaps are sold to the labourers who have not enough to manure their little con-acre, the mendicants not requiring it for themselves, though they collect collect manure in their wanderings. So far from observing any of the consequences of depravity in those houses, it is but justice to this class to say, that nothing but decorum and propriety was found in their dwellings, and so anxious were these mendicants to show how attentive they were to the education of the younger class of the family, that frequently the Commissioners were prevailed on by their solicitation to sit down, and hear the children read, and inspect their copy-books, which evidenced a regular attendance at school, and a laudable thirst for learning.

In this part of the country vagrants seldom give any account of themselves, nor did any one of the witnesses ever detect any case of deception among vagrants. Indeed, as several said, it is so much the custom of the country to give without asking any questions, that no one observes particularly when dealing out charity. Vagrants seldom present petitions to the country people or to the humble classes, but to the higher these petitions are often frequently shown; and the Rev. Mr. Allen said, that he detected among strange mendicants so many instances of imposition, that he believed the greater part of these documents to be forged. Boccoughs only refuse to have their sores cured; and it is believed of the others, that they carry their children about in wet and cold, to render them still more pitiable objects. This state of mind must of course be incompatible with sound moral feeling.

The Rev. William Allen says, "Beggars are exceedingly well-behaved. At the time the country was disturbed, not one of them was tried for any crime." And M'Mahon, who has the sessions book, observed, "that not one of them had been summoned before a magistrate for the last six years." And every one agreed in the good character of the beggars in this district, the boccoughs excepted. The confirmed vagrant never emigrates, nor goes to England in search of work. "What could they do there?" says Nolan; "they have lost all habits of industry, nor do they know how to use a spade." Beggars are very kind to their children, and send them to school; and the Rev. Mr. Allen remarked, "More would send them to school if they had decent clothing." No instance was ever known here of beggars hoarding money.

It is often remarked that beggars have larger families than comfortable people, yet amongst resident beggars here, the proportion of illegitimate children is not supposed to be greater than among the labouring classes, the latter being much exposed to danger at wakes, dances, &c. &c. On the point of relative mortality, it was stated that many of the labourers died during the cholera, while comparatively few of the beggars were cut off.

It is not thought that a strong, hale, able-bodied man would obtain as much by begging as he would earn by labour; but there is no doubt that the man who has plenty of work still left in him, yet looks a little sickly and weak, and is not very young, would find it a more profitable speculation to beg. The labourer has to pay 5*l.* for a con-acre, the rent of which he makes up by a pig and his labour. For the former, the price is so low it does not remunerate him, and the latter is precarious and uncertain. The beggar has no rent to pay, and is always sure of having enough to eat. There is no doubt that, all things considered, he is better off than the labourer with a large family, but in what degree it is not easy to ascertain.

There is no knowledge for the most part by those who give of the character of those to whom they give alms, so that it would seem that indiscriminate charity does materially increase the number of vagrants; yet it has not been observed to be prejudicial to the morals of the people. When persons have been wandering vagrants for some time, they prefer that life to a labourer's, but at the commencement begging is the last shift. No instance was known of a labourer becoming a mendicant in preference to working.

The previous collection of a beggar is not inquired into, and alms are freely given to utter strangers.

A night's lodging is given to beggars by labourers and cottiers, but not by farmers holding above five acres; and with regard to giving clothes, Hehir says, "If we had them we would readily give them; but there is not one small farmer out of 30 that is able to dress his own children decently, and there are many of the labourers' children that are obliged to stay from school because of the want of clothes." Upon visiting the houses of the poor of this parish, and particularly at Corofin, the Assistant Commissioners were struck with the number of children most miserably clad, while several were in a state of perfect nudity. There cannot be a doubt that the labourers are worse off in this district than in any of the several parts visited by the Assistant Commissioners. According to the evidence, the superabundant number of labourers seems to be the cause. The principal relief given to beggars consists of potatoes, meal being seldom given; and as many of the farmers as have cows give milk too, but no money. They have the food always at hand, but not the money, though the vagrant would prefer the latter.

There is no limitation to the quantity of food given. "No creature," says Halloran, "that asks me, in the honour of God, that does not get some little of potatoes or milk: but the quantity mostly given is about four or five potatoes, weighing about two pounds." Upon inquiring of witnesses whether any persons were supported by rich families as pensioners, all agreed that there was no such thing here. The Assistant Commissioners however ascertained that there were several persons materially assisted by the benevolence of Mrs. Bridgeman, the wife of the present member for Ennis, whose kindness towards the poor, and zeal in promoting education among their children is so great, both here and in her own immediate neighbourhood, that the Assistant Commissioners feel bound to mention this lady's exemplary conduct. It was thought that some farmers give away as much as would enable them to diet an additional labourer, but no one could say that any of the shopkeepers gave as much as would enable them to support an additional workman.

The evidence given here fully corroborated that received and repeated in many other places, places, that the relief of the poor is borne by the poor themselves; in other words, it is the class of small farmers on whom the burthen of supporting the poor principally falls, confirming the observation elsewhere made, that though individually the large farmer may give more in the aggregate, it would be found that the small expended, in proportion to their means, twice as much. As to the absentees, they neither appear to give nor to answer the applications which have been forwarded to them in seasons of great distress. "Twice," said the Rev. Mr. Allen, "I applied, on the occasion of cholera, to certain absentee proprietors, and never even did I receive an answer to my letters." The rich scarcely give anything as compared with the poor, even the mere labourers, who have nothing but a cabin, relieve the poor beggar. Assistant Commissioners were in several such houses when relief was given to beggars.

Beggars must often receive more than they actually want, owing to the impossibility of the discovery of their previous collection by the person giving relief; yet this leads not to waste, but undoubtedly to a misapplication of charity.

Many instances are on record of diseases being spread by lodging beggars for the night; but no opinion could be formed positively of moral evils accruing thence to the labourers' families.

Those who for any considerable time follow a vagrant life are not known to return to industry; yet the only class of beggars that form a community to themselves are the boccoughs, who frequent fairs, &c. &c.

No punishment has been inflicted for vagrancy in this district; and the opinion of the magistrates, "as long as there is no relief for any class of mendicants, so long there could be no rigorous enforcement of the vagrant law."

There is no house of industry nearer than Ennis, a distance of seven miles; nor would beggars be willing to enter one. Such was the opinion of every person present, they having frequently refused to go into the one at Ennis, and when there, many have wished to come out again.

Fitzgerald.—MARTIN HALPIN, labourer, occasionally employed.—MARY HALPIN, his wife, always begging in Newmarket.—MICHAEL KEOGH and JAMES GEARAN, small farmers, holding about 12 acres each.—Rev. CARROL, the labourer, observed, "that one day with another he did not see less than 40 beggars in the village and about the parish." Sheils, the carpenter, also said, "that it was his opinion that there are 60, and sometimes more persons who stand about the caravans, and depend upon an odd halfpenny; they have nothing else to depend on but what they get in charity. Seven beggars that he did not know at all called on him that day, for the very minute the door is open in the morning they will begin coming, and not stop till evening, and if they do not give to them they must face the country; he knew there were double as many as there were some years ago;" and Carrol said, "that they were ten to one what they were in his recollection." The poorer class attribute the great increase of vagrancy to the ejection of tenants, and to the high price of land, which prevents each of them from having ground to plant potatoes, (provincially called "mock ground.") Many of the higher and richer orders pass over the clearing of land as a cause, and say that the additions to the ranks of mendicancy are to be explained by the increase of population, by improvidence, and even by idleness. In confirmation, however, of the first class of causes, Sheils, the carpenter, said, that there were upwards of 200 inhabitants of the parish of Tomfinloe, who had not 20 acres of land amongst them; and that the chief part of the labourers of the town had not a rod of ground. They find the utmost difficulty in procuring a lot of "con-acre," and even the herd who shows it must get 1*s.* for every quarter of an acre. The landlords are well aware of this practice. M'Namara, the labourer, said, that upwards of 200 fines were quenched in Mahanish about nine years ago, and he counted from 10 to 15 families who then took refuge in Newmarket, and many of whom have since been reduced to beggary. Four or five families were driven from Ballygreen, and some of these are also now begging; "these people," said he "kept good kitchens of bacon, they rode good horses, and had nice milch cows, and were honest hard-working persons."

The summer months there, as elsewhere, are the periods at which vagrancy is most common, particularly June, July and August. M'Namara observed, that numbers will struggle out until the summer, and then if there is anything like a scarcity, people will double and treble the price of potatoes; they could buy them at that season last year for 6*s.*, and in July last they were 1*l.* 2*s.*; the trust sent them up to 30*s.* The man who has but a quarter of an acre finds his provisions run out by that time, and then he must take to the road. almost inexhaustible fertility, and being extensively let out for the cultivation of potatoes, that root happens to be most abundant amongst the inhabitants. This land is called "the Corcasses;" and Mr. Hackney, the intelligent Scotch steward of Sir A. Fitzgerald, said that it is a great inducement to beggars not only to roam through the neighbourhood, but even to fix their residence in it. This assertion was borne out by several beggars themselves, with whom the Assistant Commissioners conversed, and who told them that they stopped there, because the people were particularly charitable. The fertility of the soil of these parishes, therefore, is not without a drawback. Very few of the beggars resident in that parish are natives of the place. The Rev. Mr. M'Cullagh stated, that in the parish of Kilnasullagh, which touches the town of Newmarket, there are but two destitute persons, and he is obliged to fill up his church list, which extends to 30 individuals, with the inhabitants of the town. By far the greater number of mendicants are women from 30 to 40 years of age, and they have generally several children with them. "This morning," said M'Namara, "a young woman of about 25 came to my door with seven children along with her, and they were crying and shaking, and what little clothes they had would hardly keep their bones from the wind." The Rev. Mr. O'Brien remarked, that the Mendicity at Ennis had thrown a great many beggars on these parts. Though it was chiefly women who solicited the alms, yet it was remarked by all present that men often accompany them; nevertheless the proportion of the women is greater, because many are widows, and many beg, because the wages of their husbands are not sufficient to support them and their children; in the mean time the husbands are perhaps wandering about elsewhere in search of work. Sheils observed, that the husbands will not go inside the doors with shame; they stay outside roaming about the road, or sneaking by the walls, or sitting by the road-side with their wives by. "The other day," said Carroll, "a woman asked me leave to boil a pot of potatoes, and when she had done she called in her husband and children to eat them; he looked pulled down with poverty, and indeed he had neither clothes nor flesh upon him." The Rev. Mr. Coffey said, that on the whole there were very few able-bodied of the male sex to be found begging. None of the wives of those who are permanently employed are known to beg on Sundays; but they have met the wives of some labourers begging who were only casually employed; they stated that their husbands were unable to procure adequate assistance, and indeed a single day's work at 8*d.* a day cannot go far. There were scarcely any cottier tenants in the parishes to which the Assistant Commissioners extended their inquiry, except in Kilnasullagh, where Sir Edward O'Brien has a good many tenants of that description. None of this class are ever known to beg, and their condition is considered most enviable by those labourers who are without any land. It was decidedly the opinion of all present, that mechanics were rarely to be met with begging, and that of whatever class they may be, they were the class most reluctant to do so. Sheils observed, that if he was reduced to beggary he would not shame his friends by remaining at home, he would go to a distance. Dr. Frazer remarked, that the cottier tenants of the agricultural population were most unwilling to beg. It rarely happens that the cottier tenantry of these parishes have recouse to it; but when they do they quit their native place. It is a common practice with small farmers to give portions of their land to their children as they get married, and in the end they leave themselves without any; but it rarely happens that they act thus with the intention of begging. Brasil, the farmer, however, mentioned an instance of one Halloran, who gave up his land to his five children, and then took to begging; the children were wroth and vexed that he should do so, and often complained to him that he would not stay with them. A good many going to England beg, and more pay their way, but then they stint themselves. None go to England from that parish, they never go farther than different parts of Leinster. If there was one Connaught man passed through this year on his way to England, there was a thousand. Mr. O'Brien added, that on their return from England there is a common practice among their "spalpeens" to select one individual worthy of being trusted, to whom they confide their money and send him off by the coach, in order that they may have no opportunity of spending it themselves; they then travel home themselves on foot, living by begging, or as well as they can.

They come from all parts of the surrounding country, many from Connaught; "these we know," said Brasil, "by their speaking a kind of Irish which we do not understand. I often see people from the county of Cork that I know by their wearing blue coats; they do be inquiring for 'Tradree,*' the place where all the potatoes grow, and they all the time in the very place itself." All parties agreed that most of the beggars came from the country parts. Sheils observed that there were not any grown up people in the town whose fathers and mothers had been beggars; almost all the beggars there were decent distressed people. Others, however, differed from him, and said that it would be difficult to assert whether the vagrants that pass through, being strangers, are or are not the children of beggars; but Dr. Frazer observed that he knew but one fellow in the town who has been a beggar from his cradle, and he is an incorrigible idler, and though well able to work, he has often refused to be employed, and says he would not be bothered earning 4*d.* a day. It was allowed on all hands, however, that the greater numbers have been reduced by the causes before mentioned; and Keogh and Brasil said that when they once take to begging they rather live by it than by working, and they know people's children begging, whose fathers and mothers stay at home home and go to mass on a Sunday in fine clothes. Brasil stated that an able-bodied man, setting out early in the morning, would get three or four stone of potatoes by begging; but though he might do that at the present season, when they are plenty, yet he would not be so successful at another period of the year, when they were scarce. He certainly can thus obtain more food than he himself can consume, as he does not require a stone of potatoes at farthest for his own use. They sell them in bags, and may be they would bring them twice into town in the course of the same day. The beggar will sell them to the poor housekeeper who is much worse off than himself, and who will not go out. Dr. Frazer observed that they do not get much in general, except at fair times, when the farmers and cattle jobbers, returning after a good market, will scatter a good deal of money among them. Collon, the weaver, observed that they were all strangers who attended at the chapels for charity, and for the most part infirm persons; the townspeople do not go there, because they would meet their own friends, and because they are so shabby that they would not like to be seen. Yesterday, at last mass, there were but four beggars, a blind woman led by her daughter, and three cripples: these all left the town after last mass. No beggars attend at the church, because the congregation always put their subscriptions into the poor-box. Brasil, M'Namara and Collon mutually remarked as follows upon the quantity given being increased by the number of applicants: "If the victuals are at hand we always give according to the size of the family; and if a family of 10 children came to us we would give them more than to five or six; because where would the 10 children be provided for if we do do not reach them more than the small family, sure they would die. If a cripple or an old man misses in one place, he will get it in another; if every house gave but one potato, a single person would get enough; the children cry, and we cannot help being more compassionate to them." These observations conveyed the general feeling towards a large family. The families of 10 split, and particularly in scarce seasons, when they hope to get more by doing so. They frequently stop at the Corcasses road, the one going one way, and the others another; and Collon observed that he often refused the last division, when he had found out that they had split or divided. Keogh observed that he would give most to a person with a family, next them to an old cripple, and least of all to an able-bodied fellow who could earn for himself; the able-bodied man would be sometimes refused, and in general would get but little; whereas the family would always receive a good quantity at each house, and would certainly have most at the end of the day. They will generally sell their surplus potatoes, if they are resident, to get lodgings. If they are strangers, the money which is made by their sale of these collections is applied in paying for mending their shoes, &c. M'Namara remarked that in scarce seasons he has observed single able-bodied men, with 6*d.* worth of potatoes, while other persons had not enough to eat. Except the beggars who attend the fairs and markets, called "boccoughs," they never see any of them drunk; they buy tea sometimes, and tobacco is as necessary to them as food. Sheils remarked, that the old women in Newmarket and such like towns, ask for tobacco in the house of God, and there was scarcely a beggar who did not spend a halfpenny each day in either that or snuff. It would not do for strange beggars to dress themselves well, but a resident one would do so if he could. Collon observed, that if two beggars were to come to him, he would certainly give to the badly dressed one in preference. If one was well dressed, unless he knew him, he would certainly take him for an impostor. The resident beggars of Newmarket are always ready to avail themselves of the clothes which are distributed by some benevolent persons in the neighbourhood, and in many instances appear decently dressed, while the strangers are observed to be generally clothed in heaps of rags. The Rev. Mr. Coffey observed that there was no necessity for beggars saving in summer, as provisions are so cheap and plentiful in winter, and he thought there were quite as many beggars in winter as summer, except during the months of July and August.

"We often challenge them," said Sheils, "on the plea of their begging, and they say they have no work at home; others tell us they never left home until they had pledged the bed and bed-clothes from under them, or that they have been left widows with orphans by the cholera; and indeed we have five or six widows from that terrible disease in Newmarket at present." The only case of deception that occurred there was that of two beggars who pretended to be deaf and dumb; they went about telling fortunes, and all the while they were acting as spies. Sheils said that they afterwards turned spies, and got some men hung at Ennis. He also said there were some known impostors who were very fond of exposing their sores, but they never heard that they produced any. At fairs, indeed, there were a good many fellows who, by the exposure of their infirmities, and by their importunity, succeeded in getting a good deal of money from the charitable and humane. "I have heard one of these chaps saying to another," said Brasil, "I will not give you my daughter, because you have had but one crooked leg, and that would never earn enough for her." Recommendations are never carried about by strangers; sometimes they are given by the parish priest and others to poor people of the neighbourhood who have suffered by any particular misfortune, such as the burning of their cabin, distress from sickness, &c., and it has never been discovered that this kind of recommendation has been forged. Dr. Frazer could only point out one instance of any of these refusing to have their diseases cured, from the benefit they were to them, and that was the case of a sawyer whose son was partially blind, and it had been frequently proposed to the father to send the child either to Dublin or to the county infirmary at Ennis, but he constantly declined, and he is now in the habit of soliciting alms on the score of his son's helplessness. He also thought that nothing was more likely than that offensive objects of the kind should be distressing to women, but he knew no very strong case of that description there. Many of the poor creatures who are now going in search of food are quite unable to give their children anything like sufficient clothing against against the severity of the weather. It is unnecessary for them to make them appear worse than their poverty keeps them. Brasil observed, however, that the taking about children by the old for the sake of compassion is very frequent, and he has lately observed several old women with children who could not possibly be their own, asking for alms. The Rev. Mr. Coffey also stated that no trade was more common, and that he had known one or two instances of young women with large families allowing their children to be taken from door to door, by way of duping the poor and more industrious classes, who have but little time to look at the objects frequently relieved at their doors. The Assistant Commissioners also once or twice remarked this species of fraud themselves.

The habits, generally speaking, of the strolling beggars are not dissolute; "but at the same time," observed Brasil, "I know no more ill-conducted fellows than the 'boccoughs,' who are a shocking bad set; they drink, curse, fight, and set a bad example to the rest of the people." "I am sure," said the Rev. Mr. Coffey also, "that they like their sores, and I should not be surprised if they made them worse; they break one another's heads, but they have never done more in the way of outrage." Gearan, a small farmer, observed, that he has known strong able-bodied beggars to come late at night to a labourer's house and ask for a night's lodging, which they would never be refused, and then run off in the middle of the night with many little things belonging to it. "And several times," said Mr. Coffey, "people have asked my advice what they should do, in consequence of the depredations committed by vagrants." The rich gentleman, the middle-man and the large farmer are exempt from these losses, because they are able to lock their gates at night and keep them all away; whilst the poor labourers living on the high road not only materially contribute to the beggar's support, but is actually, in addition to that, further exposed to losses which he can ill afford. Their habits are so inveterately idle, that they would never apply themselves to habits of industry, unless compelled to do so. Brasil said, "I have sometimes tried them at work, and they have made all sorts of excuses to get off. I remember once I offered a great big fellow work at harvest time, and he said he had no reaping-hook; I told him I would lend him one; and he then complained that he had something wrong about his knee, and that he should go to the dispensary to have it looked at; I let him off, and from that day to this I have never seen anything more of him." Gearan observed, that his neighbours told him they were stiff and lazy, and that many of them neither could nor would do anything. Keogh said, "There is Con Fennel, a beggar in this town, that may any day go to the poorhouse at Ennis; he is not fit to do much, as he is at times subject to fits; but yet he could be well employed, and would get it too, but he says he would rather be as he is, wending about asking alms. I am sure, however, that if he could get smoking there he would work well for them in that house." The Rev. Mr. O'Brien observed that there might be some willing to go to America, but not many of the regular strolling beggars. M'Namara said that nobody goes from that part of the country to England for work, it is too remote; but as for the vagrant, he never goes in search of any work anywhere, much less to England. The Rev. Mr. Coffey remarked, that though no doubt the morals of their children were exposed to great risk, yet he could not say that they were treated unkindly or harshly; they are jealous towards each other, and those who attend the coaches (almost all women) fight and squabble a great deal, particularly after a scramble, when any of the passengers throw them a few halfpence. They are not frequently known to hoard their earnings; but Lady O'Brien knew an old beggar-woman of Newmarket, whom she was in the habit of occasionally relieving, to have saved 6*l.* or 7*l., which she drew out of the savings' bank at Ennis upon some occasion. The children who accompany the mendicants are not known exactly to be hired; but this subject has been investigated before.

The mendicants are frequently accompanied by large families, but it has not been observed that they marry earlier than other members of the community; and the Rev. Mr. Coffey observed, that he did not remember ever marrying two beggars. Dr. Frazer thought, from his experience, that many of the females going about had been farm servants who, having been disgraced by having had an illegitimate child, were obliged to leave their places and betake themselves to mendicancy, during which period they will frequently increase their families unlawfully, and he thought that large families were too often the result of thus reducing women to mendicancy. There are many of these mendicants, a happy and contented set of people, who live to a great age; and when the cholera appeared, the doctor did not think there were more deaths amongst them than amongst the other people; in 1817, however, the fever killed a vast number of them.

Employment is very precarious in this neighbourhood. A man considers himself fortunate if he can procure four days' labour in the week, at 8*d.* a day without food; in winter he cannot even look to this, unless he be of the fortunate few who may be permanently employed by some resident gentleman or large farmer. A labouring man will get 8*d.* in summer, 6*d.* in winter, and sometimes 10*d.* or 1*s.* in harvest time; but supposing him to be employed every day in the year, 8*d.* a day would be a high average, for setting aside cottier tenants, who pay their rents in labour, no man is employed every day. It was before stated, that an able-bodied beggar, with common exertion, could procure three or four stone of potatoes in a day, and could easily dispose of the surplus, after having satisfied his wants, at a price never never lower than the market price, which may be taken at a low average of 1 ½ d. a stone all the year round. It follows, therefore, that he will at least be as well off as a labourer who is employed only three days in the week. The general opinion, however, seemed to be, that he was much better off; and Sheils observed, "The man who is employed only three days in the week is much worse off than the beggar, for the sturdy beggar follows his trade every day, and there is never a holiday amongst those kind of people."

Inquiries are seldom made as to the character of the applicant; and further than that, those who were not in need have often imposed on the charity of individuals. No effects prejudicial to morality have been observed from the habit of giving private relief; but idleness no doubt is generated by the system of giving alms in general. Major Creagh observed, that the greater part of the vagrants who appear in this district are females, who mostly give themselves out as widows; there is little employment for them, were they even willing to accept it. As for the able-bodied man who would wander about, he would hesitate to say that they have renounced industry through a preference for idleness and beggary; distress has perhaps reduced them to mendicancy in the first instance, and they may have then continued it, from finding how easy it was to live by it. "When we have work to give," said Dr. Frazer, "we do not require to look out for beggars to give it to, there are plenty of honest men about who want it more; but I recollect offering a stroller work once at 6*d.* a day and his diet; he took my offer, but he was a lazy fellow, and gave me very little value, and I was always obliged to look sharp after him; on the fourth morning I found that he had marched off during the night, and he did not so much as wait to ask for his wages."

A night's lodging is seldom refused by labourers or small holders, but large farmers are observed to be more cautious in admitting strangers into their houses. Beggars go to them for straw to make their beds, and they hardly ever refuse them; they carry this to the place where they get their night's lodging, and the poor man who harbours them expects that they will leave it after them; it is an object to him, as it serves to increase his stock of manure. Clothes are seldom given by the poorer classes, but there are many benevolent ladies in the neighbourhood who frequently distribute clothing to destitute poor widows and other distressed persons. Potatoes are the only food given in the way of relief. "Meal we do not give," said Keogh, "because we never have it for ourselves;" and Brasil confirmed this statement, by saying, that though he holds 70 acres of land, he scarcely ever eats anything but potatoes and milk. Milk is given by the farmers and those who keep cows just as readily as potatoes. The farmers always prefer giving food to money, because they have the former always by them, and do not miss it: and Gearan remarked that it cost much less trouble to get potatoes out of the ground than to get a fair price for them in the market. It depends on circumstances whether a beggar would prefer money; if he is in a remote part of the country where he cannot dispose of what he gets, he would rather have enough to eat. "But I have remarked," said M'Namara, "that a beggar about the town will give 10 times more blessings for a halfpenny than he would for potatoes or a sup of milk."

It seems that the peasantry have no limits to their alms; as long as their means permit they give freely. In summer, before the potatoes come in, and in scarce seasons, they are rather more careful, and perhaps give somewhat less; but in general they give to all who ask, and are only guided by their compassion for women with children, to give them rather more than others. Even those who subsist on the bounty of others are not in the habit of letting the beggar go away empty handed. About as much as may be held in the two hands locked is given to every applicant, no matter what the number, as long as the store lasts. This district is fortunate in possessing a resident gentry, who contribute greatly in alleviating the poverty which in their absence would press upon the lower orders. Many poor persons receive not only food, but sometimes clothing, and even from the families of the wealthier classes; but still they are unable to state any instance where individuals were mainly supported by that kind of charity. The relief thus afforded, however, is but partial. Some shopkeepers were asked how much they would give away thus one day with another, and they said it never would exceed 2*d.* or 3*d.*; this, therefore, would not pay or maintain an additional workman. As to the farmers, it was admitted that the most that any one of them would give in a single day would be a stone of potatoes, and that, at an average, would not be more than 1 ½ d. There were no instances known of any shopkeepers giving regular weekly allowances, or of any small farmers planting a portion of ground for the purpose of giving the produce to the poor.

There cannot be any doubt that the burthen of relieving the beggars falls nearly altogether on the lower classes; on farmers and cottiers in the country, and on labourers and mechanics and small shopkeepers in the towns. Persons of these different classes with whom the Assistant Commissioners conversed appeared perfectly aware of the fact, and seemed to consider it as a matter of course, and in some degree as a duty, by the performance of which they hoped to benefit. Mr. O'Brien stated, that he has heard some of his father's tenants complain that the situation of their houses, near a frequented line of road, was a decided injury to them, in exposing them more than others to the repeated calls of beggars, who were a constant drain upon them; and a reluctance has been evinced on the part of some to build houses in places where they knew they would be liable to similar annoyance. M'Namara said that he knew full well that the poor man gives more than the rich; for the gentleman has his gatekeeper, and he keeps his gates closed, and nobody can go up to his house to beg; but the poor man's door is always open. The Rev. Mr. Coffey assured them that there were none so poor as not to give alms to a beggar, and that it frequently occurred that the giver was in much poorer circumstances than the receiver; even poor labourers buying their own potatoes seldom refuse a handful. Many certainly get more than they can eat; but still perhaps they do not often get much more than their wants require. If they are able to sell the surplus of their collections, the money that they can procure is not much more than will pay for their lodgings in towns, or permit them to purchase clothes, shoes and other necessities. This remark does not extend to the "boccoughs" or impostors, who attend fairs and markets; they often give a good deal, which is afterwards spent in drunkenness and riot.

There is no reason to suppose that their uncertainty in the quantity given leads to waste of the provisions. Those who give lodgings to the beggars carefully collect the refuse and skins of the potatoes, which they give to their pigs; and the mendicants themselves, when they have more than they can require for their own consumption, invariably sell the surplus to the poorer peasants in the country, and to the distressed labourers in the towns and villages.

Keogh said, that seven beggars called on him the day before, with many children. There were no men, they were all women. It was a good many for that season or period, as no great number had called for the last two months; they could not have got less than half a stone of potatoes, or a pound a piece amongst them. Gearan, who holds about 12 acres, added, "I am sure I do not give, one year with another, less than two barrels of potatoes, worth, as the times go, about 30*s.*" A small shopkeeper will give away about 2*d.* or 3*d.* a day on an average. There was no instance known there of persons being left destitute themselves from giving, who had only barely enough to meet any emergency that might occur; but upon this subject M'Namara observed, "I have not known any one of any class of persons to be actually ruined by it; but God knows that many a summer's day, when the poor creatures come down from the hills in shoals, the wife could not bear telling the human beings like them to pass on, without some little charity; and I have been even obliged myself to make her easy in giving too much, for the children were next day crying that they had not enough; and it was only by borrowing a 6*d.* from a good neighbour that I was able to afford them a light second meal in the 24 hours." Gearan also said, "I was talking yesterday to many of my friends on the poor laws, as I heard that two gentlemen had come to Newmarket; and the talk amongst us was, what should be done about them. We had a long discussion on it; and though we were all angry at having more taxes put down our throats, yet we all agreed that any little payment would be better than allowing the beggars to go about as they do. The old people should be well taken care of, and the others should be made to work; and I am quite sure it would be cheaper to us all to pay a little something than to give as we now do. I know the farmers would grumble a little the first year, but they would scarcely know what they paid the second*." Keogh also observed, "Is it not a shame that in this Christian country the poor old people should be obliged, winter and summer, to go about without shoes and stockings looking for their victuals? It is these poor creatures I pity, many of whom have worked hard and long for us all, farmers as well as gentlemen; and why should they not be more comfortable than the pigs and cattle, who are at least kept warm in winter? The slaves, when they are old, must be supported by their masters; so I have heard tell; and yet in Ireland, when we get old and friendless, we must lie down in the ditches and die. I know well that what we give, from one end of the year to the other, we scarcely feel; but if we thought that the poor of Ireland could be supported better than they now are, we would willingly contribute to it; and I know for certain that there are very few in this part of the country who would object to bettering the condition of their poor." Brasil said also, "My skin creeps when I hear of new taxes, for we cannot afford to pay those which are now demanded of us. I know how it will be; it always has been the same; the landlords may pretend to pay, but it will always, some way or other, be taken out of the pockets of the tenants." Mr. O'Brien remarked, that though he was not in favour of the late English system of poor laws, yet he does not see why a mendicity should not be erected in Newmarket as well as in Ennis; and he certainly could not conceive any objection to relieving the blind or aged; in one word, "the impotent poor." He thought that the petty sessions districts in the county of Clare might well and easily be made into unions, in which workhouses or "mendicities" might be established; and even on occasions of emergency, such as the failure of the potato crop, he would propose that gentlemen of a district or county should be empowered to meet and subscribe for such an occasion; and some power should be given to compel non-residents to contribute. When they ever got up such subscriptions, they invariably found that the absentees subscribed very little, and sometimes nothing at all. It was also his decided opinion that no person whatever should be enabled to take part in the management of any fund or institution of the kind, unless he was a subscriber; and moreover he would not allow any clergyman of any persuasion to have any connexion with it, unless he was a rate-payer. Sheils, the shopkeeper, thought it would be much better to relieve the beggars in some workhouse than to allow them to go about as they do at present; they carry diseases with them, and he knew whole families to be destroyed by it. The people who now give may just as well send what they had to give to a poorhouse, if they were sure that it was properly distributed among the poor. M'Namara, who was a labourer with a large family, wished the old people to be better taken care of; and he would willingly give as much as he could for their sakes. The poor are increasing, and worse off they cannot be. Something must be done.

Almost all to whom the Assistant Commissioners spoke on this subject were in favour of some provision for the poor, provided such a measure was well guarded against those abuses which arose out of the English system of poor laws. It was the opinion of the different clergymen present that custom, religious feeling, and a kind sympathy for the sufferings of a fellow-creature, prompt the people in general to give relief, as Halpin, the labourer, observed, "for the Lord's sake and good-nature to the creatures that would ask."

Though the beggars worry persons much in the towns, and follow them with prayers at markets and fairs, they are civil to the country people, and often say, "If you have it not, may the Lord help you to it." The Rev. Mr. O'Brien thought that persons would not give to beggars, if they thought they had enough besides; and Gearan stated that they were never forced to give from fear of violence; they are not afraid of the beggars in that country, as he understood the people were in some other places. Dr. Frazer observed, that a foolish dread of the effects of the beggar's curse influences many women to bestow charity. When he has found his yard full of beggars, and his servants giving to them profusely, and that he reprehended them, their answer was, "O, Sir, what would I do if they cursed me?" He also confirmed what had been stated by the dispensary surgeon at Killaloe, that "letters" are frequently communicated by beggars to the lower classes, who harbour them at night; and many remarkable cases occurred in the year 1817, where fever was extensively disseminated by vagrants; and the presence of a young female vagrant in the town is often followed by the appearance of several cases of syphilis at the dispensary.

It does not appear that the intercourse with mendicants has any pronounced injurious effects on the morality of the lower orders. The peasants generally concurred in representing them to be a decent inoffensive class, with whom they rarely have any reason to be dissatisfied. The Rev. Mr. Coffey, however, was somewhat of a different opinion, for he discountenances the admission of them into the houses of his flock altogether. He stated an instance where a young girl went off with a beggarwoman during the night, and returned after some time to her father's house in a state of pregnancy. Beggars are notorious for carrying news about, and even for debating political subjects; but the labouring classes are found reluctant to allow that they had ever acted as agitators or sowers of discontent.

Those who have long followed a vagrant life appear to become incapable of pursuing any other, and acquire a notion that it is a better trade than industry in the present circumstances of the country. There is no one there who has renounced begging, in order to live by his industry; but the Rev. Mr. O'Brien pointed out some people who had accompanied their parents there as beggars, and who have since become hard-working and industrious. Sheils observed, that it is never forgotten to a man that he has once been a beggar.

It has not been attempted to repress vagrancy in this district by punishment; it would be impossible to do so, as long as there was no provision for the destitute. The feelings of the people would be against all coercive measures at present; and every one seemed to think that the vagrant has a clear right to beg, for if he had not he must in most cases starve; but it is fair to presume that the matters rarely, if ever, go so far as that; for the Assistant Commissioners had not been able to procure intelligence of any outrages attributable to the recklessness of destitution. They had reason to think, however, that the sentiments of the public would be materially altered, if there were a house of industry to which vagrants and mendicants might be committed. All the farmers whom they questioned agreed that they would be well pleased to get rid of the burthen of the beggars; and if they were sure that they were provided for elsewhere, they would then not object to any restrictions which might prevent their wandering about.

There is no mendicity institution for the district about Newmarket; but the town stands on the high road between Limerick and Ennis, at both of which places there are such establishments; it is about 12 miles from the former town, and six from the latter. Mr. O'Brien remarked, that the town was thus placed between two fires, and continues to be a place of resort for many who, from disinclination to enter the mendicity, have left their usual residences. It was stated above, that the condition of any beggars is at least equal to that of a large portion of labourers; and many of them are unwilling to enter a place where they could not be better off as to food and lodging, and where they would, above all things, lose their liberty. When asked upon this point, some of them explained their aversion, by pretending to believe that they would be permanently separated from their children, or that their religious observances would be interfered with.

VAGRANTS are very numerous; considerable numbers of them flock in from other parishes; they appear rather to have increased.

Vagrancy appears to be pretty much the same in this parish throughout the year. The regular city beggars are much the same always; but in summer there are some additional ones who come in from the country. They come from the poorer parishes, and beg at the doors of the shopkeepers; the chief part of them are from the other parishes, where they get cheap lodgings. They consist chiefly of women, many of whom have children.

It scarcely ever happens that mechanics beg; they sometimes are driven to send their wives to beg; but it is a thing of very rare occurrence.

Very

Parish Holy Trinity, or Christ Church, City of Cork.

Very few, if any, disabled servants (servants out of employment,) are known to beg.

Most of the regular street beggars seem to have grown up beggars. Those that we see begging to-day we have seen for 10 years. Very few, if any, of this class are reduced persons.

The average which the regularly practised street beggars are supposed to obtain was about 4*s.* or 5*s.* a week. The beggars obtain a great deal from passengers in coaches, cars, &c. There are a regular set of them who attend the conveyances that start from this parish; they are very numerous, perhaps as many as 30 or 40; sometimes one of them may get 2*s.* or 3*s.* in the day. They are most impudent, and annoy and pester the passengers in the coaches; they are the worst and most dissolute description of beggars, and are regular frequenters of the gin shops. "I have seen one of them, a woman," said a witness present, "give her infant child whiskey, and she persisted, although I saw the infant coughing, and apparently almost choked."

They procure spirits, tea and tobacco, but are not in the habit of getting drunk. Sometimes, but not often, forged recommendations are used.

They are seldom, if ever, seen drunk; but they drink whiskey unquestionably. The children of street beggars almost always grow up thieves and pick-pockets. They sometimes take about the children of others, having either borrowed or hired them for the purpose of exciting compassion. Beggars very often have three or four children with them. A street beggar will be likely to make more money than a woman of the labouring classes.

There is very seldom any knowledge by those who give of the character of those to whom relief is given. Almost all the street beggars would prefer wandering about to settling themselves to any regular employment.

The poor people who have no other place will give them a nook or corner in their cabins for charity, when they come to them for a night's lodging. It is very unusual to give them clothing of any description. The relief chiefly given to street beggars is halfpence; sometimes, however, they get broken meat and vegetables from respectable houses. Some shopkeepers are in the habit of giving 6*d.* or 8*d.* a week; but they are often obliged to discontinue it from the number of applications which are made to them.

The relief of beggars falls most particularly on the middle and lower classes. There is no doubt that shopkeepers are more open to, and consequently more annoyed by, them than the richer classes; they are also much more open to persons who go about collecting subscriptions for any charitable purpose; and they give much more in proportion than those who dwell in private houses. The richer classes do not give to beggars, nor do they contribute to the support of the poor proportionably with those below them; any charity they give is in the way of subscriptions to public institutions. It is difficult to say whether the farmers and shopkeepers would prefer giving a regular sum annually, in preference to remaining open to the annoyance of beggars, and to the risk of their property, by encouraging such a class. The loss is not felt in the way in which they give; and it appeared to the persons examined in this parish, that there certainly would be an objection to giving even half the amount in a regular sum. There is, they say, a great dread of a poor law. If it was arranged that the sum should not, under any circumstances, exceed a certain amount, then the objection would probably be much less.

Relief is very often extorted by dint of importunity. The motives which generally influence the donor are strong benevolent or charitable feelings.

The regular street beggars have always had the greatest detestation of the house of industry. When the cart used to be sent round for them, they had regular centinels to watch it. If a street was full of them, and the cart was seen two or three streets off, they all vanished as if by magic, and when it passed not a trace of one remained.

IT is impossible to ascertain the number of vagrants with any degree of certainty; but at least 200 passed through in the months of May, June and July, last summer. There may be, besides these, about 200 more beggars, either natives or from Bandon, who beg occasionally in the parish during the other nine months. Mr. Field and Mr. M'Carthy say, "The poor of every class are more numerous than they were 10 years ago."

In summer vagrants are more numerous, because potatoes are dearer then than at any other season; most of those relieved in this parish are strangers. There are about from 12 to 18 regular beggars in the parish: Mr. Field considers them to be from 20 to 30.

The men go to look for employment, and the wives and children beg. Mr. Field says, "We have, however, many able-bodied men who beg in going to look for employment." The women are for the most part able-bodied, though there must of course be some old and infirm, both men and women. About a dozen families go off from this parish to beg elsewhere.

where. There are no mechanics in the parish who beg; formerly we used to have immense numbers of the Bandon weavers begging, but now we see few: their children come out occasionally. Some prefer begging where they are known, because people have more compassion for them; others, ashamed to let their neighbours see their poverty, go to a strange place. Scarcely any go from this part of the country to England; but there is much emigration to America. Mr. Field states, that last year there was twice the number of emigrants that went any year before; from 10 to 20 families went from these parishes. Unquestionably, the greater number are driven to beggary by their want.

Mr. Field says, "During the summer there are many who get one weight of potatoes in the day; but there are some with families who travel slowly and often, and who, I am sure, get scarcely as much as will get one good meal at night. Potatoes are not very plentiful here; strollers get more, near the sea-coast." Other witnesses say, that of boiled potatoes and raw, a woman will get from three quarters of a weight to a weight.

Mr. Field says, "I have known a few instances of families dividing, and each division applying for relief at the same house. A strong hearty woman without children, and a woman with a flock of children, will get about the same, because, though one can go to a greater number of places, the other will get more wherever she does go, on account of the children."

Mr. Garnell states, "I have seen them sell the potatoes, and inquire for silver in exchange for the copper they had got." Mr. Field says, "If they are able to get a little money, they always want it to get a pair of brogues (shoes); they do not drink it, I am sure: some of them, however, get tobacco." He mentioned then that he recollected the following dispute between a beggarman and his wife, who was abusing him for selling a weight of potatoes for 3*d.*:—"You did very ill," said she, "to sell them; they were the cheapest meal we could have." "Hold your tongue," said he; "was it not to make up the other 2*s.* 6*d.* I did it?" Begging is not a trade taken up to make money of and systematically carried on, but is the last resource of persons destitute of all ordinary means of support; and consequently most people who are found begging are really in great distress.

In summer, when potatoes are dear, it is probable that a man with his wife and children, by going about begging, would earn more than by taking his chance for employment. The beggar's family will be almost sure of getting subsistence; whereas, calculating that the labourer has four days' employment in the week at 8*d.* a day, he will not earn enough to support his family.

People who give relief do not look to or think of the character of the beggar; they can know nothing about it in most cases. Work is never offered to beggars here; there are so many persons willing to work, that the farmer would never offer it to strangers.

"I often heard," said Mr. Hurley, "that a farmer would let in six or seven together for a night's lodging."—"That is true enough; I had six of them last night," said Mr. Butler. "I would get out of bed at night to let them in."

Lodging is given them by labourers also; but when a farmer is known to give lodging, he will have one or two of them every night. They get potatoes always; and if they come at night, when a farmer is at his supper, they will get a little milk also.

Every one who calls gets something, unless, perhaps, when the farmer is distressed and is buying potatoes himself, in which case, he sometimes refuses. The quantity given is five, or six, or seven, according to the size of the potatoes, and according to their plenty or scarcity. Mr. Meade says, "There are from 30 to 40 persons who have small pensions of from 3*d.* to 9*d.* or 10*d.* a week from the gentry.

"The relief of the beggars falls principally upon the farmer; his place is open, and the beggar walks in without hindrance; but the gentleman's gate is closed, and himself shut in from strollers." Mr. Hurley says, "I have known the labouring people give potatoes to beggars when they were buying them themselves at 7*d.* and 8*d.* a weight." Bellew, the labourer, says, "I could not give them relief, or the like of me."—"Do you mean that if a beggarman came to your door when you were at your meal, you would not give him a boiled potato or two?"—"Oh, no; if I bought a weight of potatoes at 1*s.*, and a beggar came to me that way, I would give one or two, to be sure; let a man have ever so little, he would do that."

Mr. Field says, "Taking one week with another, and the price at one time with another, the greater number of farmers give at least the value of 1*s.* a week in potatoes." And Mr. Hurley says, "A small farmer will give two weights of potatoes a week, taking all the year round. Others will give five and six weights, one week with another."

As to whether the farmers would prefer a tax to the present mode of giving, "We would much rather give as we do at present; we do not feel it going."—(Mr. Leary and Garrett.)——"But suppose a regular sum of half the amount of what you do give would go farther in supporting the poor, would you prefer paying it?"—"Why, you know, if I was forced to pay it as a tax, it would not be charity, it would not be my own act."—(Leary.)——"But if you impose the tax on yourself, is it not your own act?"—"Well, but I would not feel the pleasure of relieving a poor creature with my own hand."—(Leary.)——"Then, if there was a poorhouse at the top of the street, where every beggar could get relief, you would rather give them relief than let them go in there?"—"Why, if a poor person came to me, I would give them something, to be sure."—(Leary.)——"Even though you knew that a person in real distress could not want relief, and that by giving charity to a stroller you were encouraging idleness?"—"Well. to tell you the truth, I think we would be lonesone without them."—(Leary.)

"A farmer will never miss what he gives for God's sake."—(Mr. Butler and Mr. Hurley.)——"When I make a payment to support the house, I would rather be rid of the beggars; but still, if one of them applied I would give according to my means, even just after paying the tax.

"I am giving them lodging for many years, and I never knew any harm to come of it; I never knew them to steal anything, or leave distress after them."—(Mr. Butler.)

"I knew one young man about 32 years of age; he was six or seven years begging, and some time ago he threw it off and turned pedlar (I suppose with his earnings): he put on a good suit of clothes. NEWMAN, rector of Kilbrogan.—ROBERT PHILIPS, weaver.—CORNELIUS QUILLINAN, labourer.—Mr. GEORGE STANLEY, farmer holding 175 acres.—Mr. THOMAS TANNER, farmer.—Mr. STEWART TRESSILIAN, churchwarden of the present year.

THE Rev. William Hunter, minister of the presbyterian congregation, says, "It is very hard to speak with anything like certainty of the number of beggars in the town, but I think there are 200 persons who beg, fully 150." In Kilbrogan, according to the Rev. H. Newman, rector, there are 50 regular professed beggars; and the Rev. Arthur Knox, vicar, says, that in Ballymoodan, "I think there are from 40 to 50 regular beggars. The number of regular beggars continues much the same as formerly, but the number who begged for a time (as the weavers) are greatly lessened on account of emigration. Immense numbers pass through the country parts of these parishes in summer."

Their potatoes of the last year were out, and the new ones were not come in. Beggars in the town are chiefly natives; vagrants relieved in the country parts are generally from the town, or from the west parts of the country, and from Kerry; they are principally women, and most of them have children with them. It is chiefly single persons that come to beg in this neighbourhood. Families of beggars think the more remote country districts are better for them than the neighbourhood of towns, there being so many beggars about towns already. The husbands of most of the strange women go for work elsewhere. You will hardly see one able-bodied man begging now, except perhaps an unemployed weaver, and of the weavers you do not see one now for the ten that there used to be formerly; they are almost all gone to England or America. The wives of some of the unemployed labourers and their children beg. Rev. Mr. Hunter says, "I have employed a man myself, whose wife is a regular beggar; and I know some women to be begging whose husbands are able to get work. Some time ago a woman came to me to seek for charity where I had some men at work, and after she was gone one of the men said, that woman's husband is a labouring man, and he has a constant employment." John Lindsay, weaver, says, "When the weaving trade declined in Bandon, the men that were thrown out of work were forced to go beg all through the country; many a hard struggle it cost some of them, and some could never bring themselves to do it at all, but suffered anything rather, and though so many hundreds are gone away, there are some still that would live better than they do, if they would go a begging. I know one man now with four children, and he did not earn a shilling at his loom since last Christmas; he is assisted by Mr. Newman, but I do not know how he makes it out; he is suffering dreadfully, and yet he told me that he was ashamed to go and beg."

Mr. Clark says, "The Bandon beggars come out to my part of the country at all seasons; there are at least 300 persons who come out from Bandon to beg. All the regular beggars come, and in addition a great many who beg very little or not at all in the town, such as weavers and the wives of labourers. Some of these come once in a week, others once a fortnight, others once a month. There are a great many women begging whose husbands have employment, but the wages are not sufficient to support them. At the present time potatoes are cheap, 2½*d.* and 3*d.* a weight, and a much less number of beggars consequently come out from Bandon. If they can pick up a few halfpence in town it will be more profitable and less laborious than carrying a heavy load of potatoes from the country. In parts of the country farther from town than where I live, they collect a great deal more, because there are fewer beggars. But the Bandon beggars prefer begging within two or three miles of town, because they can bring home the potatoes which they collect to their families, and need not sell them; they can go out in the morning and come in regularly in the evening; but if they go to a distance of eight or ten miles, they must stay from home two or three days, and not being able to carry all that they collect during that time, they must sell a great part; then being obliged to buy potatoes when they come home; it is much less profitable than carrying home the potatoes direct."

Quillinan, a labourer, says, " I know that the wives of some labouring men who have employment beg at the coaches, and there are others that would rather starve for 24 hours than do such a thing."

Rev. Daniel M'Sweeney, parish priest, says, " Most of the beggars have been begging for a long time, but as I see very few young and sturdy women amongst them, I think there must be very few who are beggars from their childhood." Rev. Mr. Hunter sees several people begging in Bandon now who were in excellent circumstances 10 years ago, and knows one of his own congregation who used to earn two or three guineas a week, and who is now obliged to go about from door to door.

It would be hard to say that any adopt begging from choice, but after people become beggars their pride is utterly broken, and they would remain so in preference to engaging in regular industry, if such were open to them. Some are beggars from idleness certainly, but very few; most of them are so from poverty and want of employment.

Respecting the earnings of beggars, some judgment may be formed from the following statements. The Rev. Mr. Knox says, " I know one regular beggar who has a pig." Mr. Horneybrook says, " I have seen several instances where a man's bag was filled to the amount of two or three weights of potatoes."

Mr. Clark says, " Of those beggars who come to us from the west, the greater number have planted their potatoes, shut their cabins, and intend returning regularly with what they get during the summer to support themselves in winter. Some idea of their earnings may be formed from a case that came under my own observation. A woman from our part of the country went away with her children to beg; she staid out a couple of months; she and her children were supported all that time, and she brought home as much as bought her a pig and a sheep, and released some things from the pawn office."

Quillinan, a labourer, says, " No doubt a woman can seldom come home with less than a weight of potatoes after a day's begging. I have known the wives of labouring men go begging when they had money in the savings' bank; I know they had it, because I borrowed it from them."

When potatoes are cheap, they would call it a good day's begging to get two weights (the Bandon weight is 23 lbs.), but they very seldom get near so much. Lindsay says, " I knew one poor weaver who went to beg, and he told me he often travelled a whole day and did not get half a weight. There is a woman who lives near witness that generally gets a weight in the day, sometimes a weight and a half, but he thinks it was in consequence of her having friends in the country. In July last she could get nothing by begging, and she was forced to give it up, and Mr. Knox gave her some assistance; she said she could not live at all but for him.

An active and clever beggar might get two weights in the day, but this seldom occurs.

The coach beggars are a great annoyance; it is impossible to say how much they get; there are about 15 who attend here. Mr. Hunter says, " I know an instance of the wife of a labouring man attending the coaches as a beggar; my servant told me that she had money in the savings' bank, and shortly after her daughter was sent to America at her own expense."

When a woman has children with her, of course she gets a little more; different members of the same family will often apply for relief to the same person. Where a man and his wife and children are begging, the man and some of the children will come now, and the wife and the other children will come by-and-by.

More is given to infirm persons, as they are of course considered to be more in want of it. An old man is not able in general to carry potatoes, and he often gets a little flax or wool from the farmers, which he can sell. Rev. Mr. Hunter says, " I have seen a tolerably strong boy whom I refused charity in the morning coming home in the evening with at least a weight and a half of potatoes on his back. A clever strong beggar, without children, that knows her trade, and can travel far, will get more than any other, and will make money."

Scarcely any beggars that are seen in this neighbourhood ever get enough to sell any surplus collections, the strong beggars sell them generally. Mr. Thomas Bullen, farmer, remarked that there is a poor family living near him that buys potatoes from them.

The beggars are not able to get tea, but many of them go into the whiskey shops; they are very fond of tobacco. Mr. Edwards, tobacconist, says, " I am sure there are many of them who would rather have one meal a day with tobacco than two meals without it." It was stated that if a man wants to live by begging, certainly he will not clothe himself decently.

There was a sort of beggars called " boccoughs," who used to make themselves appear lame, but there are very few of them now.

Mr. Clark says, " I have not seen one in my quarter now for a long time. I recollect but once when going to Kinsale I saw two stout men walking before me in perfect possession of their limbs until they got near the houses, when all at once they became so lame as to seem to be almost unable to walk."

Mr. R. Edwards, tobacconist, says, " There are a few strange beggars who appear occasionally and exhibit disgusting appearances, but I am sure they do not produce them for the purpose of exciting sympathy."

Beggars are frequently known to put on a bad coat over a good one; they would like to make themselves comfortable inside and miserable outside. The Rev. Daniel M'Sweeney stated that his own name has been forged to a recommendation, but such practices he said are very rare.

If an accident occurs to the child of a beggar she is fond of showing it; but it appears very unlikely that mothers would put their children to pain for the purpose of exciting sympathy. There is no asylum for the children of the poor who may be afflicted in the way of being deaf or dumb, &c.

The Rev. Mr. Hunter states that vagrants drink whiskey; that he has himself seen them drunk, and that he recollects one fellow who used to go on crutches a great drunkard; he died of the cholera.

It is hard to say whether the beggars here drink much, but in Cork they certainly do. I have sat in a house there opposite a public-house, frequented by beggars, and in half an hour saw such a number go in and come out as surprised me; there was almost a perpetual stream of the very same people that were begging in the streets.

The Rev. Mr. Newman says that the children of beggar women are generally very ready to commit petty thefts of straw, coal, &c. Potato pits are sometimes dug up in the night, and it is generally believed to be by men whose wives go out begging by day, and mark the spots where it can be most easily done. A collection was made for the purpose of sending two men who were begging, although able to work, to America. They said when it was proposed that they would be very glad to go, hoping I suppose to get the money into their own hands, but when they understood their passage was to be paid for them, they would not go.

Beggars think they get too little for themselves, and that they earn that little too hardly to think of sharing it with the more destitute.

Some rare instances occur of their hoarding their earnings.

There was an old woman in Bandon, a beggar, for a long time she was drawn about in a little car by her son; she went to Cork to beg, and was taken up and put into the house of industry. She died there, and a savings' bank book was found on her person, and her son is now trading on the money.

If the practice of borrowing children was tried in a town the size of Bandon, it is thought that it would infallibly be detected; but those who go into the country to beg take borrowed children (in some instances) for the purpose of exciting sympathy.

The four weavers who were examined state that the beggar in the streets is a great deal better off than the tradesman who cannot get work, or the poor room-keepers, that are ashamed to show their distress; why should not they? every day they get something, but the poor man that stays at home has no way of getting anything, unless some charitable person finds him out and relieves him.

The character of the town beggar is tolerably well known, but nothing is known of the stranger.

Cornelius Quillinan, labourer, says an able-bodied man could get more by begging than by work, taking the casualties as to employment into consideration; but it is a way that no man that had the spirit of decency would turn to.

After great numbers of the weavers had become regular beggars, there was a slight change for the better in the trade; and there was some little work for them; but it was found that some of them preferred remaining as beggars to returning to their employment. The Rev. Mr. Newman states that some time ago employment was given to a great many of the people in breaking of stones on the road, at 6*d.* a day; he recollects one strong healthy man who applied for relief; the work was offered to him, and he could not well refuse it; he remained one day at it and then went off. Another man who begged for relief was found to have employment as a measurer of coals, about three miles off from Bandon.

In the country places they get lodging, but in towns they have to pay for it.

The alms which farmers in general give are potatoes, and occasionally a trifle of milk; no money, it is so scarce with them.

Mr. George Stanley, farmer, says, "I do not allow any beggar to be refused at my house; there are several days in summer when one person would be little enough to stand at the door and attend them." Mr. Clark, farmer, also states, one day there will be three or four; another day a dozen before breakfast; perhaps two dozen more before night. Every one that calls at my place gets something; and Mr. Horneybrook, farmer, says that each beggar gets something at his house, generally four or five potatoes. Mr. Bullen, farmer, thinks that he gives away in alms as much potatoes as would feed a labouring man and his family throughout the year. Some shopkeepers are in the habit of giving halfpence to beggars on Fridays.

The relief of strolling beggars falls almost entirely on the farmers; even the small farmers contribute a great deal towards their support.

The poor and labouring classes are very badly able to give anything, it is the most they can do to support themselves. The labourers, however, both in town and country, do give something to beggars, may be a couple of potatoes, although they may be buying the potatoes at 6*d.* or 7*d.* a weight. Farmers holding 10 acres of land give very little, some of them nothing; even farmers holding 30 or 40 acres hardly give beggars more than from half a weight to a weight each day during the year.

Mr. Bullen, farmer, says, "Most of the farmers would not like paying any regulary sum, or any additional sum for the support of the beggars; but I would rather give even a little more than I do at present to be rid of the annoyance of beggars. Mr. Stanley, farmer, states, that he would prefer paying a tax to the amount of what he gives now, because he is obliged to keep a constant watch lest the beggars should steal something.

Mr. Horneybrook, farmer, says, that farmers do not miss what they give now, and thinks that a rate would bear very hard on them; they are not able to pay anything additional. Mr. Clark, farmer, says, "I would prefer paying a tax, but very few of the farmers would; they hate anything like a tax, almost all of them have their lands at a rack-rent, and they cannot pay one penny more."

Lindsay, a weaver, states, that he heard some people who went out from Bandon to beg say, that if they could speak Irish, they would get more potatoes. A belief in their distress, and its being thought a charity to relieve them, are the causes which influence most people to give relief to beggars. Mr. Edwards, tobacconist, says, "It is impossible to withhold your hand from them, when they come into your shop they have such importunity." There are instances of beggars stealing clothes and poultry from farmers' houses where they get a night's lodging, which makes the farmers more watchful of them latterly. They are not known to breed any discontent by tale-bearing; they tell stories of their own distress to work upon the feelings, and sometimes stories to amuse those who give them shelter, and a few of them occupy themselves in match-making; they bring intelligence where a good match is to be found; these are generally handsomely rewarded.

There are instances of persons who had been raised from the condition of beggars, returning to it again on the first pressure of distress. The Rev. Daniel M'Sweeney gives an instance of a woman who married a weaver, and after she had a child, she became a beggar again.

Cornelius Quillinan, labourer, observed, "You may be sure there is no child so honestly reared as the child that has nothing to do with begging or stealing."

If there was a house of industry here, it would probably be the means of causing a good many who come from distant parts begging, to turn themselves to some kind of industry at home. Very few of the beggars would like to go into a house of industry, and if there was such a place for them to go into, it is most probable that the shopkeepers would not continue to give them charity.

The poor weavers say, "they think it would be very good to have a house of industry to go to for those who have no families; but where a man has a family, they think it better to do with half enough than to be separated from it."

THE number of beggars who pass through the country parts of the parish is liable to great variation, depending for the most part on the cheapness or dearness of potatoes. The farmers who were present thought that not less than 500 had passed through during the preceding summer. In addition there are many persons who continue begging throughout the entire year, and of this description there cannot be less than 100 in the town of Clonakilty, of whom many are the wives of employed labourers, and solicit alms only in the rural parts of the parish.

The increased dearness of potatoes in summer always causes the amount of mendicancy to be greater at that season; and it is well known that many strangers then come from the west, who have set their potatoes, and endeavour to subsist on charity till they are fit to be dug, at which time they propose returning to their homes. Of the summer vagrants, by far the greater number are strangers; but in the winter months the mendicants who are to be met with are generally natives of the town, or of some of the surrounding districts. A very large proportion at all times of the year consists of women with children, not a few having so many as five or six; of some the husbands are dead, of others at work in different places, of others gone to England in search of employment. "Sometimes, however," says Mr. Franks, "the husbands are lying idle at home. When I was taking the census of this parish in 1831, I have in the morning found only the husband and one of the children in a cabin, and in the evening I have seen the wife and four or five children, who had returned after having begged all the day."

Almost all the regular town beggars are old or infirm, and unable to work; but it often happens, especially in summer, "that the wages of a town labourer are insufficient to maintain his family, and he is compelled to allow his wife to procure food by temporary mendicancy. The strange beggar-women are all able-bodied, and in the opinion of the farmers, nearly 40 men of a similar description had presented themselves during the last summer. To-day potatoes are $2\frac{1}{2}d.$ a weight (a low price), and I know many that have the name of labourers, and that have their wives begging."

D. Collins, himself a labourer, observes, "The labourers themselves sometimes beg when they are unemployed. I have known five or six strong men, able to work, go out in the morning of every second day, and come back in the evening with about a weight of potatoes, and very seldom less. I used to see them passing my door regularly, and some of them were young men."

It is thought that very few individuals have been vagrants from their infancy, with the exception of those who have been born imperfect or mis-shapen. Vagrancy is a mode of life to which almost all those who follow it have been reduced by misfortunes. Deasy says, "They never take to it from choice, but always with reluctance. No one would think of making money by it; and it is the last shift when everything else fails them."

As to the quantity of provisions which it is possible that a beggar can collect during the day, the farmers present agreed, that in the country they would be always tolerably sure of getting enough for their support, seldom much more. A woman with children might collect about a weight of potatoes, including those which she had received boiled, but then she would get more than any one else. In summer, however, she might not get as much as a weight.

There are a few beggars in the town who attend at coaches and cars, and are very importunate to the passengers; they do not, however, succeed in obtaining much at the chapel on Sundays. Mr. Walsh says, "that there are from 40 to 50 mendicants, chiefly lame, blind or crippled persons; he thinks they do not get more than 1*d.* or 2*d.* each." "There are also a few about the church," observes Mr. Townsend, "and probably of the same set who have been at the chapel."

In speaking of the comparative earnings of vagrants, several of the witnesses remarked, "that a woman with several children would always be more successful than any other beggar, because, although she cannot travel so far, yet she will get charity at many houses where a single person (especially at a dead season) would be refused; and there are but few farmers who do not feel compassion for her, or who will allow her to go from their doors without an alms." An old or a feeble mendicant is also an object of peculiar pity; to such a one milk is not unfrequently given.

Some vagrants have recourse to stratagem to increase the amount of their collections. They divide their families into two or more parties, and each sometimes receives alms in succession from the same individuals; it is stated, however, that this fraud is not of very common occurrence.

"They sometimes sell part of their potatoes, but they do not often get enough to sell any quantity; and when potatoes are dear, they get very little indeed. They may sometmes be able to sell enough in the course of a season, as to make out the price of a pair of brogues (strong shoes), or else some tobacco; for many a one of them would rather have a pipe of tobacco than a good meal."

Deceptive means, for the purpose of exciting compassion, are not often resorted to. "Boccoughs," who are or were guilty of various knavish tricks with this view, are becoming comparatively scarce, except at fairs. The same set of them wander over the entire county, and they constitute quite a distinct class of mendicants. It is believed that the children, who are too often to be seen clothed in rags, and exposed to the inclemency of the weather, are not intentionally kept in that condition by their parents, with the hope of profiting by their misery; and it seems to be the general opinion, that those who have children crippled or diseased would gladly avail themselves of an opportunity of having them cured, and would be grateful for such a service.

As far as has been observed in this parish, the habits of vagrants are not dissolute; they have hardly means to procure any other indulgence than tobacco; and as to the perpetration of crime by them, in no instance has outrage, either on the person or upon property, been traced to them; they are believed to be, generally speaking, honest. In the husbands of many of the vagrant women, it is thought that there is no want of a disposition towards industry; and there are many of them who would be rejoiced to emigrate if they had the means, or to make any other change whereby they could secure to themselves permanent employment. On the other hand, the old and the infirm are averse to emigration, and would perhaps be unable to support so great an alteration in their habits.

But one instance was known of a practice prevalent elsewhere, of women borrowing children in order to procure a greater amount of charity. Dr. Stewart mentions, that on one occasion a considerable number of children with a woman, to whom, from their ages, he did not think they could all belong; he questioned her, and induced her to confess that some of them belonged to her relatives.

Of the comparative mortality among mendicants and persons of other classes, the Assistant Commissioners were not able to ascertain any data; they were informed at the same time that no case had ever occurred of an individual dying of actual starvation.

Some farmers being requested to draw a comparison between the condition of a vagrant and of a labourer, said, "In some seasons, considering that a labouring man may only get two or three days' employment in the week (perhaps less), and that often potatoes are very dear, not to talk of the shame of it, it would be better for a man and his family to go out and beg; they would at any rate be almost sure of getting enough to eat."

In answer to the question, whether the prevalence of private charity had been known to act to any extent, as an inducement to working men to prefer mendicancy to industry? it was replied by Messrs. Walsh, Deasy and others, "that such a thing as an able-bodied man making his living by begging was scarcely ever heard of. Labouring men were sometimes, at particular seasons, obliged to solicit alms; but they were always ready to take employment, and to return to regular labour, when the season came round in which it could be procured."

"They would be glad," remarks Mr. Seaton, "to take employment if they could get it. A short time ago I found a strong hearty man going about the country begging; the excuse he made was, that he could not find work. I said, if you stay with me and work, I will give you your diet. He agreed, and did stay with me as long as I pleased to keep him."

No attempt is ever made to ascertain the quantity which a beggar may have already collected. "A woman with a full bag," exclaims one of the witnesses, "will get almost as much as a woman with an empty one."

Some person is always found willing, from charitable motives, to give a beggar a night's lodging; amongst farmers, however, this is done rather less frequently, because, when a beggar gets his lodging in a farmer's house, he expects that he also shall get his supper. A labourer, on the contrary, is not supposed to be under the same obligation. The food given in charity consists nearly altogether of potatoes, milk being very seldom added, unless when it is abundant. Money they never give; "because," as some of the witnesses express themselves, "they cannot; it is the scarcest thing with them."

Respecting the amount given away in charity by shopkeepers, Mr. Abbott, being addressed, replied, "It is impossible to speak with anything like certainty of the amount given away by other shopkeepers; we do not think of observing such a thing; it depends more on the charitableness of the individuals than on his property. Many give without its being known; and some who do not assist street beggars give a great deal to other people, such as to those who are not able to go out, or to reduced families, who would be ashamed to have it known that they received alms; of course a great deal of this would continue to be given, even if there were a poor law." Mr. Abbott was asked, Would you be able to estimate the sum which you yourself, as a respectable shopkeeper, and your family, may give away in the course of a week? He said, "Between halfpence to beggars and small contributions to collections for cases of distress, I should say about 6*d.* a week; besides, there is broken food, of which I could not guess the value." He was further asked, Supposing it was found, on calculation, that you give, between money and broken food, to the value of 2*l.* 10*s.* yearly, would you prefer giving a regular sum of 2*l.* annually for the support of these poor people? He answered, "It should be considered that much of what was given by people like him was not a loss, because it would otherwise have gone to waste; broken food and vegetables and cold potatoes were of little use in the house, but they were always a great relief to mendicants." He was asked, Do not you think if there were no beggars to give these fragments to, that people would become more economical, and cook less provisions at a time than they do at present? "I am sure," said he, "there would be very little, if any, change. People do not prepare more than they want, in order to give the surplus to beggars; but when there happens to be any fragments, they are given away." The question was proposed to Mr. Abbott, Would you be satisfied to give a regular sum of 25*s.* or 20*s.* instead of what you give now? His answer was, "I suppose so; but I confess that I would rather continue to give as at present."

The farmers all object to anything like a tax. They say, "We do not feel or miss what we give at present; and besides, it is a more convenient way of giving it. It would be easier for a farmer to give 2*l.* worth of potatoes than to pay 1*l.* tax at a certain fixed time." They were asked, If 1*l.* paid regularly would go further in supporting the poor, would you prefer it? They replied, "It would not go farther, or so far; a great deal of it would be paid away in building houses of industry, in giving salaries to officers and fees to lawyers, as in England."

It was found extremely difficult to approximate towards the quantity of food given away to vagrants by farmers. They showed great reluctance to speak upon the subject, and asserted that they had no idea whatever of the amount; that they had never thought of calculating. The guesses which they made varied widely; one thinking that some farmers gave away 12 weights of potatoes (about 5*s.* or 6*s.*-worth) in the week during the summer, and another, that a weight and a half was nearer to the mark.

Mr. Deasy stated, "that he had been in a farmer's house in summer, and that he had reckoned 12 dishes of potatoes given out to beggars in two hours, being about a weight and a half."

Mr. Walsh gives it as his opinion, that many farmers are totally unable to pay any additional tax. He knows all the farmers on one ploughland, held from the Earl of Shannon, not one of whom is able to have anything but potatoes and salt, and who are all clothed in rags.

The relief of paupers falls in the country almost entirely on the farmers; in the town the burthen is more equally borne, chiefly however by the shopkeepers, and even the poorest labourers are willing to give charity according to their ability.

With respect to the causes of relief being given, Mr. Walsh thought some were influenced to give it, because it was a custom which had prevailed for a long time; but that at the same time there was in the mind of almost every one a strong religious feeling in favour of the practice."

It is stated that the dissemination of disease has not been traced to the system of giving a night's lodging to vagrants; but it not unfrequently occurs that poor people suffer in another mode, who admit gratuitous lodgers into their houses; "for," says Mr. Bennett, "in a district of about 15 miles in circumference, there have been several complaints to magistrates, perhaps 20 within a year or two, against persons who had stolen things from the houses where they had been lodged. I do not know that the delinquents were beggars, but such is the probability, for they get their lodgings without payment.

Among the witnesses examined, the prevalent opinion respecting the effects of a vagrant mode of life upon those who adopt it, is that the industrious habits of those who beg only for one season are seldom affected by their doing so; they remain at home, the man working and the woman attending to her household duties as long as they are able to subsist; but when potatoes become dear in summer, and their own stock is exhausted, there remains no other resource for them but begging. The wife then goes out in general to parishes where she

she is not known, and when the plentiful season comes round she returns home, and betakes herself, as before, to regular industry. This is the case with strange women who come here as mendicants, the wives of labourers, who go out from Clonakilty in the dear season to the country immediately adjoining, are driven to beggary by the same course of things, and discontinue it in the same way, when they are able to maintain themselves otherwise. Those who exist on charity entirely, and at all times, are in most cases either old or infirm, or widows, to whom the opportunity of being industrious is not less wanting than the power. "But," observe Mr. Walsh and Deasy, whose words we have been making use of, "those who could render themselves useful become unwilling to relinquish a vagrant life, after their habits have been adapted to it during a year or two, and after they have got rid of every feeling of shame."

Vagrants are not punished as such in Clonakilty; and as long as great numbers have no means of support but mendicancy, a law inflicting punishment for having recourse to it, would be received with extreme dislike, and few would be found to perform the odious task of putting it in force.

On allusion being made to a house of industry, great fears were expressed of the tremendous expense which it would entail, and of the jobbing to which it would give rise. As to the readiness of individuals in a state of destitution to enter such asylums, it was observed, "It would be very difficult to induce them to go in at first, as there exists a great reluctance to go into any place of the kind, but this antipathy would gradually wear off."—(Mr. Deasy, Rev. Mr. Walsh, Dr. Folliott and others).

IT was considered by the farmers that the families of beggars who passed through this parish in the course of the last summer, amounted to not less than 2,000 individuals. Mr. Neil says, "From 30 to 50 persons a day was a common thing, they were calling for alms every minute."

In the summer season vagrants are always very numerous, in consequence of the potato stock of many families being exhausted in spring. The vagrants who appear here are in almost all cases strangers, having come chiefly from Kerry and the west of Cork. People are ashamed to beg amongst those whose know them, and the custom of going to strange parishes to ask alms, seems to be universal. The strolling beggars who come here are in general women, scarcely one being without children; able-bodied men are sometimes observed, but not often.

It was thought by the farmers that nearly 100 wives of labourers went from the parish of Killeagh during the last summer to beg in strange parishes. Walsh, a labourer, says, "The wife and children of a labouring man that lives near me went off to beg last summer, and came back when the new potatoes came in. It is a common thing."

Respecting the earnings of beggars, it is difficult to ascertain anything. Walsh (the witness just mentioned) said, "I know a woman that used to go off with six children every morning, and come back at night; she used to bring home sometimes half a weight, sometimes a quarter. I used to hear her saying, that at some houses she got alms, and at some the door was shut in her face." A family of beggars obtain a larger quantity of potatoes than a single person, and an old or infirm, more than one able to work.

Whenever beggars obtain a greater quantity than is necessary for their own consumption, they sell the surplus. The quantity which they have to sell is almost always trifling.

Anglum, a labourer, says, "Last Monday a woman came to my house with about a quarter of a weight, and I bought them for a farthing; I did not want them, but she did not like to be carrying them; they were worth more. In summer they would be worth 2 d., but in summer she would not collect them so easily."

The class of beggars called "boccoughs," described in some of the other reports, is here, as elsewhere, greatly diminished in number. Some are still seen at fairs, but even on fair-days their earnings are not much. Anglum says, "On the night of the last fair-day, a boccough, a lame man, and his wife and little son, slept at my house; he told me that he earned during the day 4 ½ d.; I think he spoke the truth." The habits of vagrants are not dissolute: they have not the means, if they had the wish to indulge themselves. They are not known to have been concerned in outrages of any description.

No case of death from actual starvation has taken place here. It is believed, however, that the lives of many are shortened by bad and insufficient food.

As to the comparative condition of labourers' families who do not beg, and beggars' families, it is believed, that in summer those who "keep the house are, in most cases, much worse off than those who go out upon the world."

To the question, whether any adopted begging in preference to industry, it was answered by a labourer, "Never." A woman would be ashamed more for her children's sake than her own; when she would be warning her little girls, she would not like that any one could call them a beggar's children.

It takes more than one hard summer to break down a woman's spirit. When distress first comes, she strives to get over it by pledging and pawning all she has, and pinching and stinting herself in food. Begging is her very last shift.

Charity in the form of lodging is regularly given to strange beggars. Labourers, who are so frequently unable to give any other assistance, relieve the poor in this way. Edmond Walsh, a labourer, says, "I had a woman in my house last summer for a week; she had four children; she got potatoes from the neighbours; I gave her fire to boil them after our own were done. On some days she would bring home half a weight of potatoes. Sometimes she got a dinner or a breakfast from a farmer." Anglum, a labourer, says, "I often have poor people lodging with me. A short time ago a poor beggar-woman was brought to bed in my house."

With respect to the quantity of potatoes given in alms to beggars, it is impossible to discover anything with certainty. The farmers, when questioned on the subject, profess themselves utterly unable to form any notion of the amount. They say, "We never calculate how much we give for God's sake, and God forbid we ever should; it comes to a great deal in the year, no doubt; but even so we would rather continue to give it than to pay a tax; we could not pay a tax; we do not miss the potatoes, but a tax is out of the question; we cannot pay the rents that are hanging over us, and how could we pay a tax?"

The relief of beggars falls almost entirely on the farmers. Labourers are very willing to contribute to the utmost of their ability, and in fact do generally give much beyond what they can afford; but extreme poverty is so widely spread amongst them that the burthen of supporting vagrants falls necessarily on farmers. Anglum, a labourer, says, "Often I had only a weight of potatoes in the house, and gave them a part of our own meal; and it is not I, but my wife being soft-hearted."

Butler, a labourer, says, "Often they come in the summer, when the potatoes on the table are not half enough. We give them something; we could not let a poor person see us eating and go away hungry."

With respect to the motive for giving alms, religion has very considerable influence. To the question, Why do you give an alms to a beggar? It was answered, "For God's sake, to be sure; what else?" that is, what other motive could there be?

To the question whether, if there were an establishment for affording relief to the poor, charity would continue to be given as at present? it was answered by a labourer, "If there was a poorhouse I would give beggar's charity still, if I had it. I think anything that would be given for God's sake would be given for the benefit of my soul."

Other witnesses think that the practice of giving alms to beggars would be greatly checked by the establishment of a poorhouse; "but still," a labourer says, "if a beggar came to a house when the potatoes were boiled, he would not be refused."

The nature of a house of industry having been explained, Anglum said, "I would rather beg about the country than go in there." Butler said at first, "I would sooner put two boys on my back, and get a potato at every house;" he afterwards said, "In July, if I was in distress, I would go in there, if I would be let out every Sunday; because then I might go away whenever I did not like it." All the labourers agree in saying that they would much prefer working for 7*d.* a day to going in there. The greatest objection would be the separation of families.

IT is considered that there appear in this parish, in the course of the year, not less than 1,000 families of beggars, amounting to more than 3,000 individuals, of whom almost all are strangers, and only take this district in their general wanderings. Of these beggar families some contain as many as seven or eight persons, and amongst them are many able-bodied men who have been driven to vagrancy by want of work.

Mr. Sullivan says the men are ashamed to beg themselves, but generally stay outside on the road while their wives and children apply for charity at a farmer's house. Vagrants are more numerous in some years than in others, and the variation depends on the plenty or scarcity of potatoes. Their number, however, is annually increased in June and July, corresponding with the period when potatoes begin to get dear. They come almost entirely from the west and the south; very few from the east or the north; and they pass homeward in the month of August. Some of the men who come out get employment whilst their wives and children continue to beg; others, not so fortunate, remain altogether dependant on the alms collected by their families. Leary, a labourer, says, "You may often see the husbands lurking by the ditches with their spades in their hands, waiting till the woman brings them something." With respect to the earnings of those who are fortunate to obtain employment, a case was mentioned of a man who had gone out with his wife and four or five children, himself to look for work, and his family to beg; he died near Clonmee; and "his

"his wife," the witness said, "brought home nothing but poverty and grief." She had but 4*s.* or 5*s.* when he died, and that was only enough to bury him. William Fox states that he knows four or five families who go off to beg; they support themselves while they are out, but they do very little more. The most they can get by what potatoes they sell is the price of a frock or a jacket for one of the children.

Speaking of the probable quantities of food that would be collected by vagrants, Mr. Sullivan observed, "that he thought it would be a good day for a woman and three or four children if they got half a weight and a meal of potatoes. Many are obliged to do with a great deal less." It was remarked that a woman with a family of children would always get more potatoes than a single beggar; she gets something at every house, be it ever so little. A single woman is often refused.

Mr. Daly states that it is a very rare thing for a woman with a family to sell anything; she should spare it from herself; and when she does so, it is only to put a little necessary clothing on the backs of the children. Cornelius Leary says, "I bought potatoes from beggars last July; it was always from a woman with one child, or from an old man. I paid at the rate of 7*d.* a weight for them; it was often a convenience to me to get a small quantity, and to have them brought to my door. I would be shy to go to a farmer for so little, because I would be ashamed to show my weakness, that is, my poverty. I do not know whether they said true or not, but they told me that it would take them three or four days to collect half a weight over what they eat, and that they travelled 10 or 12 miles for it." Mr. Sullivan was of opinion, that if they did themselves justice (i. e. if they eat enough), they could not have sold anything last July." Leary observed, "that they would go like the cattle, if they did not sell something to clothe themselves."

The number of "boccoughs," or knavish professional beggars, is much less at present than it was formerly. There are about a dozen of them who attend all the fairs in this part of the country; and all of them are afflicted with some ailment, for the most part blindness or lameness; they frequent the low public-houses, and spend in drinking whatever money they can collect.

Vagrants in general are not in any way dissolute; those who have families, and almost all have, find it as much as they can do to procure a sufficiency of food. Potatoes are sometimes stolen from the pits, but it is uncertain whether such crimes can be always attributed to vagrants; it is believed that they are only committed, as some of the witnesses express themselves, by "idle unprincipled fellows, who cannot endure hunger like an honest man." Some of the labourers present think that if they were in distress and had hopes of getting over it, they would rather steal a single meal than go out and beg publicly; it is agreed, however, that many a man who would go dig a meal of potatoes for his family would be incapable of any other robbery. A case was mentioned where a farmer some time ago met a man coming away after having stolen potatoes out of one of his pits; the poor man had but a handkerchief full, barely enough to give his children a meal, and he might easily have taken a much larger quantity. There are no grounds for supposing that mendicants have it often in their power to accumulate any money; on the contrary, strange beggars have occasionally died here, and money has not in any case been found on their persons; and it has been even necessary to make collections to bury them. The question being asked whether beggar-women had ever been known to borrow children for the purpose of exciting compassion, the labourers laughed, and one of them said, "No, indeed; they think it is too many of them they have of their own to borrow them from any one else."

A great proportion of the labouring class are much worse off than the beggars. Mr. Sullivan, in reply to a question as to the comparative state of labourers and vagrants, states this, and adds, "You will know by-and-by, when you come to ask about labourers, who are most in want or distress, when you hear the wages they get and the food they have."

Mr. Daly was asked whether it were of frequent occurrence that male beggars refused to undertake any employment that might be held out to them? He answered, "I know of no such thing; but I have offered work to men whose wives were begging for them, and I have always found it gladly accepted. I have been asked for employment by such persons when I was unable to give it; a man has said to me, 'Will you give me employment this month, and I will stay with you for my diet?' I have replied, 'I have enough of labourers; I cannot take any strangers,' and the man has gone away saying, 'Oh! that is what every one says to us.'"

Strolling beggars get their lodging for charity, both from farmers and from labourers, but more frequently from the latter. They are very often, in order to provide themselves with a bed, obliged to cut rushes as a substitute for straw, an article which they do not commonly obtain, except where it is plentiful. When they have been promised a place to sleep in, they have still to go and collect the rushes, and, wet as they are, they must sleep on them. "I have," says Mr. Sharp, "seen five or six mendicants lying together on a heap of rushes, with a steam actually rising up on account of the moisture, as they had nothing on them but the rags they wore during the day." Mr. Daly also mentions the use of rushes for bedding. As to the food given away as alms, Mr. Sullivan says, "If a family of vagrants come when a farmer is at or just after his dinner, they will be sure to get a share of the meal, generally of potatoes and milk; at other periods they sometimes get their choice, a few potatoes or a drink of milk."

At a farmer's house alms are generally given to every beggar that calls, the quantity given being commonly greater or less, in proportion to the size of the family of the applicant; a handful or a double handful is the usual measure. The number of beggars seeking charity is sometimes very great.

It is not an uncommon thing for twenty families of vagrants to apply at one house in a summer's day; and there is a difficulty, almost amounting to an impossibility, of forming an estimate of the quantity of potatoes given away by a farmer under such circumstances. The farmers themselves show the greatest reluctance to enter on the subject; there is a strong dislike connected with their religious sentiments, to making any calculation of the amount which they "bestow for God's sake." The only guess made is, some farmers may give two firkins a day (four weights) during the summer, and others do not give half a firkin.

It is further stated that some farmers are as distressed as labourers, that they are obliged to buy potatoes themselves in summer; and there are instances known of farmers being driven to sell their cow in order to purchase food for their children.

Mr. Freeman says that the relief of strange beggars falls almost entirely on farmers, but that he would not encourage such a class by giving charity. Labourers also contribute not a little to the maintenance of paupers; and Mr. Daly remarks that he has been in his labourers' houses when beggars happened to call, and that, however trifling the donation that could be afforded, something was always given. Leary, a labourer, says, "I have not half enough of potatoes myself, but I would not grudge to give an alms; I think it would be only just to stint myself to give something for God's sake." Mr. Flynn observes, that a labourer will give alms out of his scanty meal in summer, because, being poor himself, he understands distress better than the farmers.

The farmers do not appear to be aware of the extent to which they are losers by the present system of giving charity, and they feel a great aversion to anything in the shape of a money-tax. On this subject Mr. Daly says, "I would prefer paying a tax myself, if strangers were kept away and confined to their own parishes. I think that the small farmers, if the matter were properly explained to them, would also prefer a change, because they give more at present than they would if a tax were levied upon all; but I suspect the large farmers would not like any alteration, because at present they give less in proportion."

Religion and humanity are the chief motives which lead to the giving of charity, and it is thought that alms would continue to be given to a considerable extent even if a house of industry were established.

Within the last two or three years there have been some instances of diseases communicated by vagrants to the families of the houses where they had been sheltered at night. Thefts are seldom perpetrated by strangers, in the houses where they are lodged.

The laws against vagrancy have never been enforced here; and Mr. Daly states, that there would be much disinclination to put any such laws in execution, under existing circumstances, i. e. so long as there is no source of relief for persons in distress.

It is thought that if the members of a family were to be separated, very few would be found willing to become inmates of a house of industry. Mr. Daly says, "it would be considered as bad as transportation." And Mr. Sullivan is of opinion, that the cruelty of forcing people into a house of industry, would take away the excuse which farmers would otherwise have for not giving charity; he could not bid a woman and her children to go to a workhouse, if he knew that they were to be separated there.

The labourers agree, that if it were allowed to go in during the months of June, July and August, and to come out when the potatoes were ripe, great numbers would be glad to have the opportunity. When they were asked which they would prefer, the liberty of going into such an asylum, or employment at a public work at 8*d.* a day? they at once answered, "Employment at a public work for any wages we could live upon." One of them (Flinn) exclaimed, "If we had but 7*d.* a day we would be content." Another (Fox), "If there was a man out of every house at public work, all would be happy and comfortable." Another, "Let Government give employment, and they will have no further trouble with us." The Assistant Commissioners were informed that money expended by the country on roads, was not of so much benefit to the labourers, as it might be. They were told that roads were not made at that season of the year at which employment was not wanting, and that wages were, in many instances, not paid weekly, but at the end of several months.

IT is scarcely possible to form anything like an accurate notion of the number of persons who beg. There are some who live entirely by begging, and some beg only at particular seasons. There are some who leave Macroom to beg elsewhere during the summer, and a great many who come from Limerick, Kerry and the southern parts of the county of Cork, and beg as they pass through the parish of Macroom, on their way to the interior and eastern eastern parts of the country. As to this last class, the witnesses, who live in the country parts of the parish, the farmers, agree that fully 1,000 strange beggars passed through during the last summer, which was not one of particular distress.

The Rev. Mr. Walsh says, " There are more than 100 who leave this parish in April or May, and stay out begging until September; they are mostly women, the wives of labourers, and they take their children with them." Other witnesses think that there are at least 150 of this class. Sweeney says, " They cannot help it in summer, a man's hire (i. e. wages) is not enough to support himself and his family." They go out to beg during the summer, because that is the scarcest season; they have their potato gardens set, and they come back about the time they are fit to dig; the men either stay at home and work with a farmer, or go out by themselves to seek employment; they seldom or never beg. Mr. Walsh says, " Those who go out to beg during the summer are in the habit of returning as soon as they think they have got anything to eat at home."

A poor woman who goes out with her children can seldom get more by begging than what supports her. Sweeney says, " Not one in a thousand of these could get enough to pay their rent, or put a frock on the child." Mr. White says, " I knew a case this season, where the wife of a tradesman went away. They had a potato garden, and before she went the man left 7*s.* or 8*s.* as part payment of the rent; but I suppose she got little or nothing by begging, for when she returned, they were unable to redeem the garden, and the husband got back the money that he had deposited." Mr. Field says, " I know a case where the wife of a labouring man goes out to beg during the season; he has a potato garden, and she assists in setting the potatoes before she goes out. She is blind of one eye, and has five or six children; her husband stays at home working; she continues away about three months with the children. I am sure she does little more than obtain a bare subsistence; when she comes back, she seems generally in great distress." Mr. Welply says, " I know another case, where the wife of a labouring man begs. She has four or five children; she goes out every summer; she gets about enough for support. And I know a case of a widow who has three or four children; she stays out a few days only at a time; she begs during three-fourths of the year; during the remainder she gets some little employment, such as picking potatoes. I do not think she can do more than get a bare subsistence." Shinkwin says, " I know a woman, the wife of a labouring man, that went to beg; she had five children, the husband staid at home. She went away in May and came back in August, but she brought nothing with her." Mr. Walsh says, " I recollect a case last summer; a woman had four children, her husband was a labouring man. She went away about May with her children; during her absence her husband worked now and then, and continued to support himself, but badly. When the wife and children came home, they were very ill clad, and altogether in a very wretched state." Mr. Good says, " I knew a case where the wife of a labourer went off to beg; he lives about a mile and a half from Macroom; she went away in May, and took two children with her. The husband staid at home working for a farmer, by whom he was employed, and from whom he had a potato garden. The wife returned about the beginning of August, and she admitted that she brought 22*s.* with her. I think she is an honest woman, and not likely to have come by the money by any improper means; but I am sure hers is a rare case, and very few get so much by begging." The same witness says, " I know a man who is a regular professional beggar; he told me that in a dear season he could earn 4*s.* a week by begging." Richard White, a tradesman, says, " I am a housekeeper in town; about 12 months ago a beggar came in to ask for charity, he was standing in the house when my brother came in; he asked the beggar, did he know him, he said no; my brother then reminded him that he had helped him to buy two heifers at a fair in Kerry; the beggar admitted it, and said that he had the two heifers grazing on the mountain."

There are about 50 regular beggars in the town; they beg partly in the town and partly in the country; most of them have families depending on them.

A woman with children begging in the country is looked upon as a person more deserving of relief than a single woman. A begging family sometimes divides into two parties, they apply successively for relief and obtain it at the same house.

There are about 20 beggars who attend the chapel on Sundays; they may get 1*d.* or 2*d.* each; they are generally aged or infirm women resident in the parish. A few strangers appear there occasionally, and some of these are very disgusting objects; distortions, lamenesses and sores are not common among beggars, though some are met with occasionally who present those appearances, particularly at fairs; there are very few of this class of beggars; they travel about, and appear at every fair within a considerable distance.

None of the witnesses have met with a case where a false appearance of lameness or disease was exhibited, or where a sore was produced by a beggar, except Dr. M'Carthy; he says, " It was not in this parish, it was in Cork, a man was in the south infirmary with a sore on his leg; after staying there some time he was discharged as incurable. A short time afterwards he got into another hospital, and there the trick was discovered by which he prevented the sore from healing; he used to rub blue-stone and hellebore into it." The same witness says, " I have not known beggars to have refused having their sores cured; but I have known some of them with very disgusting sores which were curable, and they made no effort to get them cured."

The habits of beggars, except of the few who frequent fairs, are not dissolute; thefts are sometimes traced to them, but they are not known to be concerned in robberies or assassinations. The practice of borrowing children is not known to exist.

Those who go about begging have frequently large families, but they are not known to marry earlier than any other class, nor is the proportion of illegitimate children among them great. It would be very difficult to ascertain the mortality amongst them, as contrasted with other classes. No instances have been known of death from actual starvation, but it is believed that the lives of many are shortened by insufficiency of food.

The wants of a beggar are frequently much better supplied than those of a labourer, particularly when provisions get dear in summer. Tushigg, a small farmer, says, "Those that stand the house are often a great deal worse off than those that go out about the world; it is that sort of people that does suffer real distress."

A man or woman who has become habituated to the wandering life of beggars, prefers it probably to returning to regular labour. Collins says, "I see men begging about or over 50 years of age; they are to all appearance able to work; but if you ask them, why they do not, they will tell you that they have some sore or inward hurt that will not let them; but I think it is an excuse for not doing what they do not like; I am sure that some of them now and then take up begging for choice, one that had some idleness in his bones."

A case may occur, though very rarely, in which work would be offered to and refused by a beggar; but in general those who are able to do anything are most unwilling to labour.

Mr. Horgan says, "I have known cases where beggars, such as aged men and boys, who are not able to do the work of labouring men, were satisfied and glad to take such employment as they were equal to for their diet and lodging."

Lodging for charity is given to beggars both by farmers and labourers, but chiefly by the latter, who can do it more easily than give potatoes. Several labourers mention that they give lodging. Collins says, "I very seldom do it; I am not a man that has land or any kind of straw; and if I have no straw, I would be ashamed to keep; but I send them where they would get it." The farmers would give potatoes, and milk occasionally, when there is plenty; drink is generally given to a beggar-woman that has children with her."

A beggar is very seldom turned away from a farmer's door without getting an alms. Mr. Reardon, a farmer, says, "In a dear season I had here 60 people calling at my door; all of them would be relieved as far as we could. This morning before I left home six called; I believe all had families; and this is not a season in which near so many come as in summer."

Charity is given to beggars by people of the poorest class, by people who are perhaps, in many instances, the most distressed of the two. Collins says, "Labouring people do relieve them, unless potatoes are very scarce with them. When they are buying potatoes themselves, but few of them give away any, and it would be hard to blame them; but they give them lodging; it is from labouring people that they mostly get lodging." Connell, an old labourer, says, "I often gave them lodging, and they never stole anything from me, but about 10 years ago a woman left a fever with me and my family, and it is that kept me down ever since; they took the fever, and I spent all the little I had before they recovered; for five years after I did not give a night's lodging to a beggar, my mind was so much turned against them by what I suffered; but then I began to think of myself, and I let them in again; I had no other charity to give them; and I did not think it right not to give something in the honour of God."

It is impossible to form an accurate estimate of the quantity of potatoes given to beggars. A farmer has the greatest reluctance to compute the amount which he gives away in charity. Dr. Furlong mentions one case, however, in which a sort of calculation was made; he says, "I know a respectable farmer, whose wife was a generous, kind-hearted woman, and was in the habit of giving away a great deal of potatoes to beggars; her husband desired her one day to measure out three weights of potatoes in a basket, and give out of that as she usually did; the potatoes were measured out next morning, and before two o'clock the three weights had disappeared. The experiment was chiefly from curiosity, and I believe they were not less liberal afterwards in consequence of it." There are 71 shopkeepers in the town of Macroom, many of them are very poor, but some give a good deal of charity, partly in money, and partly in broken meat and vegetables.

One, a wealthy man, gives, it is considered, to the amount of 10*s.* a week; another gives nearly 8*s.* Mr. Field speaks of the latter case from positive knowledge. There may be 10 more who give to the amount of 1*s.* a week each; the remaindar are able to give very little. Mr. Field says, "that they would prefer giving as they do at present." He says, "I myself would prefer giving a regular sum, but I think the generality of them would not. I have been speaking to several of them since the inquiry commenced, and they said they would prefer giving double as much willingly to being compelled to give." Mr. Hanahan would prefer subscribing to an institution to relieving as he does at present. There are about 240 farmers in the parish, of whom nearly 200 pay 30*l.* rent and upwards; the rent paid by a farmer, however, or the number of acres held by him, is not a criterion by which to judge of the extent of his charity. Of two farmers paying the same amount of rent, one is often much more charitable, or much more prosperous, than the other. It is in consequence impossible to ascertain the amount given away in charity, and the greatest discordance of opinion on the point prevails amongst the witnesses. The farmers, however, with one or two exceptions, agree in saying that they would prefer giving as they do at present to paying a regular sum. One fears that the tax would increase every year; another feels it less giving little by little than he would under a different system, and says, "I think if I saw it all going away in a lump, I might grudge it perhaps, although I do not now." Mr. Lenihan says, "I feel a greater gratification in my mind by giving it freely with my own hand." And several agree with Mr. Kelleher, who says, "If I was obliged by compulsion to pay a regular sum of money, I think there would be no charity in it." One farmer says, "I would rather give half the amount in a sum of money, but not the full amount; it would press more, it would be often very hard to make it up."

Those

Those who get lodging are in some few cases guilty of thefts, but those who do so are not at all the people in the greatest distress. Cases have been known where diseases were taken from strolling beggars by people who gave them a night's lodging. Taylor, a labourer, says, "I often had them in my house; they never stole anything, or left sickness after them; others might not be so; but a family might be giving them lodging for 10 years and have no sickness left with them."

Begging is generally the last resource, and people betake themselves to it reluctantly; many who beg during a season of great distress never do it again, and cases are known of persons who have begged for more time discontinuing the practice. M'Carthy, a labourer, gives the following evidence: "About 10 years ago I was in great distress, and my own wife was forced to go beg. I was hired with a farmer at the time for 4*d.* a day and my diet*; we had a potato garden; the potatoes ran out about the beginning of the year, and we had nothing; we had not a potato in the house; if we had one meal, she should not go beg; we had no blanket, or anything to cover us at night, but the clothes we wore during the day; she begged for four years; she used to take the children (four of them) with her, and stay out about three months; she never brought home anything, and used to get barely enough to maintain herself and the children; she stopped about six years ago, as soon as the boys were able to do anything; they are now up and working. I am not able to earn anything myself, but they are willing to support me."

If a house of industry were established, several of the aged and infirm would avail themselves of it. Collins says, "As for the beggars, some of the old ones would go in and be glad of the offer, but those that had any strength would rather stay out and have the pleasures of their liberty. A labouring man and his family would go in there in summer, if they would be let out again in a month or six weeks."

Being asked whether this would be the case if the rule of the house required that men should be separated from their families, the witnesses (labourers) paused, and then agreed that they would not go in except under the pressure of extreme necessity. Collins said, "If a man was reduced to the last pitch, and could do nothing else, of course he would go in; but I am full sure he would rather have one-third of the victuals and stay out. Let a man be ever so poor, he would like to see his children morning and evening."

Robert Hedges Eyre, esq., says, "A house of industry would be liable to great abuse. An allowance to the old and infirm people, under the superintendence of a local committee, would answer the ends of charity much better; and giving employment to the able-bodied on the waste lands, and making roads, would at the same time effectually relieve them, and add to the resources of the country." Rev. Mr. Kirchoffer says, "The greater want of employment is felt from about the 12th of May to the 12th of August, and that is the season of the greatest distress. If the country works were executed during that period, and the labourer paid daily, or even weekly, great good might be effected; but presentments are usually obtained at the summer assizes, and the work executed in the winter. If public works were undertaken by Government, and so carried on as not to draw labourers from other employments, but to afford employment to those who could not get it elsewhere, agriculture would not suffer, the energies of none would be wasted, and the beneficial result would not be counteracted by any evil. Under such circumstances, I am satisfied that in my parish, Clondrohed, which contains 1,000 souls, there would not be 10 objects of charity."

THERE are about 60 regular beggars in the parish, but a much larger proportion of strange vagrants pass through during the summer months, their numbers being greater or less according to the dearness or cheapness of provisions. It is estimated, that during the preceeding summer more than 200 appeared, and that the usual dearness of food at that time of the year is supposed to be the cause of the increase which is annually observed. These vagrants come chiefly from the west; they are supposed to have planted their potatoes before leaving their homes, and having nothing to subsist on until their crop becomes ripe, they are compelled to wander about the country as mendicants. At the same time time it is stated that an able-bodied man is rarely to be seen asking for alms; this devolves on the wife and children, and whilst they beg, the husband either stays at home or looks for employment in the north of the country. The Rev. Mr. Molony says, "In the town there are two or three young fellows who idle about, and are ready for any mischief, but they are the only men able to work in the parish who can really be called beggars. The town beggars are, for the most part, old men, but besides these, there are a few of its inhabitants, such as the wives of labourers, who have either partial or no employment, or who have large families, who go out in the country to solicit charity, but only during the summer. The wives even of employed labourers have been known to adopt the same expedient." "I have," observes Mr. M'Carthy, "employed men myself, whose wives were beggars." Instances are rare where mechanics or tradesmen belonging to the town have been seen begging; but a short time ago the town was inundated with crowds of vagrants, who represented themselves to be distressed weavers of their districts. The number of these latter have, however, diminished of late; and Mr. Smith states, "that although the summer before last he had several batches of such persons coming to him, he had but a few last season." The number of labourers who go to England from this parish in search of employment is not great, whilst on the other hand, a good many make their way during the season for digging potatoes to the county of Tipperary, and the northern parts of the county of Cork; during their absence, these poor people support themselves by their labour, and none of them have ever been known to beg on the road.

The labourer takes a cabin and ground for potatoes from the farmers at a certain price, and when accounts are to be made up at the end of the year, it seldom happens that the labourer has anything to receive.

The quantity of potatoes or other provisions which a beggar or vagrant can collect during the day, depends in a great measure on his or her strength, so far as it enables him to travel a greater or less distance, and also on some other circumstances. A woman with children will not often be able to collect more than barely sufficient for the maintenance of herself and family, whilst a man or single woman, who can make application in many places, will, though getting less actually at each, still in the end have more proportionately, and will most probably have it in their power to dispose of their surplus for money; on this point, Mr. M'Carthy remarks, "I think the strange beggars do make a little money, for I have occasionally seen them selling potatoes." But the Rev. Mr. Molony adds, "Strange mendicants have sometimes died in the parish, and they have always been found pennyless, so much so, that it has been necessary, in many instances, to bury them by subscription."

A labouring man who was present at the investigation, said that "the begging trade was not so good as it used to be formerly; it was overstocked like every other."

A family of beggars, consisting of many members, invariably obtains a larger donation at a farmer's house than any single individual; and it may be generally stated, that an applicant infirm through disease or other causes, will receive more than one who may be considered able to earn his livelihood by labour. But of all classes of mendicants, it is thought that a woman with one or two children will, on an average, be found to have collected the largest quantity beyond what she can consume or her wants require.

It is always a paramount object with a mendicant to accumulate a surplus of potatoes, to be exchanged for money, which is most usually expended in the purchase of some necessary article of clothing. One of the witnesses, a shopkeeper, says, "A beggar has sometimes bought a thing at my shop, and has paid part of the price down; at the end of the season he has returned to pay the remainder, with what he had been able to put together in the mean time. It is probable that the entire surplus earnings of a beggar during the season do not often amount to more than a few shillings." Nicholas Lombard, a beggar, an able-bodied man, living in the parish of Ardfield, states, in reply to some questions addressed to him, "that he begged for three seasons, always taking a little child with him; that on some days he collected a weight of potatoes, on some days half a weight, and on some days barely a quarter, but generally he got about half a weight, and sometimes he got his dinner besides. He sold the surplus whenever he had any, and he used to make about 4*s.* or thereabouts each season. He (Lombard) had a cabin, which he built himself on some waste ground called 'The Mountain Common,' but it was scarcely covered. This cabin he used to let each season, before he went out to beg, for 1*s.*, and altogether in this way he made up money enough to thatch it." When the Assistant Commissioners saw this man, he had just purchased straw for the last-mentioned purpose.

Those mendicants who reside in the town of Ross Carbery are not supposed to be guilty of the practice of resorting to deceptive means in order to excite charity. Their characters are in general well known, and being a good deal subject to observation, any attempt at fraud could not fail to be sooner or later detected. The strange vagrants who make their appearance during the season of distress in summer, are pronounced equally free from the suspicion of deceit. These latter have the character of being poor people who are driven to mendicancy, for the time only, by the pressure of real want, and they differ much from those who at all times live entirely by begging. Of these professional beggars, there are not a few who wander about the country during the whole year, and who may be seen at every fair for many miles around. Amongst vagrants of this description, there is reason to believe that the appearance of disease and infirmity is often simulated with the intention of producing sentiments of compassion. Mr. M'Carthy mentioned a case which came under his notice, about four or five years preceding. It was that of a woman who seemed to have met with an accident, which had lacerated her arm in a very shocking manner; something induced a suspicion that she was an impostor, and on examination it was discovered that the appearance had been counterfeited, by a piece of skin ingeniously applied, and covered over with an ointment. The class of beggars, among whom practices of the kind just described are supposed to have been most common, common, was formerly exceedingly numerous, and proved in many ways a very serious nuisance about the country. Their idleness was only interrupted by outbreaks of depravity, and they were not unfrequently successful in frightening individuals into giving them compulsory charity; at the present day their numbers are much fallen, and are calculated not to exceed 20. It is further stated that none of them are vicious to the same degree as formerly.

The Assistant Commissioners were informed that the habits of strange vagrants were not characterized by any remarkable propensity to debauchery or dissoluteness: they were not known to form companies for the purpose of carousing or drinking in the evening, nor had outrages either on person or property been in any instance traced to mendicants. Their general disposition to the resumption of industrious habits may be doubtful; but it is stated that the able-bodied vagrants, who are occasionally to be met with, would very willingly avail themselves of any opportunity which might offer to them of emigrating to America. That in one important respect, viz. in their feeling towards their children, the disposition of vagrants does not necessarily differ from that of the labouring class in general, is proved by the kindness of their behaviour to their offspring. The practice of borrowing children for the purpose of adding to the claims of the pretended mother, is unknown. Perhaps it may not be necessary to use the stratagem, as very few mendicants are without large families of their own. The Assistant Commissioners endeavoured, but without success, to obtain some data for forming an estimate of the rate of mortality among beggars, compared with other classes, but no facts have been preserved on this point; it was merely stated that no case of death from starvation had occurred within the knowledge of the witnesses.

The witnesses present do not hesitate to give it as their opinion, that the condition of the labouring classes, as a body, is much inferior on the whole to that of mendicants. They are unable to overcome their repugnance to, and their sense of shame inspired by the publicity of begging, and they remain at home in their cabins, undergoing patiently the severest privations.

When it is considered how large the proportion of strange mendicants is to that of those who solicit alms in the locality in which they are known, it will readily be perceived, that in most cases the giver of relief must necessarily be but imperfectly acquainted with the character of him who applies for it. In general it is not even attempted to become so, and the beggar gets at once, without being questioned, whatever alms it is thought proper to give, or whatever can be afforded. This indiscriminate mode of contributing to the wants of the necessitous has not, however, been found in practice to operate prejudicially on the morals of the labouring classes. It does not appear to have made a life of idleness seem preferable to one of industry, nor has it had the effect of inducing any one to have recourse to mendicancy, who could have procured an adequate subsistence by labour. It was stated, that in all cases where employment had been offered to vagrants, it had been gladly accepted.

The generality of farmers and labourers do not hesitate to grant a night's lodging to any vagrant who solicits it; and in many cases this practice is persevered in, even after it has been productive of much loss and injury to those who had adopted it. Speaking on this subject, Mr. Galway says, "A circumstance illustrative of this occurred about a year and a half ago, to a farmer with whom I was acquainted; he had been long in the habit of giving lodging to beggars, and where a man gets the name of being kind in that way, he becomes universally known, and is sure always to have crowds of applicants. He once took in a woman and her family, who had fever amongst them; one of them died in his house, and the rest having recovered their health, went away. After a time the farmer's own son fell sick of disease and died; this almost broke the father's heart; I happened to meet him after his calamity, and talking to him of the cause of it, I asked him if he would expose his family again to a similar danger, by receiving strangers; he answered, 'Yes, the house was there for them, and they might come if they chose.'" The most usual article of food given in charity by farmers is potatoes; milk is also given by the same class of occupiers, but not to any considerable extent.

The quantity of potatoes given away daily in charity at the house of a farmer, is not restricted to any fixed amount; almost every beggar who calls gets relief; and Mr. Hungerford says, "he has often seen persons apply, and has never known any one to be sent away without relief." The only exception to this observation occurs in summer; at that time, when potatoes have become scarce and dear, the smaller holders of land, of whom there are many very poor, can afford to give but little or nothing.

There can be but little doubt that the burthen of mendicant pauperism is almost exclusively borne by farmers. It is stated that mendicants do not even apply to the gentry. The class of labourers, too, contribute not a little to the relief of vagrants, and are always found willing to give to the utmost of their ability. In the words of one of the witnesses, "you will often see the labourer sharing his dinner with the beggar;" however, the entire amount derived as aid from working people cannot be very great.

The witnesses do not coincide in their computations of the precise quantities given away on an average of days by any individual holding, for instance, 10 acres of arable land. In general terms they say that there are not far from 200 farmers, who give to the amount of a weight of potatoes each day during summer, a quantity which would be expressed in money by from 2*s.* 6*d.* to 3*s.* per week, and that each of these may on an average be considered to give potatoes to the value of about 2*l.* 10*s.* in the course of each year. The majority of farmers are represented to prefer the continuance of the giving of alms in the present uncertain mode, rather than the substitution of a fixed and definite money-tax, of anything at all approaching the same value. When the witnesses were asked, whether they would prefer a tax, if a fair share were made to fall on the landlords, a few only answered in the affirmative. Mr. Galway, however, was of opinion that "the whole of the farmers would, if they had time to consider on it, prefer such an arrangement, and also that a parochial tax would make the landlord more circumspect, and avoid choosing pauper tenants." Mr. M'Cabe quite agreed with the sentiments expressed by Mr. Galway, and added, "that overbidding for farms would certainly be checked by a system of parochial relief."

Two principal motives are supposed to prompt the donor to the bestowing relief. The first is a natural feeling of compassion for persons who he is inclined to believe are labouring under privation, or are likely, if he does not aid them, to be soon reduced to great distress. The second is a religious conviction, that the giving of alms will not be unproductive of advantage to the souls of the donor and of his friends. Many conceive that the prayer of the grateful beggar has much value, even in a worldly point of view; and Dr. Fitzgibbon observes, "that he has seen a beggar detained after he had received alms, in order that he might repeat a prayer for his benefactor and his benefactor's friends. I have heard a man say," adds Dr. Fitzgibbon, "that without a prayer, an alms would not be worth a button." Mr. Wood states "that labourers have frequently told him, that the chief benefit in giving alms lay in the prayer which was given in return for them." Mr. Wood further observed, "that with some people the terror or dread of the beggar's malediction operated very powerfully;" whilst on the contrary, Callinan said, "I give it for God's sake, and I would not give it for cursing, if they were to keep at it till morning."

The effects of vagrancy are not confined to the individuals who adopt it as a mode of gaining a subsistence; they extend very sensibly to the physical and moral condition of the labouring classes in general. Many cases are known to the witnesses where diseases have been communicated by mendicants to persons of the houses where the former have been lodged for a night. One has been already detailed in the words of Mr. Galway, and the Rev. Mr. Molony alludes to the subject again. "Rather a remarkable instance of the kind," says he, "occurred about the year 1821 or 1822: a young man, a vagrant, who carried about him the seeds of fever, left the disease in no less than seven houses where he had received shelter; out of these houses 20 persons were seized by the disease." The man who takes the mendicant into his house is sometimes plundered by his guest, and thefts of this nature are mentioned by the witnesses. The Rev. Mr. Molony says, "A woman applied to me to hear her confession, saying that she was about to have a serious operation performed on her arm. When she was leaving me, she said that she was in great distress, and wanted something to buy meal; I gave her a shilling; she went away to a house where she obtained a lodging, and that night she disappeared, and took away with her everything she could lay her hands on." It appears that similar cases are much talked of when they take place, and excite a great deal of attention. This may be a proof that they are not of very frequent occurrence. The Rev. Mr. Molony goes on to say "that begging has unquestionably a demoralizing tendency. Those who continue it for any length of time must ultimately lose all sense of decency; however, from the peculiar circumstances in which the people live, it produces a much less amount of moral evil than one has reason to expect. Many who are driven to mendicancy by the pressure of distress, preserve their honesty as completely as those who are farthest removed from similar necessities."

Contemplating the formation of houses of industry as a mode of suppressing or diminishing the existing amount of vagrancy, the witnesses thought that if it were not deemed necessary to separate the various members of a family previous to their admission into such establishments, immense numbers would go into them, and that even with a rule of separation, many would not hesitate to take advantage of them during the summer months.

Thomas Fitzgerald, a labourer out of employment, at first said, when spoken to on this subject, that he and his family would be very glad to go into a house of industry; but when it was explained to him that he must not expect to be permitted to enjoy without restriction the society of his wife and children, he exclaimed, "I would not go in if I were to be separated from my wife and children; no man that has feelings would do it."

THE parish of Skull contained, according to the census of 1831, 14,269 inhabitants. The following evidence was taken at the town of Ballydehob, situated at the eastern extremity of the parish, and containing, according to the census, 601 inhabitants.

The witnesses speak of two descriptions of vagrants; those who leave this parish to beg in other places, and those who come from strange parishes, and pass through this parish begging. Respecting the former, the Rev. James Barry makes the following calculation:

"There

"There are 84 ploughlands in the parish: six or seven persons leave many ploughlands, four or five leave many more, and from some two or three go away; say that four on an average go from each ploughland, multiplying by 84, it will give 336 persons who leave this parish to beg during some part of the summer; this is without counting children. Several have five or six, several have three or four, very few without two; four is nearer to the average than three; but say three, and it will give over 1,000 children. A woman sometimes takes her sister's children with her; it is a relief to the sister, and rather an advantage to herself, because it excites the pity of strangers to see so many children."

It is very difficult to compute the number of strangers who come into this parish to beg, but they are believed to be more numerous than those who leave it. Mr. Barry says, "They come here in crowds, because this is a great potato country; the small farmers along the coast pay their rent by potatoes as much as by anything else." Murphy says, "If there is a scarcity here, they are lost in other places: all the beggars from Kerry and Bantry and Minterroarra come through here."

The number of beggars is much less than it was four or five years ago, and the reason is believed to be that provisions are cheaper and more plentiful.

Summer is the season in which beggars chiefly go about. Murphy says, "They begin to go away from this parish from St. Patrick's-day*, and keep going till May, according as potatoes grow scarce; it is shame drives them from the place where they are known." They are almost all women; they take their children with them; the husband either stays at home, working with farmers, or goes off to look for work to the north of the country: among the strange beggars, able-bodied men are sometimes seen. Brown says, "There was a good strong able-bodied man came to my cabin this morning; he said he wanted employment and could not get it; I gave him the little alms I could spare, two or three potatoes."

Sometimes one of the children is left at home with the husband to give some little assistance. Whenever there is a garden, the wife comes back as soon as it is time to dig it.

Sullivan says, "There is a neighbour of mine, one Coghlan, that has three children, and his wife goes off; she went off last May, and took two of the children with her. She came home about the latter end of July; she brought nothing but the life with her. He set a quarter and a half of potatoes last year; he paid at the rate of 2*l.* an acre, that is 15*s.*, he had to manure it and work it, and do every hand's turn to it himself; he was digging and eating the potatoes when his wife came home, though they were not ripe, nor half ripe. I suppose they are nearly all out now; I would take employment if I could get it; the farmers cannot give it; they think it too much family they have themselves. I have a very poor cabin; the thatch so bad, that when we have the rain outside we have it inside; we have not a drop of milk nor a way of getting it." The witness adds, "There are many as badly off as he, and their wives do not beg; they stay at home to keep their credit, and spare the shame of it."

Mr. Triphook, protestant curate, says, "It is only dragging out a miserable existence to live as they do; they pay a dear price for a bit of mountain-ground that will only produce horse-potatoes, 'lumpers,' only fit for cattle; they are much better off when they are begging."

Of the men who leave this parish, some stay away, and it is believed that they get permanent employment elsewhere; the number of men who go away is less than it was formerly. Murphy says, "Every one gets a bit of mountain, and tries to get potatoes out of it."

Sullivan says, "I met the wife and children of another neighbour of mine going away in July; she told me that she left him at home with as much potatoes as would do him for a week; he had a quarter and a half of coarse ground; he could not half nor third part manure it; he was using bog-stuff for manure after leaving it to dry two or three weeks; it answers very badly, but it is better than nothing; he is paying at the rate of 2*l.* an acre for the ground; the wife came back in August and brought nothing with her."

There is great reluctance to have recourse to begging; the shame is so great, many when driven to distress go away privately, and succeed in concealing it from their neighbours.

Mahony says, "A family that lived half a mile from you might go away without your knowing it; they are very shy about it, and strive to conceal it."

Some of the strangers are old and infirm; people feel more compassion for such persons. Sullivan says, "I saw an old man this morning, that is going about here this week back; he stops and gets his meals among the people in the town; as for children, I do not know how it is at home with him."

The Bandon weavers begged here in great numbers. A few were observed during the last summer.

When a family of beggars applies for relief at a farmer's house, a greater quantity is of course given than to a single individual, but the wants of the latter being less, he may have a surplus after supporting himself, and be able to sell. Mahony says, "There is a beggar who comes to me now and then with a handful of potatoes to sell; sometimes he has a weight, sometimes in summer a quarter of a weight; I do not know how long it takes him to collect that much; his potatoes are always of different sorts, but he sells them as dear as a farmer, sometimes dearer."

Being asked why a higher price would in any case be given to a beggar, the witness says, "When potatoes are scarce, and poor people have but a little money at a time, they would be be glad to get at them that way. The farmers will not sell less than a basket*; I would rather give a higher price to get as much as I wanted at the time, and have them brought to my door."

Old and infirm people are unable to carry any great weight, and they generally expect something else besides potatoes; they get oatmeal perhaps, and sometimes a little flax or wool, but there is not much of those commodities in the parish. Tuomy says, "I know two old blind men that beg about the country, to go to every fair within 20 miles, and they know the day exactly, the same as if they had an almanack; there is one of them, Cotter, better clad than when he was working for 5*d.* a day and his diet; he has two sons and two daughters. There is one of the sons at service, earning about 9*s.* or 10*s.* a quarter; the other is a little boy, who goes to guide his father; the wife and daughter are gone away somewhere. Sometimes he comes home from his travels, and brings wool and flax; he covers himself that way; he does not beg here; he was formerly a farmer, then reduced to a workman; when he got blind he had nothing to do but go beg; but he was ashamed to do it in his own country. The other blind man is one Burke, middle aged; it was of late that he happened to go beg; he was a small farmer, and did not lose his hold of the ground yet, but he must soon; he has a mother and wife and two children; sometimes the wife goes to guide him, sometimes he begs here at home; he goes to all the fairs; he comes home with flax and wool; he has a blue great coat on him now, that he made up that way, it is worth over 25*s.*; there are twelve bundles † of frieze in it, worth 2*s.* a bundle, and the tailor charged him 1*s.* 6*d.* for making it (he would charge me 2*s.* 6*d.*); he has about a couple of acres and a pig, but he could never do without the begging, since he cannot work. I was at a house about six months ago, where he slept, and he had a bag of wool that he would not give for a guinea; it was offered to him, and he refused it; I am sure it took him six months voyaging about the country to collect that much."

Drunkenness, rogueries, and deceptions to excite compassion, were common among a set of men called "boccoughs," who were very numerous 20 or 30 years ago. A few still exist, but their practices are not so bad as those of their predecessors. Mr. Swanton thinks "there are about a dozen who show themselves at every fair, and subsist entirely by begging." Crippled and diseased children are sometimes carried about, but the witnesses believe that the parents would be glad to have them cured. Sullivan says, "I have heard people say, that the mothers that take lame children about in the arms, would rather keep them so than cure them; but I do not believe it; it is not in a mother's heart."

In order to get more potatoes, a family of beggars sometimes divides, and each party applies and obtains relief from the same house. Murphy says, "I would not care if I gave it to them for God's sake." Mahony says, "Most people would care, and would not give them anything, if they knew them to do such a thing."

The able-bodied men who are seen amongst vagrants, beg only for a season, and stop when they can get employment.

The question being put, whether such persons would be willing to emigrate to America, the witnesses thought that they would be glad to do so. Sullivan says, "Any man that can work, and cannot get it, would prefer it. If we had the means, what is here of us would go off."

Beggars are, in almost all cases, persons who are compelled to become so by sheer necessity. Murphy says, "It is the last time with any one; a man that could get work would never do it." All agree on this point.

The following evidence, given by Hagarty, a beggar, is illustrative of the habits and feelings of his class generally: he says, "I am nearly 50 years old. I have a wife and four children; the eldest is only nine. I went to beg last summer; it was the first time. My wife is begging these six years; we suffered great distress before she went; I had no employment, and could not get any. She went out every summer since; she did no more than support herself and the children; she brought home nothing. In the winter I used to gather twigs, and make little baskets for gathering potatoes; I would get 3*d.* or 4*d.* a piece for them. The neighbours used to give us potatoes in the plentiful season. I was obliged to go out myself last May; we had another young child, and I went to carry it. I would rather stay at home if I could. We staid out about three months; we went to Ross, Drumaleague, Mintervarra, Bantry and other places not farther off; we used to get enough to eat while we were out; we never wanted for lodging; we got it from labourers and poor farmers. We used to get about a weight of potatoes, boiled and raw, in the day; it was just enough to do us; we seldom got more. We made 1*s.*‡ while we were out, and we bought some clothes for the child; the children used often get a drink of milk from the farmers. In winter we get something from the neighbours at home. I would rather stay at home than go out again. I would take a pleasure in seeing the people again that were kind to us, but I would not go out for that; I would rather a great deal work for 8*d.* a day. I was offered work while I was out, but I could not stop from the children; my wife would not be able to carry them. Few farmers would take me in the rags I have, and I could not stand the work myself in winter without better covering. I would be willing to go to America now, if any one one would take me; or to go into a workhouse, even if I was to be separated from my wife and children, if I was sure that they would be well off. I pay no rent for the cabin I have; it is built on the corner of an old road. I do not keep a pig; I could not buy one. I have no clothes but these, (his clothes were literally a heap of rags.) I did not go to mass in my own parish these five years, for want of clothes; I did two or three times in strange places."

Upon this last statement Sullivan observes, "It is true enough, and there are many like him. When a man has nothing but rags on him, he has not courage to go among the people. If he went in among the clean and decent congregation on a Sunday, all the eyes in the chapel would be on him, and he could never stand it."

Beggars get lodging for charity, both from labourers and farmers. Sullivan says, "Many a farmer cannot give it to them; he has his cattle and family in the same house, taking it all up, but a labourer has no cattle." Mahony says, "I had beggars sleeping with me last night, and I had to go and borrow two or three sheaves of straw to make a bed for them, and return it this morning."

Almost every beggar who calls at a farmer's house gets relief; the quantity is generally proportioned to the family. Salter says, "If there be six in a family, they get six potatoes; if there be one beggar, she will not get less than two."

Being asked whether two large potatoes were meant, the witness says, "It would be a shame to give two small potatoes as an alms."

The farmers in this district are very poor. Mr. Swanton knows many, who if the rent were exacted, would be paupers. It is on them nevertheless, and on the labourers, that the relief of beggars falls almost entirely. Mahony says, "If the farmers did not give charity, the poor would starve." The quantity given by any one does not depend on his ability. There are farmers paying 10*l.* a year who do not give as much as labourers. Sullivan says, "The gentry do give alms to be sure, but they do not give as much as they could and ought to give; they do not like to let beggars inside their gates."

Labourers give, proportionably to their means, as much, if not more than any other class. During the summer, when many of them are buying potatoes, they give of course very little; but when they have a supply in the house, even though it should not be sufficient for the winter, they give very readily. Tuomy says, "In summer we cannot give, but when we have a stock in, we give as free as the farmers." Murphy says, "I bought a weight of potatoes to-day, and I think it would be wrong if I should refuse to give an alms out of that." Sullivan says, "We could not have it in the house and see fellow-creatures wanting it; when you see the children with their legs all split with the wet and weather, you would have the heart of a stone not to take compassion on them."

It is very difficult to estimate the quantity of potatoes given away to beggars by a farmer, because it depends more on the benevolence than on the ability of the giver; and also because every farmer feels, or seems to feel, the strongest reluctance to making any calculation on the subject. Sullivan mentions an experiment to ascertain the point which was made by himself and a fellow-servant at a very comfortable farmer's house (a mile and a half from the village) about the middle of last July. He says, "We filled a basket (a measure of nine stone), and told the girl to give nothing to beggars except out of that, and to give as she always did; this was early in the morning; she did what we told her; when we came into dinner about three o'clock, she told us that the basket of potatoes was all gone an hour before. She gave more potatoes that day, but I do not know how much; it was the time of the summer that there were most beggars."

Salter, a farmer, observes, "It is often in summer they come to the kind of a house I have, and there are days when if the woman gave them two potatoes a piece, six weights (a basket) would be out before evening."

It is to be observed that these statements only show how great a quantity is distributed by charitable and comparatively rich farmers on a few days when beggars are most numerous.

They do not afford materials for judging of what is given in ordinary cases. Considering that potatoes during the summer season would sell at the least for 3*s.* a basket, it is obvious that a farmer could not give, even for a month, at a rate so high as that which these statements indicate. Some of the farmers state two weights a week as a fair average, others three weights, others six weights (or a basket), others two baskets.

Although differing so much on this point, they all agree in preferring the present system of giving charity to any compulsory assessment. They say, they do not miss what they give gradually, but a money-tax they cannot pay. Most of the poor farmers in the parish derive little more than a bare subsistence from their holdings; between rent and taxes, they are at present paying the largest sum, which it is impossible for them to make up, and if any additional burthen be placed upon them, they must throw all off, and turn out upon the world.

The farmers present being asked whether their opinions would be changed if there was a fair valuation of the land, and the landlord made to bear his proportion of the tax, so that the tenant would have to pay only in proportion to his interest, they still objected to a tax. One said, "Where there is a poor tenant that has no hold of his ground, the landlord would put all the tax on him."

Being asked if they would agree, instead of giving potatoes to beggars, to throw the same quantity aside every day into a vessel, and send the whole, at the end of the quarter, to an institution where those beggars would be supported, they objected to this also. One says, "I would rather have the gratification of giving them to the poor people myself." Another says, "The wife would never come into it, or any woman in the parish."

Religion has great influence in producing the habits of giving charity. Even if a house of industry were established, some persons would continue to relieve beggars as they do now, but the practice would be gradually discontinued. Sullivan says, "If there was a poorhouse they would not give as they do now; we would say more against it, because they would have something else to depend on; we do it for the good of our soul, but it would not be so great a charity then." Being asked whether he might not be induced to give charity from fear of the beggar's curse, the same witness observes, "It is not for their cursing I would give it. If I knew myself I was doing right, I would not care what they said; but they do not curse or scold, poor creatures, excepting the boccoughs."

Respecting the evil effects of vagrancy, it is observed that beggars have often left sickness in houses where they got charity, but this does not occur now so frequently as formerly. Murphy says, "I know a house that got sickness from a family of beggars that got lodging there about 12 months ago: it was a labouring man's house, and the wife and six children all took the measles. The same man gives lodging to beggars still."

It does not appear that those who are driven to beggary give up all thoughts of returning to a more decent state of life. On the contrary, even after being compelled to lead a vagrant life for years, a strong anxiety is felt to shake off the disgrace. When the children grow up the mothers generally leave off begging. Sullivan says, "When the children get anything strong, they do not like to let the mother have the shame of it any longer. I know a woman now, of the name of Barry, that has grown up children; she was begging for a long time, but she stopped about five years ago. As soon as they were able to work, as soon as the boys or girls are able to go into service, or do any little industry, they stop." Tuomy says, "About four or five years ago the mother of Cornelius Mahony was a beggar, but she dropped it as soon as the children were able to earn anything." Several other cases were known of persons who were formerly beggars, and who now keep their houses.

Beggars would have great objection to go into a house of industry, but it is thought that they would be compelled by the pressure of hunger. The labourers would not think it so great a disgrace to go in there as to beg, but separation of families and confinement are such evils that they would prefer almost any sort of subsistence outside; they agreed that they would prefer the hardest work outside at 8 d. a day. Mr. Barry says, if they had 8 d. a day, they would be in comparative comfort, and the wives would give up begging, and many who are worse off than the beggars would be relieved. It would be easy here to find employment for them. A great part of the parish is in a most deplorable state for want of communications; people are obliged to bring their produce across mountain paths on the backs of horses, with immense loss of time and labour. There is a great deal of land in the interior, which has never been broken up, but which could be cultivated if manure could be easily procured; there is abundance of manure along the sea shore, sand* and the sea-weed; but from the want of a road the expense of conveyance is too great to be undertaken. The government road, which runs through the parish, has been of immediate benefit. There is more land brought into cultivation by it, and more employment afforded, and turf is accessible to many who suffered before for want of it. The same witness afterwards adds, "There is meadow ground now where the surveyors that were laying down that road had to put planks under their feet."

Some hours after the above information regarding the proper remedies for the distress had been given, and after the labourers had reflected on the subject, Sullivan came and said, "There are two points in it. If I was in distress and got 8 d. a day for working on the roads, what good would that be to an old woman or an old man that had no child to earn for him, or could not work himself? it would be better to have both, the poorhouse for them that could not work, and the employment for them that could."

THE number of vagrants in this parish is not great, comparatively with other parishes; and a number of those who do live in this parish go into others to beg. The cause of their decreasing in number is, that their treatment in the house of industry is much better than formerly; therefore, though the number of poor have increased, street beggars are not more numerous.

The particular season of the year at which vagrancy most prevails is summer. From September, through the winter, the provision trade is more brisk, there is a considerable increased circulation of money in Cork, a good deal of employment, and potatoes are cheap. Many of those whose wives and children beg through the spring months are in employment during winter; they are chiefly women, scarcely ever an able-bodied man. Numbers of the women having children, are the wives of labourers who would be ashamed to beg themselves; some are widows and some were never married; they are mostly infirm through age. It does does not appear that any who during the week are able to earn a subsistence are seen begging on Sunday.

There is a much greater reluctance on the part of the mechanics to allow their wives or families to beg, than of labourers; the former being known as members of a body to each other, they will almost perish rather than let them beg. Those labourers who go for work to England are never seen to beg their way here.

The cities are mostly the places where the greatest numbers of vagrants are produced.

The majority of vagrants are produced by the death of the husband, or by his being out of employment; the greater part of the street beggars have grown up so.

There are none who choose this mode of life, although they may prefer remaining beggars after they have commenced it. In some cases they are driven to it with feelings of the deepest shame and sorrow.

The regular beggar-woman obtains about 3 s. per week. There is a class, however, who sit in the street and beg from the passers-by, who get an average of 4 d. per day. Many of those who go about obtain fragments of food and halfpence, to the amount of between 3 s. or 4 s. weekly. There are some in the towns who get a good deal from the passengers in coaches, cars, &c; they are the most impudent and of the very worst description; they are very numerous sometimes, so many as 50, including the children, living in this way; there is a blind man amongst them whom they have chosen for their king. They are sure to be in attendance at every wedding, and a fair division is afterwards made of whatever they may get.

Many years ago there was a class of beggars very numerous in the country, who were in the habit of resorting to deceptive means; they were called "boccoughs," and made a regular trade of begging; they attended fairs and weddings, where they got a great deal of money, but were sometimes detected in their false sores and lamenesses; of late years scarcely one of them has been seen.

Vagrants sometimes pretend to be cripples, and usually encourage a miserable appearance in order to excite sympathy, but are scarcely ever known to produce sores on their bodies for that purpose.

They sometimes have recourse to surreptitiously obtained recommendations. Witness remembers one instance of a child (representing himself as an orphan) coming to a shopkeeper three or four times successively, at length he was detained, and threatened with punishment, and in a short time the father and mother made their appearance. He said that these expedients are not at all uncommon, but knows of no instances of their refusing to have sores cured, or to have the deaf or dumb or crippled children taken to the asylums for fear of diminishing their excitements to sympathy.

The children of beggars frequently grow up thieves and pickpockets; they begin with stealing coal, potatoes, and straw from carts, and become gradually hardened.

Beggars are extremely charitable to each other, and are scarcely ever known to hoard their earnings; they are rarely seen to beg with borrowed children.

The women frequently have children with them, but it does not seem that they marry earlier than the other classes of the community.

In many instances the vagrants enjoy more physical comforts, and are better off than poor people, who are not.

In general there is no knowledge whatever on the part of the almsgiver, of the character of those to whom he is giving.

When women once become beggars, they generally prefer remaining so, though in the first instance they may have had recourse to it with the greatest reluctance. Indeed, it is very rare that persons take to begging through choice; though many are found to prefer remaining beggars as a mode of living, in preference to resuming their industrious habits even though an opportunity should offer.

The relief given is generally by halfpence at the doors of respectable shopkeepers, and from people in carriages; but they are scarcely ever known to get clothing of any description.

There are some families who have what is termed pensioners or "hangers on," to whom they give old clothes, broken meat, &c., they generally consist of old servants and poor women working in the house. In country towns, shopkeepers are very much in the habit of giving a weekly allowance of 6 d., and others a halfpenny a day, for which the donor generally expects a prayer for himself and family.

The relief of beggars falls very heavily on shopkeepers and struggling people. Those of this parish are supported a great deal by other parishes in the most respectable part of the city; they receive very little from the upper classes, being in a great measure debarred any access to them, while the poor and working classes give much more than a due proportion to the poor, though not exactly to street beggars; people who frequent shops are also in the habit of giving charity.

Some farmers give in the shape of food and money to the value of 2 s. or 2 s. 6 d. per week, some 1 s., and there are others who give much more extensively, and who (through a feeling of religion) try to conceal it as much as possible. The respectable shopkeepers would much prefer giving a regular annual sum; they are so much annoyed and sometimes injured in trade by the present mode of giving, as people dislike going into their shops in consequence of beggars surrounding their doors; but the small shopkeepers have an objection to a tax of any kind.

Relief is given sometimes from a religious and charitable feeling, sometimes to have the prayer of the beggar, and sometimes to get rid of importunity, and from fear of "the beggar's curse."

There is one house of industry for the whole city, which has as many inmates as it can contain; regular street beggars hate the house of industry. A case was mentioned when a person was put into the cart that was sent round; it was attacked by a company of beggars, smashed in the street, and the prisoner set free.

THE number of street beggars in this parish is very great, but the precise amount is not ascertainable; it has however increased, and is increasing; moreover it was stated, that if all the present beggars were taken away, their places would be soon supplied.

The principal season when street begging most prevails, is in the summer months, from the going out of the old potatoes to the coming in of the new. A great many of these beggars come from the country, and after receiving a good deal from the people of the parish, return home to dig their potatoes.

They consist almost exclusively of women and children, able-bodied men being scarcely ever seen begging; they are ashamed to beg, but send their wives. The wives and children of employed labourers do not generally beg, yet they sometimes do when the family is large and the labourer not getting regular employment; even many cottier tenants, after planting their potatoes, wander about in search of alms. In the case of mechanics it is rare; there are some, but usually the superannuated; they are the last class that could be driven to such a resource; they have been known to come out at night-fall, being ashamed to be seen begging. There have been no instances in this parish of persons going to England, begging their way, farther than that many tradesmen and labourers make application for a free passage, but no sort of begging.

The majority of the distressed persons in the parish are persons reduced; many, from the decay of the woollen and cotton manufacturers, scarcely any whose parents had been beggars. Though many beggars are physically better off than labourers, yet witnesses did not conceive that any became beggars from choice; none were known to do so except from necessity.

With regard to the amount of their earnings, one of the priests of the parish attended a beggar, who at his death left a large sum of money, something about 22 l. A beggar with a family is looked on as "a greater object," that is, more deserving of charity than a single person.

When beggars get more food than they can eat, witnesses agreed that they sell the surplus, though they did not know how they disposed of the money. Sometimes after standing for some hours in the cold, they have gone to the whiskey shops and refreshed themselves, but they are seldom seen drunk. Mr. Murphy, president of the sick poor society, stated, that some time ago he saw a man at the chapel door begging, and that all the beggars cried out against him, that he was not a fit person to get charity. It was considered, that the apprehension of diminishing compassion would prevent a beggar from putting on a good coat or gown.

It was the current testimony of all, that vagrants exhibit most disgusting sores; but there were no instances known of a refusal to have them cured. Witnesses heard and believed that they sometimes exhibited false sores, and even wounded themselves, but knew no case; they are quite convinced that a beggar would not wear a decent dress if he got it. No instances were known of beggars having recourse to such expedients as forged recommendations, &c., at least such things were rare; nor have there been any refusals on the part of the parents of blind or deaf or dumb children to allow them to go into asylums, preferring to keep them for the purpose of moving pity. It is a practice with those who have maimed or otherwise afflicted children, to carry them about ragged and wretched in wet and cold, to render them more piteous objects, and thus more beneficial.

With regard to the habits of those who live by begging, some of them have been seen drunk, though drunkenness is not a general practice, nor are meetings of them known to take place in any part of the parish for the purpose of drinking or smoking. No instances have been known where they were concerned in any outrages on person or property; they live solely by begging. It seldom happens that they hoard their earnings; a few cases have, however, occurred in the parish. A remarkable one has been already mentioned of a beggar dying worth 22 l.

They frequently have large families, about half of them at least; those with families being more likely to be relieved than single persons; they marry early, yet not more early than labourers and mechanics, but early marriages are very numerous, both among labourers and mechanics. The mortality amongst them is not greater, it is perhaps less than among the labouring classes; they have less hardships and are more innured to the inclemency of the weather, consequently they suffer less from cold, insufficient clothing, &c.

On the point of the comparative state of the beggar and labourer, it was considered that in merely physical comforts the beggar was better off, but for the shame of it.

Scarcely

Scarcely ever is an inquiry made into the character of a beggar; they who give, judge by appearances. None have been known to take to such a life in preference to remaining labourers; but when they got over the disgrace they would rather remain beggars, though they have not been known to refuse the ordinary wages when offered.

The form in which relief is given to beggars is in potatoes, fragments of meat and vegetables left at dinner; clothes are not given to ordinary beggars; but there are instances of persons reduced to beggary getting clothes from those who formerly knew them.

The quantity given to beggars at any particular house daily is quite uncertain, nor is it possible to say whether the quantity given by any family would be sufficient for the support of an additional labourer.

The evidence was quite clear that the relief of the poor fell chiefly on the middle classes; that the struggling shopkeepers are most liberal, often to a degree beyond their means. The opulent classes do not give in proportion; their contributions are principally confined to public charities.

The value in food and money that a poor shopkeeper may give, amounts perhaps to 6*d.* a week, yet they would prefer giving in this way to paying 10*s.* at the end of the year; they do not feel it going when given gradually, and have a great dislike to paying a certain sum; the feeling in this parish was, however, undecided about a poor law. Mr. Dayly, the roman-catholic curate, was of opinion that the majority of the parishioners would object to it from political motives.

Importunity frequently prevails in procuring alms, and the respectable shopkeepers often give to get rid of a teazing beggar; religious feeling, too, is very strong, and induces people to give alms; yet if there were an institution near to relieve the poor, religion would not have such an influence. In making a collection in a time of great distress, Dr. Quarry, rector of the parish, said, he went into a house where the shopkeeper was very poor, and burst into tears because he had nothing to give. It did not appear that the dread of a beggar's curse had any effect in causing persons to give relief; the beggar would be afraid to curse, lest it might prevent him from succeeding elsewhere.

No instances known of persons who have long followed a beggar's life returning to industrious courses.

The punishments inflicted for vagrancy have been very rare in this district; some few vagrants have been sent to the house of industry, but people do not like sending them there.

There is no house of industry in this parish. There was great reluctance formerly to go into the city house of industry, now there is less; they are better treated than formerly, still the reluctance is very great; they prefer the freedom of begging. The reasons for their reluctance are, that they do not like the confinement, nor the diet; outside they get occasionally bits of meat. The women are very fond of tea; they sometimes remain till the middle of the day without food, for the purpose of collecting a few halfpence for tea. In the house of industry they get but potatoes and porridge.

THE parish is swarming with beggars. There are nearly 100 beggars living regularly in the town, and there are many more who come from the country after setting their potatoes, and remain till they go back to dig them. There are, besides, some poor women that are but a sort of beggars, but who buy a little tobacco in the town, and go out into the country and exchange it for potatoes, which they get cheap. Beggars seem to have increased in the parish latterly; the number, however, varies in the course of the year, and one cause of the variation is the state of the fishery; when fish is plentiful, there are women occupied in selling it, who are obliged to beg at other seasons.

A good many come from the country when their stock of potatoes is exhausted; of late they are not so numerous as they used to be; they cannot get so much on account of the number of beggars in town. Sometimes beggars from Bandon have been seen in Kinsale, and Kinsale beggars in Bandon; and the Kinsale beggars have been known to fight with strange beggars who came into town, on the ground that they had no right to come there. About three or four years ago Lord Carbery, who however is a man highly esteemed in his neighbourhood, sent off a lot of poor tenants from his estate under the Subletting Act: they were unwilling to stir at first, but their cottages were burned and they were driven off. Many of them came to Kinsale to beg; about the same time, too, the Bandon weavers used to come here begging. The beggars in this parish consist in general of old women and some old men, very few sturdy beggars; a great many of them are widows; they are for the most part old, blind or lame, or in some way disabled.

Most of the beggars have been such for a long time back, and it is impossible to say whether they have been reduced, or have been originally the children of beggars; they do not choose it as a mode of life, but after a short time become quite reconciled to it. They generally get 6*d.* or 7*d.* a week, on which (with broken meat that they get after families' dinners) they support themselves. Sometimes the town beggars go to the neighbouring farmers, and sometimes they bring back a good wallet of potatoes; but they are so numerous that they cannot often make these excursions. There is not a day that there are not a dozen or more of them surrounding the doors of the shopkeepers.

For some time past there have been very few instances of vagrants resorting to deceptive means; it used formerly to be very much the habit, but from their being frequently detected it has gradually declined; they are unwilling (even if they had them) to appear in decent clothes. One of the witnesses gave an instance of a woman whom he had seen to get decent clothes, and who a short time afterwards was seen in her rags, and gave as her reason for not wearing them, that if well clad she would not get charity; he also gave an instance to the contrary, of a poor beggar-woman who keeps her children as neat and clean as possible, and though she does not obtain indiscriminate charity, yet some families (in consequence of this conduct) give a good deal. Beggars often come round with petitions and recommendations honestly obtained; these are generally of a more decent order suffering under temporary distress.

They are in the habit of drinking whiskey, and are sometimes seen in a state of intoxication, but are seldom or never found to be concerned in any robberies. Witness gave one instance of intoxication, where he says, "I recollect a man with a wooden leg so drunk that he unscrewed the leg and laid about him with it; his wife was along with him; was drunk also." The same witness gave two instances of beggars hoarding money, which came within his knowledge; one was that of an old woman in Kinsale, who passed for years as being in a state of destitution and starvation, but was found on her death to have 5*l.* concealed on her person; the other was an old man, who died worth 25*l.*; and, on hearing of his death, the beggars in the neighbourhood collected at the place, and fought and scrambled till the old man's savings were scattered among them.

The practice of hiring children certainly exists.

Very few vagrants, in proportion with other classes of poor, died of cholera. They generally are long lived; witness knows one beggar in the town who is 107 years old, and who has been begging for the last 50 years. Death from starvation is very rare; they generally waste away from bad and insufficient food.

The regular town beggars are almost always well known to be in real distress, but people cannot judge of the strange beggars; with very few exceptions, it is with the greatest reluctance that labourers become beggars, but when once they get over the first pang of shame, they then continue with the greatest ease to themselves. The witness gave an instance of an able-bodied man, a fisherman, who came to ask alms from him after he had refused to work, though he offered him 5*s.* a week; "but this," he adds, "was a very rare case."

The form in which relief is usually given is in halfpence, and broken meat after dinner.

They never leave the farmer's house without something, mostly food of some description. The gentry in towns sometimes give weekly allowances to certain beggars, of from 2*d.* to 6*d.*; the shopkeepers also give a good deal in this way.

The relief of the beggars chiefly falls on the shopkeepers, as the gentry are not at all so easily accessible. The higher classes, however, give a share, and the lower orders give food.

Shopkeepers in general give an average of 2*d.* a week all through the year, but yet the majority of them would be unfavourable to a poor law; they dread a mismanagement of the funds.

Most people that give to beggars do it from a strong charitable feeling.

There is no house of industry in the parish, and even if there was, the poor would not willingly go into it; but were there one they would be obliged to go, as the people of the town would not give them charity when they might so easily obtain relief.

LAST season, counting the children, 300 persons at least passed through this parish begging. Courcey's country has the name of producing potatoes, and the beggars flock to it in numbers. There is great variation in the numbers, and the increase or decrease is not regular; there have been seasons when 500 strange beggars came here during a scarcity of potatoes.

Summer is the season when vagrancy most prevails; the potatoes of the former year are exhausted, and the new ones are not come in. The majority who thus beg in summer are strangers, but there are about 14 or 15 persons in the parish who beg all the year round; most of them have families; altogether there are about 60 persons supported in this way. Beggars are generally women with children; some of them say their husbands are dead; some that they are gone to work, but in most cases, that they have gone to England, or to some remote part of the country, for work. Mr. Gibbons says he has seen men, able-bodied and from appearance fit to work, going about begging, and when one of them was questioned, questioned, he always said he was subject to fits, or to some disease which rendered him unfit for work. In this parish the wives of employed labourers do not work. Within three or four years we had a great many Bandon weavers begging in our parish; the year before last not less than 12 applied for relief in one day, decent tradesmen from Bandon. About 15 families, women with their children, leave this parish to beg; their husbands either go to some other parts of the country to work, or to England, on their way to which they do not beg; the place of embarkment (Kinsale) being so near, prevents the necessity of their doing so.

Vagrants come to this parish chiefly from Kerry, and the western parts of the county of Cork.

Few vagrants are bred to vagrancy; most of them are driven to beg by distress.

A beggar would obtain about a weight (21 lbs.) of potatoes in the day. Daniel Crowley, labourer, says, "When the potatoes were 6*d.* a weight, my wife bought from the beggar people, and it was only half a weight or three quarters they would have to sell at a time; there are a great many of them, and I think, one with another, half a weight is as much as they would get in a day."

The larger the family the greater the quantity given to them; and families have been seen to divide, and both parties to apply with success to the same persons. The infirm person will get more at any particular house than an able-bodied beggar; but the latter, from being able to go about more, will collect a greater quantity at the end of the day.

The beggars occasionally sell a weight or a half weight of potatoes, to buy a little tobacco or to mend their old shoes, but not to purchase tea or whiskey; they save, too, all they can against winter.

There was a class of beggars, the boccoughs, who used to practise deceptions, but there are very few of them now. Mr. Cotter says, "I think that almost all who beg are in distress; but they are sometimes guilty of deception, unquestionably. I recollect a woman coming to my door and fainting on the steps; she appeared to be in the greatest destitution; I felt her pulse, and thought she was not so bad as she seemed; I said she should be bled, and sent for a basin and lancet; she got up at once and walked off. Beggars have not been known to refuse to have their sores dressed, nor do they carry about their children in wet or cold to excite compassion."

The beggars are not of dissolute habits, except the "boccoughs," and very few of these remain now. They are never concerned in outrages or in assassinations; and though they have been charged with having stolen from farmers' houses where they get lodgings, yet no instance was known. Their kindness to their children is as great as that of other people, and they have not the practice of hiring or borrowing children to excite compassion. No instance was known in the parish of a beggar hoarding his earnings, further than for such a purpose as providing against winter.

A woman has generally two or three children, and often more. As to mortality from destitution and beggary, the lives of a great many are certainly shortened by want of sufficient nourishment at particular seasons, but none die of absolute starvation. Within the last fortnight there was a man, a half idiot, about 60 years of age, who died on the road, about a quarter of a mile off. He had no shelter, and spent the night upon the road. There was an inquest; and a verdict given, that he died by some internal complaint, aggravated by exposure to the weather. The reason was not known why he was not taken in by some one, the poor are so very willing to give shelter to the beggar.

On the question of the comparative condition of the beggar and labourer, Daniel Crowley says, "Why, it is hard to say the beggar is well off at all; a labouring man is often badly off enough, God knows, but I can hardly say that he is worse than a beggar. To be sure, a woman will sometimes get more by begging than a man by working, but it is often the case that the beggar will travel miles and get nothing, or but very little."

Of people living in the parish, who get relief either by begging or otherwise, the character is well known, but nothing is known of strangers. In no way, it was stated, is the prevalence of private charity injurious to the morals of the lower classes. In this, as throughout, the representation is according to the statement made.

Relief is generally given in the way of a night's lodging by farmers and labourers; in several farmers' houses there are beds for the beggars. William Connell states, "My father is a farmer, and has about 50 acres of land; there is scarcely a night that one or two beggars do not sleep in his house." The farmers also give potatoes, such as they are using themselves, and milk whenever they have it plentifully, but there is very little milk in this country. They prefer giving potatoes to money, because money is scarce and potatoes abundant.

A farmer scarcely ever allows a beggar to go away without an alms, but the quantity depends on the plenty or scarcity of the potatoes; four or five would be a small alms to a beggar, and if the beggar comes at meal time, a full meal of boiled potatoes is given.

The relief of the beggars falls on the farmers and labourers; the gentry discourage them as much as possible. Beggars walk up to a farmer's house with as much boldness as if they had a right to relief; even the labouring people give charity to beggars, more than they can afford. When the labourer bought potatoes at 8 d. a weight, he has often been known to take away from his own support in order to give to the poor beggar that comes his way. D. Crowley says, "When I was buying potatoes myself at 8 d. a weight, I gave away a little to the beggar, in the honour of God. I was pinched to do it, to be sure, but I do not think it has done me any harm."

As to the quantity given by a farmer in the day, Michael Coveney says, "At my father's house, one day with another, there is a weight of potatoes given to the beggars, three or four four to each. Some farmers will give two weights a day during the summer, and will still bestow alms even when buying potatoes themselves. There are no shopkeepers in the parish of Templetrine; but in the village of Ballinspittle, where I live, it costs the few of them that are there (three or four,) at least one and a half a day; I would be better pleased to give that away as I do, than pay 10 s. a year. I do not feel it now, and I am sure I will not miss at the end of the year what I give away in the honour of God; besides, it is more convenient to give away a little as you have it, than to give a regular sum in a lump." But though the farmers would rather give as at present, yet some of them complain that the relief of beggars is a heavy tax upon them.

When there are many motives, it is hard to say which predominates. Mr. Cottier says, "The motive in most cases is this: a farmer does not like to refuse to do what his neighbours do; he does not like to have it said of him that he would refuse the beggar." But Mr. Gibbons says, "The motive is in general a strong charitable one; the people are very susceptible, and the beggars understand this; they use the most moving expressions, and tell pitiable stories of their distress."

The beggars have not been known to be in any way instrumental in spreading disease, nor have any instances of their stealing from farmers who gave them a night's lodging been remembered; and with regard to the stories they tell, Michael Coveney says, "The only stories I ever heard beggars telling, or heard of their telling, were old stories of fairies, and of old times, and may be they made the half of them themselves; and there is many a farmer that would give them eating and drinking and lodging to hear them tell the same stories, even if there was a poorhouse within half a mile of him." And Crowley says, "They tell stories enough, but I never heard of them doing any harm by them."

When the children grow up they get quite ashamed of begging, and go into some employment.

Any severe law would be a dead letter unless it was accompanied by a provision for relief. There would be no objection to sending beggars to their own parishes, if they got enough to support themselves on their way home. The repugnance to severe laws would unquestionably be removed if there was a provision made to prevent the chance of starvation. The farmers would be very glad to get rid of strange beggars; and if there was a place for them, they would be glad enough to send them off to it."

"The beggars," said Mr. Connell, farmer, "would be glad enough, certainly they ought to be glad enough, to go into a house of industry; at all events, if there was such a place to give relief, I am sure they would not get any from the farmers." Mr. Sealy says, "If you take into the house of industry a labourer's wife and children when he is going to England for work, and let them out to him when he comes back, he will be very well pleased, and you will find many of them willing enough to go in. As to able-bodied labourers, if when they were in they would be obliged to remain in for a year, the system would not work. Although there is a much greater number of labourers in summer than we can find employment for, it often happens that at harvest we cannot get as many as we want." John M'Kennedy, labourer, says, "he thinks they ought to go in, though it would be hard with some of them to part from their wives and children;" but, he added, "I would go into it myself to-morrow if it was near." And Crowley said, "Some would go into it, to be sure, but I would suffer a great deal before I would go, and be separated from my wife and children; it would be sweeter to have one meal of potatoes together, just as much as would keep the life in us, than to part and have what we liked."

THE number of strolling beggars who come into this parish is beyond description; in some seasons 200 pass through; in last season more than 100 did so. There is a sort of beggars in the parish of a decenter kind than those who come from a distance; they do not go regularly about to every house. Some of them are old and infirm, still with young families. Some are widows with no means of support; they may be altogether about 20 families. The number of poor distressed people in the parish is greater than the number of strollers, but the number of regular beggars belonging to the parish is less.

There does not appear to be any sensible increase or decrease of vagrants; but whenever the potatoes are scarce and dear, they come in crowds.

The time for their coming in the greatest numbers is from the beginning of summer till the late potatoes are got up; they are chiefly strangers from the west; perhaps 10 or 12 would come from Kinsale. Among the vagrants there are more women and children than men; the reason is, that the husbands are gone to get work in some other part of the country. Most of the men who beg are old and infirm, but there are some able-bodied among them; and when asked why they were not at work? they replied, "The wife and children could not get enough to eat at home, so they were forced to come out; I was obliged to come out also to take care of them." In this parish very few go about seeking alms after planting their potatoes, and they who do so would rather ask from those who do not know them than from those who saw them in their better days.

An able-bodied beggar would obtain, one day with another, two weights of potatoes (42 lbs.), so that those who are clever at collecting make money of it.

The more numerous the family, the more potatoes they usually get; and sometimes when there are a man and wife and a family of children, each of them takes half of the children, and begs at the same house, as if there was no connexion between them. An aged or infirm man is deemed a greater object, and therefore will obtain more at any particular house than the able-bodied beggar, but the latter being able to go to more farm-houses in the day, will collect more.

When they have a bag full of potatoes they sell it. Most of them lay by the money for winter; few of them go into the public-house.

Rags and dirt are encouraged by them, to produce sympathy; but that sort of beggars who used to produce sores, &c. on their body, the "boccoughs," are very rare now to be seen. There have been some cases of persons pretending to be half mad, for the purpose of exciting compassion. Some time ago a woman of this kind, miserably dressed, made her appearance; she got some good clothes and put them on; in half an hour after she appeared at another place in her old ones, but by some chance the imposition was discovered.

Very few of them are of dissolute habits, nor do they meet in this parish for the purpose of drinking and smoking; but with respect to stealing, there have been some cases of their taking clothes from the hedges; and when a farmer gives them a night's lodging, they are watched very closely, lest they steal anything.

It was considered that when once a man gets over the shame of begging, and becomes a regular stroller, he is better off than many who give him charity, and far better off than the man who almost starves rather than beg.

Many of those who come to beg would be able to stay at home; but they come out because they see what is to be made of it.

Labourers give lodgings to strolling beggars, and it sometimes happens that the beggar in turn joins his potatoes with the labourer, for a common meal: this is the only thing like payment that the beggars ever give. Sometimes when they are told by a farmer they cannot be accommodated with lodging, they say they will not go; they will sleep in some out-place if they will not be let in; and the farmer thinks it better to let them in and have them watched than provoke their enmity.

Scarcely any one that asks for alms is refused, and some farmers give away as much as would support two additional workmen, from the beginning of summer to the middle of September.

Strolling beggars are relieved almost entirely by the farmers; the gentry discourage them as much as possible. The farm-house is more open to them, and they go up to it with boldness and confidence as if they had a right to get charity. Even the day-labourers give whenever they can, but which is seldom; still, even when their own stock is but small, they are willing to bestow some of it on a poor person.

In some places there may be 12 or 14 applicants for relief in the course of the day, and half a dozen potatoes to a beggar would be considered a small thing. During the scarce season a farmer may give two weights of potatoes a day; a farmer of 30 acres and a farmer of 100 will give nearly the same; but at the house of the latter the beggar has a chance of getting milk also. As to whether the farmers would prefer a regular sum to the present mode, the two said, if it were proved to them that they gave to the value of 3*l.* in the present way, they would prefer it to giving 1*l.* in a regular sum of money; most of them would feel this. Some, however, would rather give money.

Mr. O'Connor, the parish priest, said, "I am afraid it is more frequently given, because it is the custom of the district, than because the true principle of charity prompts them to give. A farmer will not let a beggar go from his door, because he does not like it should be said of him that he is unlike his neighbours; that he does not treat the poor like other people."

When beggars get into the practice of begging regularly, it is impossible to break them off it; this does not apply to those who beg only for a season, but those who live in the parish and beg the year round.

In this parish there have been no punishments for vagrancy. When the cholera first appeared, the beggars were to a great degree excluded from coming to the parish by proclamation, threatening punishment to any strangers that came from their own parish into this.

There is no house of industry in the parish, but if there was one properly managed, the poor people would be glad and delighted to go into it; they would have a clean place to live in; they would have a bed and regular meals, and certainly would be ten times better off than at present. A house of industry, of course, for the old and weak and cripples, and widows and orphans; all of them would be glad to go into it. But it would be impossible for the parish to support a house of industry, the expense would be so great; this was the opinion of the two farmers examined.

Hoare states that he has resided in Cahir during the last 27 years, and that during that period he has observed vagrancy to have been steadily on the increase, owing to an augmenting population and the consequent diminution in the amount of employment; "there are at present," he adds, "full 40 families in the town out of 200, who are in a state of utter destitution."

In a scarce summer the wife and children of a peasant's family go about the country as beggars, and in such seasons, one family in every 12 of the district is supported in this way. The husband usually stays at home to take care of the holding, and he either remains in his own cabin, or lives with some of his neighbours during the absence of his family, or sometimes he leaves the place altogether and goes to the east * in search of work. In ordinary times, old men and women constitute the greater number of vagrants: women are more numerous than men, and but few of them are able-bodied with families. The Rev. Mr. Fitzgerald observes, that "it is rare to see a person who is capable of work begging; the feeling against them would be very great." He has this year only seen one male vagrant with a family. When provisions are unusually dear, the families of those labourers who depend upon casual employment and a little score-ground, are compelled to have recourse to temporary mendicancy, and for this purpose they generally go to parts of the country where they are not likely to be known. In addition to these, the poorer description of cottier tenantry periodically become vagrants, and after they have planted their potatoes they wander about the country seeking alms. One class of mechanics is also occasionally to be found begging, viz. poor weavers who have been completely ruined by the failure of the linen trade. "I meet these poor people everywhere," says the Rev. Mr. Chute; "I sometimes see 12 of them in the course of the year, for they always call upon the clergyman of the parish." The minute subdivision of land has hitherto been an abundant source of poverty. It was customary for parents to divide whatever ground they possessed into separate portions for each of their children, and after allotting to each his share, the old people have often quitted their homes, and adopted a vagrant life. This practice and its consequences have, however, been recently checked by the substitution of tenures at will for those by lease. A good many labourers of the neighbouring baronies go to England in the beginning of July in search of work, leaving their wives and children to subsist on charity, and these latter in great numbers are to be found begging through the parish of Cahir.

Very few persons beg here who do not belong to the country, and scarcely one is to be met with who is not at least a native of Munster. Those who come from the greatest distance are the distressed weavers of Bandon, and some inhabitants of the barony of Dunkerrin. Kerry, according to the Rev. Mr. Sullivan, has the reputation of being a bad place for beggars, as the houses are situated so remote from each other. Mendicants have in most cases been residents of towns; and Mr. Chute remarks, "that those parts of the country produce the greatest number of paupers which are most remote from the sea near to the shore. Potatoes are plenty from the abundance and fertilizing quality of sea manure."

Several mendicants of the present day are the children of mendicants; such children are badly brought up, and acquire the vicious habits of their parents. An old beggar-man belonging to the parish trained up two of his children to steal; they used to procure themselves a night's lodging in the houses of charitable people, and rising in the middle of the night, they used to let their father in, or else throw from the window to him whatever they could lay their hands upon; the father was arrested and died in gaol, after having been found guilty. His children are still wanderers, but there have been no complaints against them since their father's death.

The average daily collection of an able-bodied beggar is supposed to be about two stone of potatoes, but it not unfrequently occurs that a mendicant is wholly unable to obtain as much as his necessities require; an instance of this happened some years ago, in which a vagrant who had been unsuccessful in getting enough to eat, came back to his hovel, hungry and broken-hearted, and terminated his misery by hanging himself.

The amount of relief given to a family of beggars is usually in proportion to its numbers. Mendicants seem to be aware of the existence of this rule, for no member of a family travels alone; they go in parties of two or three each, and each party applies successively at the same house, and receives a handful of potatoes and a mug of milk. Beggars with families of young children are often able to sell a small bag of potatoes which they have accumulated. Mr. Hoare says "that the poor labourer is often the purchaser of their surplus collections, and that the money obtained by them in this manner is generally expended in the purchase of clothes and tobacco. In some rare instances they have been known to have saved in summer against the wants of winter, but in general they do not exhibit any prudent foresight. There are a few beggar-women who amass now and then a small sum, which they hand over to some member of their family who has a fixed residence, and who is willing to receive them into his house during the worst months of the year.

It does not appear that, with the exception of the custom of dividing their families into several parties, the ordinary mendicants who frequent this parish are in the habit of resorting to fraudulent or deceptive means for the purpose of exciting charity. The boccoughs, however, who may be looked upon as a talented description of beggar, and who are to be met with at fairs, where they harangue the people, and at chapel doors, where they importune those who go in and out, are in most instances decided impostors, that is, they are in want, want, but they adopt unfair means to relieve their want. There are not any beggars here who make a trade either of producing artificial sores, or of exhibiting those which have come on them spontaneously; neither are there any who hawk about forged or lying representations or petitions.

The roman-catholic clergymen agree in stating that the habits of the resident mendicants are not incorrect, and that none are addicted to drinking. Mr. Hoare observes, that this character cannot be extended to those who attend fairs, who do not in general beg for food alone. "These," he says, "are a jovial set, who get drunk whenever they can, and always make an improper use of their gains." It has been observed, that even in periods of distress, the others have never been implicated either in the outrages on the person or on thefts of provisions.

A vagrant family usually consists of a mother and several children. The blanket which they all share at night, is carried by the strongest child; one or two others are provided with small bags to carry potatoes, and the mother often carries the younger, two at a time, on her back. Illegitimate children are much more frequent among strolling beggars than in any other class of the population. "Such persons," says the Rev. Mr. Chute, "have been badly brought up from their childhood, and in consequence of the irregularity of their habits, they have a sense of religion far less strong than the labouring people; when they grow up they become a burthen to their mother, and get into the service of some farmer, where they cease to be under any restraint."

It is the opinion of the witnesses, that an able-bodied person with a few children would obtain by mendicancy, if not more money, certainly more food, than the wages of any labourer, even in full employment, would at any time enable him to procure.

Farmers are generally acquainted with the persons and circumstances of the beggars of their immediate neighbourhood, but a great many get relief from them of whom they absolutely know nothing, and of whom they think it unnecessary to make any inquiries as to what they may have already received, because, as Mr. Hoare remarks, their appearance sufficiently bespeaks their misery.

A vagrant in the country easily finds a night's lodging in the cabin of the labourer, but those who are stationary in the town are under a weekly rent of 2*d.* or 3*d.* for the accommodation which is afforded them. In the house of a very poor person, the potatoes which they have collected during the day are often shared as part payment for their bed, which consists merely of ferns or heath. The country produces but little straw, and farmers cannot afford to give it in charity. The relief given in food consists chiefly of potatoes; sweet milk is never given, buttermilk sometimes, and mendicants carry, in order to receive it, either a tin can, or more frequently a wooden gallon. Some poor persons go about the country in search of wool, which is given them as alms, and at the same time they subsist on food which they obtain from the charitable.

According to Messrs. Fitzgerald and Sullivan, the quantity given away by any individual in the course of the day, varies only according to the number of applicants for relief. Each vagrant receives about three or four potatoes, and from 10 to 30 of them will call at a house in the course of the day, according to its situation and the character for benevolence of the owner. Mr. Hoare, however, says "that the crowd of beggars at some periods is so great, that it is found necessary to refuse a good many of those who appear at the latter end of the day. There are several farmers whose contributions in food to the necessitous would be quite equal to the maintenance of at least one additional workman.

The burthen of maintaining paupers falls most exclusively on the farmers in general; that of maintaining strange beggars, more particularly on small farmers. The gentry by no means contribute in the same proportion; and the Rev. Mr. Chute expressly states "that the entire onus of supporting the poor is borne by the occupiers of the land and the shopkeepers."

The country people in giving alms are entirely actuated by kindly feelings towards those who solicit them, and beggars find it unnecessary to resort to either threats or importunity. The Rev. Mr. Chute says "that a religious motive lies at the bottom of this benevolence, and that in consequence of it, the introduction of poor laws would, as regards farmers, be productive of no material relief; that class of persons would still think it a religious duty to bestow charity. This train of opinions has been mainly produced in them by the knowledge that, under the present system, the vagrant must starve if they did not come to his assistance. The sight of a full bag does not deter the farmer from giving; he looks to the blessing derived from a good action, and as he likes the beggar's benediction, so he fears his curse. "The ferry-woman," adds Mr. Chute, "at Valentia, who has orders not to convey any beggars into the island, is afraid to refuse them a passage, lest their curse should sink her boat."

The witnesses declared themselves unacquainted with any evils resulting from vagrancy, further than those which operated on the vagrant himself; they had no reason to suppose that disease had been disseminated by the practice of giving a night's lodging, or that the morals of the younger portions of the labouring classes had been injured by association with mendicants. They added, that it had never been attempted to repress the growing amount of vagrancy by the application of the laws which have been directed against it, and that there was no condition or charitable establishment in Cahir or its vicinity in which an asylum could be offered to the wandering pauper.

Munster, County Kerry.

Examinations taken by G. C. Lewis, Esq. D. G. Lubé, Esq.

Parish Dingle. Bar. Corkaguiney.

Persons who attended the Examination.

Rev. Mr. GOODMAN, curate of the parish of Dingle.—Mr. FITZGERALD, apothecary.—Mr. LAURENSON, chief constable of Corkaguiney.—Rev. Mr. SULLIVAN, roman-catholic curate, in a line of 14 miles in length along the southern coast.

THERE were not as many beggars in that district as in and about Tralee and its neighbourhood, for the people were more industrious and more willing to exert themselves, and the sea-coast also affords them more opportunities for employment; there are very few strange beggars either in that quarter, and the few there are come from the southern parts of Kerry.

The months of May and June are the periods of the year at which vagrancy is most common. The greater number of the labourers who depend on con-acre are forced to beg after Christmas, because their potatoes are in most cases exhausted before February, as in general their con-acre ground only furnishes four or five months' potatoes for them in the year. Wages are very precarious, and this class of persons have very little dependence on them. Mr. Lauriston observed that there were very few strange beggars in the town of Dingle; the town beggars are mostly cripples and infirm through age; there are two female idiots amongst them, but no able-bodied men whatsoever. Mr. Lauriston also said that the wives and children of employed labourers and cottier tenants do not beg; but the Rev. Mr. Sullivan stated that they often do, even when in employment, but more particularly when the husband is not getting any work; there were, he thought, about 200 or 300 in that district who beg in this manner, when necessity compels them to do so; this occurs generally in summer and in spring; and when the potatoes are scarce many labourers shut up their cabins entirely, and go forth in search of work. The Rev. Mr. Goodman thought that there were about 50 cottier tenants who go from that barony for that purpose; some of them were married and others single. As to the question of the division of property by the parents as they advance in life, Mr. Goodman observed, that the farmers were always anxious to get hold of a piece of ground, and the father who had originally six cows will at length be reduced to only one, they divide so among their children. "If it were not," said he, "for the sea manure, they would eat one another." Those who have but little land, and that not sufficient to produce potatoes the whole year round, go in search of work to the counties of Tipperary and Limerick; they do not, however, often go to England for that purpose; but Mr. Fitzgerald said that he had known six or eight persons who had gone from the parish of Dingle alone to London, and who had become bricklayers and labourers, and always send money home to their families, and usually return to that quarter every second year. In a hard summer some of this class of poor people come from the mountainous parts of the country, particularly from the distant parish of Glanerought. Fishermen also emigrate to Newfoundland from that quarter; they stay there a few years and then return to their families, the greater part of whom are obliged to beg in their absence.

Rev. Mr. Sullivan was of opinion that the facilities with which relief was generally obtained did not lead to improvidence to any great degree, for he thought they would not beg if they could help it, for under such circumstances they do not consider it a degradation; but the term of beggar in general is considered a degradation even amongst the lowest.

Mr. Sullivan thought that an able-bodied beggar would collect about four stone of potatoes in the course of the day; but Mr. Fitzgerald was of opinion that he could not get more than two; they obtain very little in the towns from the passengers of coaches and cars.

It was the general opinion that those who have families always get the largest share, and during the summer particularly, the farmers give an additional quantity in proportion to the number of persons applying; they always give a good handful to one, and if there are many children in the family, perhaps three handfuls occasionally; they give twice as much to the blind as to any other class of beggars.

It was observed that they sometimes sell their potatoes; but the Rev. Mr. Sullivan stated that he had never known instances of paupers selling their surplus collections in the manner mentioned. Mr. Goodman, however, knew it to be the case, and that some of them were prudent enough to save money by it, and to buy clothes for themselves.

Some of the mendicants, no doubt, were very ragged in their appearance; but it could not well be said that they were so for the purpose of exciting sympathy or compassion; they are not known to use any imposition for the purpose; and Mr. Goodman said, that he did not remember any case of the kind in 50, for that he should be very likely to detect it, as he was able to speak the Irish language so well. The Rev. Mr. O'Sullivan observed, that strange beggars, who exhibit themselves in the streets and at the chapel-gates, with sores, wens, distorted feet, &c. are called "boccoughs:" this term, which means lame, is limited to this particular class of beggars, and extends to them all. Kidnappers of young children were also called by this name; none of these, however, are natives; they make a great deal of money, are very clamorous, and attract much attention by their vociferation; they generally speak Irish, and use figurative language in declaiming to the common people, and they thus excite their feelings a good deal; they are in fact very clever fellows. The character of the ordinary class of vagrants in that neighbourhood is generally very good.

Mr. Goodman said that the farmers in general marry very young. With regard to the relative mortality of the different class of paupers, he also observed that there was not as great great a mortality among the children of the poor as would be expected from their circumstances; he said, that for 52 years he had never heard of a person dying of starvation in that part of the country.

As to the point, whether an able-bodied man could collect more by begging than he could obtain by working, it was observed that he would be able to collect about four stone of potatoes in the day, while a labourer would rarely earn so much in value; in general, however, the labourers are better off, they at least have houses to live in, and Mr. Fitzgerald thought that begging was decidedly not so good a trade as labouring, for the able-bodied men never beg.

With regard to the point, whether persons giving charity ascertain first whether the applicant has already obtained alms before on that day, Mr. Goodman observed, that in general the persons relieved are not known, but those who reside in the town are so to a great extent. Those who are reduced by distress apply in preference to strangers, as they are always ashamed to beg from those who know them.

Strange beggars carry their blankets about with them, and get straw from the farmers, and a night's lodging from the labourers; the farmers generally give potatoes; sometimes fresh fish, when they have it, and milk in summer, when it is plentiful; about a handful of potatoes is thus given at a time, and when the beggar's bag is full, he returns home with himself.

Persons of all classes give something; but the burthen of supporting the poor falls much heavier on the farmers than on the wealthier classes. Rev. Mr. Sullivan thought that the burthen fell almost exclusively on the shopkeepers and farmers about the town; he also stated, that about four years ago potatoes were purchased and sold out at a fair price, and the proceeds were afterwards returned to the subscribers, giving them a large dividend on their original subscriptions; those who merely possess cabins are seldom applied to in order to contribute anything.

Mr. Goodman and Mr. Sullivan both agreed that the farmers in general never give more than is agreeable to them; they scarcely ever complain of beggars either, except of the strangers who come in the scarce seasons; and this they thought a convincing proof that they give from a pure spirit of kindness.

It is a very general feeling among farmers not to allow a beggar even to go away from their doors without giving him something, and they do this from a religious motive entirely. The beggars have a habit of repeating prayers upon receiving alms, and this weighs considerably with the farmers, and is a distinct and very remarkable proof of the religious and simple characters of the agricultural population. They all agreed that alms were never given to able-bodied persons from any dread of personal violence, nor did they think that any person throughout the barony ever gave a farthing from fear of anything of the kind. As to the point, whether they were influenced much by the dread of the beggar's curse, Mr. Sullivan thought that they would be afraid of a curse, no doubt, if they got it, but that they would not still give from such motives.

There were no punishments ever inflicted for vagrancy in that quarter of the country, which they considered a tolerably good sign of its good behaviour.

There were no mendicity institutions, nor houses of industry for the relief of the poor, in Dingle or the neighbourhood.

DURING that part of the summer in which potatoes annually become scarce, there is a good deal of mendicancy in this district. There are even not a few persons belonging to the country who have not a fixed residence at any time, and who pass their lives as houseless vagrants. "There are not, however," observes Mr. Hickson, "as there were 22 or 23 years ago; the land was then sublet by middlemen, whose tenants regularly went out to beg; but the land is now so managed and divided among the poor, that mendicancy no longer exists to the same extent. The improvement of the condition of the poor is to be perceived not only in their houses, but more particularly in their clothing."

The greater number of vagrants are females, and generally advanced in years; but there are some widows with young children. A man is seldom to be seen begging, excepting occasionally an infirm or lame old person, a few distressed sailors or unemployed tradesmen; these latter are invariably strangers. For two or three years great numbers of able-bodied weavers used to come to Kenmare from Bandon and Dunmanway, and it was observed that those of them who had families were much more miserable in their appearance than vagrants of the other sex, whose families were equally numerous. Many cottier tenants, in consequence of their extreme poverty, are compelled periodically to resort to begging. Their practice is to leave this country either at the latter end of April or the beginning of May, the exact period depending, in some measure, on the dearness of potatoes; those who are too old to travel go no further than the parishes in the vicinity, but the majority quit the neighbourhood altogether, and are to be met with at Listowel and Tralee in this county, and even in the adjoining counties of Cork and Limerick: they continue absent about three or four months. In addition to those persons who leave Kenmare in search of charity, there are several labourers, men who in no instance hold directly from the proprietor of the soil, and who are often possessed of nothing beyond a cabin on the road side, for which they do not pay any rent, who are in the habit of seeking work both in spring and harvest in the counties of Tipperary and Waterford.

In summer a few women and children come begging from Bearhaven; but all other times, speaking generally, none are to be seen asking alms except the natives of the place, of whom some go round from house to house, and are relieved by the inhabitants.

The witnesses state, that in Kenmare and Templenoe necessity alone is the real cause of mendicancy in 99 cases out of 100. "People do not beg," says the Rev. Mr. Fitzmaurice, "until they are actually compelled; they put it off, as an evil day, until they can hold no longer."—"But," observes Mr. Hickson, "it sometimes is taken up as a kind of trade. It has occurred in Mossirt, that a man, having the grass of one or two cows, and potatoes also in his house, or else credit on which to obtain them, has gone off begging as early as Easter Sunday, leaving his cows in the care of a neighbour, from whom, after his return, he has exacted an account of produce in milk and butter."

The smallest "alms" given, even in a time of scarcity, is three or four large potatoes; and in ordinary times a beggar can collect in the course of the day quite as much as will feed himself and five or six children. Mendicants obtain but little from strangers or visitors, and not much at the gates of places of public worship. Those who station themselves at the chapel-gates are generally "boccoughs" or impostors, who use a formal kind of prayer, and thereby collect a crowd about them.

The amount given by an individual in charity is dependant on the number in the family of the vagrant. A beggar-woman who has many children will get more than if she had but one; and families have been often known to divide themselves into several parties, and to have applied with success, and in succession, at the same houses for relief.

When beggars have collected more potatoes than they require as food, they in general carry the surplus to some village or small town, where they dispose of it for money, which they either bring home or lay out in the purchase of clothes.

The Rev. Mr. Fitzmaurice states, that on the whole there is but little imposture amongst any class of vagrants, excepting the "boccoughs,*" who are more than suspected of occasionally irritating sores, which they make a trade of exposing, in order to render them more disgusting, and to draw more attention and compassion to those who are so severely afflicted. "There are also," he adds, "a few individuals who penetrate into the remote glens among the mountains, and giving themselves out as coming from the north of Ireland, practise as quack doctors and fortune tellers, and pretend that they can give an increase to the milk and butter of the cows. They find the people in the mountains, who are simple and ignorant, much more easily imposed on than the inhabitants of valleys." Suspicion is also attached to those who come from a distance, and who endeavour to pass themselves off as cast-away sailors or reduced tradesmen, excusing themselves for having left their own parishes, by saying that they were ashamed to beg at home. Persons of the latter descriptions have, however, presented themselves rather less frequent of late.

The character of beggars is in general moral, but two or three cases are mentioned where the houses of farmers have been robbed by the vagrants to whom they have benevolently granted a night's lodging. Still these things are of such rare occurrence, that they have not had the least effect in deterring persons from freely admitting strange mendicants into their houses. The only class of mendicants to whom a character for drunkenness or debauchery attaches, are the boccoughs, and pretended sailors and tradesmen above-mentioned.

In making a comparison between the condition of an able-bodied labourer and that of a sturdy beggar, the gentlemen examined stated, that the average earnings of a working man would enable him to purchase more food for himself and family than any vagrant could obtain by begging, and that, in addition to the certainty of recompence for the exertions of the former, gave him a material advantage over the latter. At the same time it was admitted on all hands that a beggar need never be hungry.

No attempt is ever made on the part of those who give relief, to guard themselves against imposition. The farmers are for the most part acquainted with the paupers who belong to their own neighbourhood, but of strangers they never ask any questions, further than as to the part of the country they come from.

The beggar, standing at the door, opens his bag, and he that is disposed to give him anything puts a few potatoes in it. If the donor be in good circumstances he adds a little milk, which the beggar either gives to his children and consumes on the spot, or, as often happens, pours into a can, which he carries for the purpose. When potatoes are very plentiful, the mendicant sometimes asks for money to buy tobacco. At night he seeks his lodging in the house of some of the poorer class of peasants, rather in the cabin of the man who can only afford to give an "alms" of potatoes, than in the more comfortable habitation of one whose means allow him to add some milk to his donation.

Farmers and shopkeepers, and residents, and occupiers of land in general, bear the entire entire burthen of the relief of pauperism. But as to the proportion in which the weight falls on the two classes of rich and poor respectively, the opinions of the witnesses by no means coincide. "The rich do not give near as much as the middling class," says the Rev. Mr. Fitzmaurice; "it is only on extraordinary occasions that the rich come forward." Mr. Hickson, however, observes, "The farmers are more numerous, but the gentry give much."

The quantities of food which farmers feel themselves called upon to give away to vagrants, form a great drain upon their subsistence. The Rev. Mr. Fitzmaurice remarks, "Some farmers are so charitable that they would have made money were it not for what they have bestowed in charity. They are always inconvenienced, and complain of the burthen, but more especially in scarce seasons, when they might easily have turned their potatoes into money. Some persons are even obliged to stint themselves during the begging season, which lasts for four months, and at that time they give away the food for two men every day, and sometimes the food of five or six." Mr. Hickson says, "If a labourer is sitting down to his meal he will share it with the beggar; as far as he safely can, he never shuts the door at meal-time."

Farmers, as a body, are averse to the imposition of a money-tax as a substitute for their present mode of contributing to the support of the poor. It is stated that they would make much less objection to giving a barrel of potatoes than to giving its value in money. Shopkeepers, on the contrary, would much prefer the payment of an annual and fixed sum, to the remaining open to the annoyance and interruption of mendicants, and to the risk to which their property is exposed by the existence of such a class.

The practice of giving alms is founded in the charitable disposition of the people, and in the custom which has been handed down from their forefathers. "They give," as Mr. Hickson expressed it, "from downright Christian charity; there is no kind of fear in it; even in times of scarcity it is the custom to relieve, and they would be ashamed to send a beggar away empty." The desire of the beggar's blessing more frequently operates as an inducement to give than the fear of his curse. There are, however, not a few persons who entertain much dread of the imprecation which a surly mendicant is apt to leave on the house where he has met with a refusal. The effects of this imprecation are called "overlooking, or casting an evil eye on any one." If a beggar neglect to say "God bless you," to the person to whom he has applied for alms, or "God bless it," when he meets a child, the person or child is said to be "overlooked."

The laws against vagrancy have never been enforced in Kenmare, nor is there any work-house or mendicity institution to which paupers could be sent.

THERE is an annual addition of at least 20 families to the amount of mendicants in Killarney.

A large proportion of these have been reduced to poverty by the extensive clearing of estates which has taken place in many parts of the country. Many persons also date their destitution from the cessation of the works at the copper-mines, which used to afford permanent employment. But there is a still larger class of paupers who come from the neighbourhood of Kenmare, and from the southern part of the county of Cork. These persons go by the name of the "Marquis's tenants," (viz. of the Marquis of Lansdowne) and represent themselves as such; in truth, however, they do not hold under the Marquis of Lansdowne, but under some of his immediate tenants. "There are also," observes the Rev. Mr. Herbert (who has until lately resided upon a living which he held in Worcestershire), "many persons who bring petitions who are better clad, and are somewhat superior to the common beggar; they are of the same class as those who are usually impostors in England, that is, something between the labourer and the mechanic. They are not residents in this district, and from their dialect, they seem to be chiefly English. There are fewer trampers in this country than in England, but far more beggars."

The majority of mendicants are of the female sex; in the town, widows with young children, a few mothers of illegitimate children, and some women no longer able to earn their bread. Men are rarely to be seen, either among the resident beggars of the town, or the ordinary vagrants of the country, but there are from six to 10 cripples who are entirely dependant on charity. The number of vagrants is materially increased by the high rents under which cottier tenants in most cases labour. It is stated that the vagrants from the south of the country beg from sheer necessity, and that they invariably return to their cabins when their potatoes are ripe and fit for use. In the meantime the father of the family either stays at home, if he be fortunate enough to have constant occupation, or goes to the county Cork, or still farther to the eastward, in search of employment. In some instances the wife follows the husband, and hovers about the district where he is engaged *."

The Rev. Mr. Herbert says, "that as many as 100 able-bodied persons, calling themselves tradesmen, pass through Killarney, begging, in the course of the year. They had formerly been weavers in Cork or Bandon, but he is satisfied that they have now taken up mendicancy as a trade. They almost always beg singly, and if they have wives and children, they go in different directions; many of them seem in the most pressing distress. Besides all these, there are not a few persons who apply secretly for charity, and are not to be considered as street-beggars; they are the wives of decent unemployed tradesmen and labourers, of men labouring under sickness, or sometimes the families of drunkards, who dissipate their earnings in debauchery.

The district which produces the largest number of vagrants is an extremely poor tract of country, and for the most part consisting of mountain. Vagrants, however, sometimes, from a feeling of shame, which ultimately disappears, represent themselves as coming from a part of the country to which, in reality, they do not belong.

It is stated that if an able-bodied woman with children does not confine her wanderings to the immediate vicinity of the town, where potatoes bear a high price, but goes to a distance of four or five miles in the country, she will collect easily four or five stone of potatoes in the day; when her bag is nearly full she leaves it in the house of a person she can confide in, and calls for it on her return. Many beggars are in the habit of collecting about coaches and travellers, and being extremely persevering in their demands, and very close in their attendance there, there can be little doubt that many of them make money. A cripple, who has lost both his legs, and who travels about upon a donkey, had placed 18 l. in a banking-house in Cork. This sum he lost at the time of the general failure of those establishments in the south of Ireland. There was another beggar some years ago in Tralee, who earned money by setting and strapping razors, whilst he subsisted on the food which he obtained in charity. This man, though of the most depraved character, saved nearly 400 l. which was divided amongst his relations after his death. However, cases of this kind are not common, and, as one of the witnesses expressed himself, "begging is but a bad trade." A stout man, and a man of ingenuity may succeed; and he that has the appearance of penury, and is not importunate, will get most. Yet we are sometimes blamed for giving charity to persons that drink tea; and I know that professed beggars get credit from labourers for living much better than they do themselves.

Of all beggars, the most sturdy are those who appear only in summer, they take no refusal, and obtain much more than the residents.

When a person with a family applies for relief, he gets more than a single person. There is a certain minimum of "alms," which is increased by the inhabitants according to circumstances. Different members of the same family frequently apply with success to the same individual for relief, and it often happens that the parents send their children to beg alone, and instruct them to pass themselves off as orphans.

When a vagrant has collected more food than his own wants, or those of his family require, he seeks a purchaser to whom he may dispose of the surplus for money. It is observed, that the common strolling beggar is inclined to husband carefully the profits of his collections, and that he does not often waste them in tippling; but that the town mendicants soon lay out whatever they obtain in the purchase of tea, turf, and clothes, &c.

Vagrants by no means trust to their probable destitution alone, as sufficient to excite sympathy for their condition. They divide their families into various parties; they exaggerate their sufferings, and resort to many contrivances to work on the feelings of those to whom they apply. There exists, however, a general incredulity as to their statements, and those who endeavour to draw attention by simulating epileptic fits or the falling sickness, only expose themselves to laughter, and are often driven out of the town. Mr. Murphy remarks, that "the character of constant beggars is decidedly inferior to that of labourers."

A distinction is drawn by the witnesses between the habits and behaviour of those mendicants who beg only occasionally, and have at other times a fixed residence, and of those who may be called professed strolling beggars. The former have not often been detected in offences; but amongst the latter are to be found the cripples who go about from fair to fair and are almost the only drunkards in the entire class. The wandering able-bodied men who call themselves tradesmen are generally looked upon as mere impostors. It does not often occur at present that any of them lay by more than is sufficient to clothe them; but Mr. Murphy mentions one or two instances where they have given fortunes of 2 l. or 3 l. to their daughter on getting married. Most of the beggars residing in the town have families, but it is said that those who think that they have not the requisite number of children for producing an effect, make no scruple of borrowing them from those that have them.

It is the opinion of the persons examined, that an average labourer is better off than an average beggar; though the food of the latter may be better than that of the former, his lodging and his clothing are miserably wretched, and worse than of any labourer however badly off, still a labourer sometimes passes a day without a meal, but a beggar never; and in the summer season, when the mendicants are well supplied with milk, the poor workmen are are perhaps unable to taste it. As for the beggars who surround coaches, and who are at all times to be met with in the streets, they get a great deal more than any able-bodied labourer could earn."

The strangers who visit the parish in great numbers are of course unknown to both farmers and shopkeepers; no one is acquainted with their character, and no further attempt is ever made to ascertain their real circumstances, than a passing inquiry as to who they are, and whence they came. Nevertheless, it rarely occurs that any of them are refused relief, but at the same time they never obtain it to the same extent as those whose distress and poverty are notorious, and who reside in the town or in other parts of the parish.

In the country a night's lodging is almost always given freely to any vagrant who applies for it, and it has often occurred that a sick stranger has been taken into the house of a poor man, and has been entertained by him until he has died. In the town, the resident mendicants pay a weekly sum for their lodgings. The relief given to paupers by farmers and country people, usually consists of potatoes and milk. Shopkeepers, on the contrary, and those who live in the town, with few exceptions, give money. "If a beggar," says the Rev. Mr. Fitzmaurice, "comes to the door of a poor man while he is at his dinner, he will get a share of the food prepared for the family."—"There are some shopkeepers," adds Mr. Murphy, "who would prefer giving food, but they are often compelled to give a halfpenny, in order to get rid of an annoyance."

The relief of the poor falls chiefly on the occupiers of land and on shopkeepers; on some of the former to such a degree, that it is supposed that there are not a few "comfortable farmers" who give away in indiscriminate charity as much as would suffice for the maintenance of two able-bodied men. Shopkeepers are more in the habit of selecting particular individuals as the objects of their charity, and Mr. Murphy states, "that they feel alms as a heavier burthen than any other class; they feel the wants of the destitute more than the great landed proprietors, and they are always in the way to be applied to. Even the poor labourer, who possesses nothing beyond his cabin and his small potato-garden, does not seek to avoid bearing his portion of the load;" and according to the Rev. Messrs. Fitzmaurice and Dunne, "there are frequent instances where persons who have to buy potatoes for themselves, give away some of them to the poor. In the country, under ordinary circumstances, they do not complain of the amount which they are called upon to bestow, but in times of scarcity they not only complain of it, but feel it heavily. The absence of complaints at other times arises from a sentiment, that alms given to the poor do not lessen their hoard, and that in giving them they are performing an action meritorious before God, and which will bring a blessing on themselves." The Rev. Mr. Dunne says, "that shopkeepers are so fully aware of the disadvantages arising to them from the present promiscuous mode of contributing to the assistance of paupers, that they would much prefer to give annually a fixed sum in order to be freed from them."—"I would rather give," says Mr. Murphy, "even more than what I now give, if I was confident that the poor would be relieved, but I should dislike to be compelled."

Humanity and the satisfaction and consciousness of doing a good act, are the chief impulses to the giving of alms. There exists also among the peasantry a feeling of honour on the subject, an idea that a person would be disgraced by letting a stranger go away unrelieved from his door. With shopkeepers importunity is often successful on the part of those who solicit charity, and who get it in order that they may be induced to go away. "They come when persons are in our shops, and the greater the crowd of customers, the more likely they are to be relieved."—(Mr. Murphy.)——Many persons entertain apprehensions of temporal punishment being called down upon them by the curse of a dissatisfied beggar; but it is not often that the threat of a malediction is resorted to even by the badly-disposed vagrant. It is a practice with beggars, always on receiving alms, to pray shortly for the giver, who is much pleased with this, and expects good from it, both in this world and the next.

It has not been perceived that vagrants have exercised any immoral influence on the labourers with whom they have come in contact.

Punishments have never been inflicted for vagrancy, nor is there any institution in Killarney for the relief of the poor or the suppression of mendicancy.

CAPTAIN BRADY said that the population of Kerry was very different in respect to obedience to the laws, when compared with the county Limerick, but that the poverty was nearly the same. There is a great deal of begging in the town and the neighbourhood, chiefly among the natives; but the able-bodied men rarely beg. "My district," said he, "is 32 miles in extent, and includes Waghticonnor, Clanmaurice, and a part of Waghanacmy; I have travelled much through the whole of it, and have rarely seen an able-bodied male beggar."

"They are chiefly," continued he, "healthy strong women with three or four children, and decrepit old men. The old women generally frequent the towns and villages; the able-bodied women are the wives of labourers who are employed at a very low rate of wages, some in this part of the country, some farther east, and some also who have gone to England to look for work. Many strange beggars come passing through on their way to Cork, Killarney or Tralee; these are chiefly, according to their own account, tradesmen who cannot get employment in Dublin. I always suspect their statement, however, though it may be true; they are not much encouraged, their number is not great; perhaps I see 50 in a year."

The Rev. Mr. Mahony and Captain Hewson:—The people are going from bad to worse; their wretchedness is increasing every day very considerably. The landlords have been clearing farms, and the ejected tenants crowd into the villages. In this town a house 25 feet long contained five families. There is not a great deal of begging among able-bodied natives; it is chiefly from the neighbouring parishes. The land is good there, and the potatoes therefore more plentiful. In summer the mendicants will come 40 or 60 miles to that quarter of the country; but this class of persons merely beg in scarce seasons, they return again to their houses when their potato gardens are advanced. This evil has arisen from the division of lands; but the remedy has been terrible.

There are two distinct classes of beggars; first, professional beggars, and secondly, women with children, whose husbands go eastward after having shut up their cabins, and sent their families to beg while they are away; these generally have large families. Many of the professional beggars are able-bodied men; they confine themselves however to a district, and seldom have large families. They are generally known to the farmers, and are not impostors. Very few of these are beggars who go through the kingdom; some go from fair to fair; they are great objects, eat up with evil and sores. Many of these are impostors, and pretend to be subject to epilepsy, in order to excite pity.

As to how the labourers who go to England in search of work get there, it was observed that they make their way as well as they can; they take a little money with them, and get some charity on the road; but it was generally understood that they bring back enough to pay their rents. Sometimes when there is any public work to be performed, labourers come to it from a distance; they shut up their cabins first, and then their families go about to beg. Many of this class go to the counties of Tipperary and Limerick, and but few to England; a good many of them who thus shut up their cabins, might live at home if they liked it. This year many beggars came from the county Limerick to that place, because potatoes were so plentiful there, for the strangers generally go to the remote districts to beg, from a feeling of shame and delicacy.

A few in every town have been reared in mendicancy, and their habits are generally bad; but the proportion of vagrants who are the children of vagrants, could not be well ascertained.

As to the supposed quantity of provisions which an able-bodied beggar would be likely to collect one day with another, it was observed that they generally get from half a stone of potatoes to two stone a day. A beggar, in fact, would be able to collect as much as he could carry; they go out in different directions, and sometimes exchange their children; they have thus been known to collect three or four stone in a day. There are many town beggars who congregate round the coaches and cars; they are chiefly aged and decrepit poor men and women; they do not get much from the passengers; sometimes they are assisted by their relatives.

With regard to the fact, whether in case of a large family applying, the quantity would by increased much by the number of applicants; it was remarked, that farmers give a fixed quantity, whatever may be the number of applicants, and that they do not increase it unless there is something striking.

Captain Brady stated, the party who had most children, and was most sturdy, and who could cover most ground, was in general most likely to excite commiseration, and to get the largest bag of potatoes in the course of the day. The little ones do not delay the mother; they trot on "like a shot."

It was stated that the beggars bring the surplus potatoes, which they get for charity, into the small towns and sell them there, and that the poor persons in these small towns were in part supplied with potatoes by this means. They get something more than the farmers.

The potatoes they thus sell are not mixed; the cup potato is the common sort; the white potato is much used, and its use is much increasing: some of the beggars buy whiskey with what they thus procure, and others of them purchase clothes.

Deception is only practised by the beggars to procure relief, so far as falsehood is concerned; tricks are only practised by one fair beggar, who is half an idiot; and with regard to their unwillingness to be decently dressed, for fear of not creating pity, they have neither the means nor the inclination to improve their condition and appearance; if they had any money they would drink it; beggars are rarely seen drunk in that part of the country, and there is less drinking among them than among higher classes.

Vagrancy has a bad effect on the character, particularly so far as the children. The child is instructed by the parent to pilfer, and thus is brought up in habits of crime; there is a good deal of pilfering among the beggars in a small way; but Captain Brady had not heard of many depredations committed by them.

Mr. Mahony thought that the character of beggars in general is not bad, and that they seldom steal. The vagrants get lodgings from the poorer classes, and they require no payment from them; and there was no case known of a robbery by a beggar of any house where he had been lodged for the night; lately, however, there was a case of a beggar-woman being robbed of caps and children's clothes, to the value of 8*s.* or 10*s.*, according to to her own account, in a house where she had got lodgings; she did not in the end bring the charge home to the lodging-house keeper, though the story may probably have been true.

Upon the point of the extent to which mendicants have been known to lay up their savings, it was observed, that at the time of the changes in the currency many beggars produced their hoards, and some had 20*s*., some 33*s*., some more, some less.

Poor housekeepers are often in greater want than the beggars; the beggar never wants a meal; the labourer is often in a state of great privation.

The farmers here never consider whether the applicants are objects of charity or not, they give indiscriminately to all who apply; they know nothing in general of the characters of the persons whom they relieve, except of those in their immediate neighbourhood. Many strange beggars have located themselves in that part of the country lately, from the south and south-west. There is no check against imposition, except that the applicant generally brings his bag to the farmer's door, and shows what he has got in it.

It was stated that the strolling beggars will sometimes enter a house without asking leave, and going to the dresser, will take the pot and proceed to dress their potatoes without saying a word, and regularly establish themselves as if they were in their own houses. As to the form in which relief is given, the farmers give a few potatoes and some milk in summer, and the shopkeepers give food and halfpence.

As to the quantity of food usually given out of a house in a day, it was stated that a farmer and miller in that town frequently gave food to 20 or even 30 persons in one day; they give indiscriminately, and scarcely ever refuse; they would relieve an able-bodied man also, but if such a person applied, he would always beg with his family; but in general, on those occasions, the husband keeps at a distance from the rest. The extent to which relief is given depends in a great measure on the generosity of the person who distributes it. It was observed that one beggar will stand watching to see what another will get, and that they are very crafty in their mode of proceeding in this respect.

It was the opinion of those present that a farmer would relieve 15 or 20 beggars in the course of a day; would give away the food of three able-bodied men at least. It is on the farmers that the burthen chiefly falls, but they do not complain of it; it is on account of the habit which has been handed down from their forefathers, and if it were not for them, the real beggars would die of starvation, for the labourers have it not to give; they are miserably poor; they give a night's lodging to the mendicants in consideration of the offal which they leave from their potatoes, with which they feed their pigs. It was further remarked, that the relief of the wandering poor falls almost exclusively on the lower class of farmers, much more heavily on them than on the higher, as they all give about the same quantity, and therefore the burthen presses heaviest on those who have the least to give.

The gentry in that neighbourhood do not contribute much; they subscribe to the public charities however, and occasionally establish soup kitchens, &c., for distributing provisions.

The farmers would prefer the present system to a poor rate; in general, they do not complain much of it; they think, however, that the absentee landlords are the cause of all their misery.

The farmers generally give, as some thought, from a fear of the beggar leaving his curse behind him; and it was observed, that the beggars are very clever at extorting alms; they first try by a strong appeal, and when that is unsuccessful, they then have recourse to execrations. They apply in English to the better orders for alms; but it is Irish they use to the lower orders, and they always curse in Irish. It was stated that beggars are sometimes very impudent, and are sometimes not satisfied even with receiving food at a gentleman's house. They usually have a certain form of prayer, and of curse also, when they leave a house, according to their reception.

The Rev. Mr. Mahony observed, that he would himself be afraid of the beggar's curse, if he refused a person in distress, for every poor man represents the Almighty; there is not, however, much fear of a refusal in general, not even in a year of scarcity. In 1822 provisions were so scarce that they were often stopped, and plundered by the people.

As to the different punishments which were ever inflicted for vagrancy, it was stated that there were none in that quarter generally speaking, and the only case known was, where a troublesome prostitute had been committed during the last year. It was stated that the vagrants in general prefer begging to following an industrious line of life, for they will not work; they all dislike it at first, however, but when once forced to have recourse to it, they afterwards lose all reluctance.

There are no houses of industry or mendicity institutions whatsoever in the neighbourhood.

THE Rev. Mr. M'Ennery stated that there was a great number of beggars in the town of Tralee and the neighbourhood; many of those who came there in summer were strangers from the barren parts of the county of Kerry. The men go in search of work, while the women and children go begging. Those also who come there for the public works leave it paupers. Strangers also go there for work, and when it has ceased, some remain in a state of destitution, and others are forced to go begging about. There are also many town beggars, chiefly chiefly widows and orphans, many of whom were left by the cholera; nearly all of them, however, are Kerry people. The number of professional beggars is decreasing. Mr. Brownrigg, the inspector of police, observed, that labourers in summer emigrate for work, and leave their families at home to beg through the country; few of the families of these persons leave the county, and in very few cases are they enabled to subsist without having recourse to begging; they are often obliged, from this system, to leave the crops on the ground without being able to reap them, until they are considerably injured. He also stated that it was sometimes very difficult to get workmen in harvest-time to cut down the crops, and that he himself had to wait four or five days last season before he could procure a single man to cut a few acres of clover. The Rev. Mr. O'Sullivan observed on this subject, that there were many beggars in the parish of Ardfert, both native and strange. Some of the latter come from the mountainous districts of Kerry, and others from the neighbouring counties of Limerick, Tipperary and Cork; the strangers are most numerous, however, and generally come in spring, and their numbers are in proportion to the dearness of the potatoes; for when the potatoes are plenty, there are seldom many strange beggars; they get lodgings for a night in the different cabins in return for "a wad of straw," and there are seldom any able-bodied male beggars seen among them. The people in that part of the country would not look at a man who would not work; and as to the class called "sturdy beggars," there was no such thing known there. Mr. M'Ennery observed, that begging was considered most disgraceful, and he has heard those who have had recourse to it often say, when they come to a strange place, that they were ashamed to beg at home, where they had seen better days, and where they have had respectable relations. He also stated, that he only knew two persons in that parish who were able to work, and unwilling to do so; one of them had been in the habit of carrying a crippled mother about on his back at Killarney, and had thus contracted vagrant habits; he is over 40 years of age and unmarried; his character, however, is good, and he lives worse than any labourer, and never has shoes or stockings to his feet.

As to the supposed quantity of meal, potatoes or other provisions which an able-bodied beggar would be likely to obtain, one day with another, it was observed that it entirely depended on the number and circumstances of the family; the givers in generally proportion their charity to the wants of the applicants. It was thought, however, that a family might be well able to collect five stone of potatoes in the course of a day, if they were plentiful; and it was agreed that the farmers in general increase the quantity they give in proportion to the number of the family which apply.

The custom prevails there, as well as in other places, of the beggars selling what potatoes they do not want, and buying clothes with the money they get, or paying for their lodgings. A single old man will sometimes sell the surplus thus, and get 2*d.* or 3*d.* for it, and he will then be able to buy clothes, or shoes, or tobacco with what he procures. There is no imposture or any kind of deception practised by the beggars in that part of the country; they are generally deserving objects of commiseration; and the only manœuvre they have recourse to, is to have the family separate in very scarce seasons, and go different ways to beg, but this custom is even very rare. The habits of the beggars are considered as good as those of the poor class of labourers; they are in general mild in their demeanour, and honest, inoffensive poor creatures, and most harmless and humble in their manner.

It was the general opinion that there were not more illegitimate children among the beggars than among the lower classes. The mortality was decidedly less among them than amongst the labourers, for the poor people who are exposed to the weather when working, are very apt to catch cold, and thus get consumptions; in this respect, the condition of the mendicant is much superior to that of the labourer.

With regard to the extent of the knowledge of the characters of the persons relieved, it was observed, that the beggars of the parish and of the neighbourhood were generally known, but that the strangers were not. The farmers, however, make no distinction between natives and strangers, though they may be sometimes induced to give according to the characters of those whom they know, and the numbers of the family. If the parties were upon equal terms, they would be decidedly more inclined to give to those whom they knew to be objects, than to those whom they knew nothing at all about.

With regard to the manner in which relief is usually bestowed, it was observed that a night's lodging is generally given, which is charged for in the towns, but never in the country; cases have happened, however, where a vagrant who has been thus accommodated, had robbed the house; but not so many of them as to cause a disinclination in the parties to admit strangers under similar circumstances. Relief is generally given in potatoes, and sometimes in milk, either thick milk or buttermilk, according as they may have it.

It was observed that the beggars were not the least burthen to the farmers, but that they were very troublesome in towns and cities to the higher orders; but there is no great inconvenience felt from them in the country places. As to the fact whether the labouring people possessed of an acre or half an acre of ground give charity, it was observed that a labourer's wife with half an acre of ground would give as soon as any other; the beggar, however, was scarcely ever refused at a farmer's house, but he often was at the labourer's from necessity.

As to the motive which generally influences persons in bestowing charity, it was observed that relief was mostly given from a religious feeling, combined with which, was a wish to have the parties' blessing, and a dread of receiving their curse. In general, however, people give from a conviction that those applying are in want, and they would not pay much attention to the curse or malediction of an undeserving object. They give, in fact, from pure charity, from the ordinary feeling of pity for a fellow-creature in distress. There were no almshouses in the parish, nor any punishments for vagrancy.

Rev. MICHAEL FITZGERALD, parish priest of the Union of Askeaton and Ballytun.

PROBABLY from 100 to 150 families, who live principally by begging, slept last night at Askeaton; from 80 to 90 of these families belong to the town, and from 50 to 60 are strangers; many of these consist of old couples, without children. It is supposed that vagrancy increases in proportion to the increase of population.

The families frequently divide themselves, in order that they may succeed better; and the farmers sometimes complain of being visited by two members of the same family in one day. It has not been known that persons who during the week have been earning a means of subsistence through their labour, are found begging on Sunday; and not more than 20 or 30 instances have occurred at Askeaton, where the wife or children of labourers begged, but never where they had land. It frequently happens that persons describing themselves as mechanics seeking employment, are found begging: formerly in Askeaton parish, the beggars went to a distance, where they were not known, for the purpose of begging; but at present they feel less shame, and have discontinued this practice.

The strange beggars in Askeaton come from Kerry, and the mountainous districts of the county of Limerick, where they shut up their cabins, and remain here during the summer.

Begging is not a gainful trade, and is never resorted to but from necessity; they submit to great privations before they have recourse to it. Some beggars become loud and clamorous, placing themselves in fairs and at the entrances of chapels, by which means they make money, but these instances are of rare occurrence, and scarcely any able-bodied males are known to beg.

A beggar will obtain about two stone of potatoes in the day, but they get very little from coach passengers, &c. in Askeaton.

In case a family of beggars apply for relief, consisting of father, mother and three or four children, there is a certain quantity (a handful) of potatoes given to each applicant, with very little distinction.

When beggars without families have a surplus of potatoes they sell them, and perhaps buy clothes, snuff or tobacco, but rarely whiskey, and occasionally they are able to save enough to bury them.

The beggars do not resort to rags, dirt, or the appearance of being cripples, or afflicted with disease to excite sympathy, their success not depending on such practices, and there is scarcely any imposture known among the resident beggars.

Beggars are more immoral than labourers, which is owing to the manner they are huddled together; and they are more given to pilfering; still their passion for pilfering is less than might be expected; when under the pressure of misery, beggars are harsh to their children. They never go to England or Scotland in search of work, as their families are too large.

Illegitimate children are not more numerous among vagrants than the labouring classes.

A beggar can collect more than an able-bodied labourer could earn in the course of a day.

In bestowing relief, there is very little discrimination made by the farmers as to the character of those whom they relieve.

They present themselves with their bag at the farmer's doors, and show what they have collected, when something is given as a matter of course; frequently a night's lodging, but there is a prejudice against strange beggars, for it has sometimes happened that they went away in the night, having plundered the house.

In this neighbourhood they generally come into the town, and give some small consideration, as a turf, some straw, or a few potatoes for a bed. There is a practice observed in this part of the country, which is, that an entire suit of the clothes of every deceased person is given to a beggar.

The relief given to vagrants chiefly consists of potatoes; no meal, and rarely milk, but they would all prefer money if they could get it, for in the first place, it is more easily carried than a bag of potatoes, and next, if they only get a halfpenny it would be more valuable than a handful of potatoes; and they might visit 30 houses to collect a stone of potatoes of the value of 3*d.*

It rarely occurs that a beggar is refused relief. Almost every gentleman supports one or two families (mostly old servants), but this is the only relief they give.

The farmers and shopkeepers, on an average, give away in alms what would support an additional workman.

Beggars almost entirely depend on farmers and shopkeepers for support, and the gentry who live in towns; indeed in general they do not approach the houses of the gentry. The rich do not contribute in proportion to the farmers, who are burthened and inconvenienced, while the gentlemen are not so; there are, however, exceptions. The labouring people not possessing more than half an acre of ground, and every person who has a house, share their pittance with the beggar; almsgiving may be considered as a sort of house-tax.

It frequently happens that beggars receive more than they require, in which case they usually dispose of the surplus, and it is not considered this leads to a waste of provisions.

Farmers and shopkeepers would prefer the present system of bestowing relief, to giving a regular sum annually, as they dislike a money-tax, and there is a certain degree of self-approbation attached to the present mode of almsgiving.

The farmers give relief to the beggars, partly because it is the custom, and partly from a religious feeling; relief is never extorted by mere importunity. In the year 1827, when famine prevailed, the farmers in Shanagolden very much dreaded violence from the beggars; they came in hordes, and raised up a howling round the farmers' houses; the farmers accordingly got got up a subscription; but here they are too poor, and being more numerous are less lonely. The fear of incurring the beggar's curse does not operate here, and they are rarely found abusive.

The vagrants do not spread discontent by fabricating stories, or by tale-bearing, nor are they the means of causing bad feeling; on the contrary, the charity shown to them, tends to soften and humanize. There are a few poor scholars in this county.

In this district there is not any punishment for vagrancy; neither is there any house of industry, mendicity or other institution in the neighbourhood.

REV. MR. WALLER: In proportion to the population there are not many mendicants.

There is occasionally an influx of beggars when the old crop is exhausted, who come from the county Kerry, and whose families beg, which is otherwise unknown. The native beggars are confined to about a dozen blind and infirm old persons, both males and females. There are no strolling beggars; with the exception of the Kerrymen, they are all stationary. There is a general objection to strange beggars. The wives of labourers have not been known to beg.

Mr. Morris:—There are only two resident beggars in Kilcornan parish, but a good many strange come from Kerry in July, in whole families. They divide themselves, in order to get the more; the father usually keeping out of the way. The two resident beggars are widows with daughters, who shift for themselves. The landlords do much for the beggars, and the loan fund also assists.

Rev. Mr. Waller:—Persons calling themselves mechanics rarely apply; whenever this occurs, they are probably impostors.

Mr. Morris:—A good many mechanics call; some are impostors, others are really looking for work. Some individuals go to England during the harvest; in their absence their wives are employed binding, &c.

The quantity of meal and potatoes which an able-bodied beggar would be able to obtain, one day with another, depends on circumstances. Those well able to travel get from two to four stone; they generally get two stone, except when potatoes are very scarce.

When a family of beggars apply, alms are given in proportion to the number. It frequently happens that different members of the same family apply with success to the same persons. An able-bodied man would get less than a person infirm through age or accident.

When beggars obtain more food than they require for their own consumption, they sell the surplus to poor housekeepers, who give them the same price the farmer would get, and with the price perhaps buy a pair of shoes or a petticoat. They generally have a garb outside tattered and torn, but better clothes within, as they are unwilling to appear decently clad, from fear of not creating pity.

There is a woman here begging with a cancer on her face, who is a most disgusting object.

Mr. Waller knows a blind beggar who takes his stand on the high road, who obtained a pair of blankets from the loan fund, the price of which was 12 s. or 14 s., and for which he paid by instalments, at 6 d. a week.

Mr. Morris has heard that strolling beggars have been known to give 20 l. or 30 l. to their daughters; this occurred here seven or eight years ago, in the case of an old woman who died, and in whose clothes there was, besides, 10 l. found tied up.

Mr. Waller:—An able-bodied man can sometimes obtain more by begging than he could by work, and sometimes less; but greater cases of wretchedness are oftener found amongst poor labourers than beggars. Among the labourers there exists a strong feeling of independence, and they will submit to great privation before they beg.

Mr. Morris:—The farmers know nothing of the strangers, but they always know the resident beggars.

Mr. Waller:—The gentry generally give relief in money, and milk is also given to labourers' families. Mr. Morris:—A night's lodging is given by the lower order of people, for which the beggars often share the potatoes they collect; others do not require it. The relief given chiefly consists in potatoes, and often milk; when potatoes are cheap, they look for milk. Mr. Morris gives away the food of at least two persons a day, all the year round.

Mr. Waller:—The relief of the poor in this parish falls heaviest on the gentry.

Mr. Morris:—The relief of the poor falls heaviest on the farmers. The poorer and working classes do not give in proportion to the rich, but the reverse, with a few exceptions; but all housekeepers who have the means will relieve the beggar.

Mr. Waller:—The farmers give from a religious motive, also from a fear of the beggar's curse. A strange sturdy beggar will curse, but those known in the neighbourhood will not. They are importunate, but not abusive. Mr. Morris:—The farmers give relief from a superstitious motive of being rewarded hereafter; fear does not operate on the donor, even in scarcity. Sometimes they are abusive, especially if there are women in the house, but not often. The common people would be afraid of a curse. The beggars usually curse in Irish.

Mr. Waller:—There is no punishment inflicted in this district for vagrancy.

There is no house of industry or mendicity institution in this neighbourhood.

THERE are very few native beggars in that quarter, though there are many others, strangers. The beggars belonging to the town are absolutely in a state of want; they are all beyond their labour. The poor have increased in the town since the disfranchisement of the 40*s*. freeholders; it had, however, little effect there. Dr. Pearce observed, that vagrancy always increased from the month of May until the beginning of winter, but particularly during the summer. There is a great deal of begging from Kerry, in Newcastle and about it, and it has greatly increased of late; there is more work here, and consequently they can get more from the labourers. When these vagrants remain in any place, they become the servants of the labourers, and clean their cabins, &c. for them.

They are principally women and children; the husbands go to look for work. Some are infirm in health, others advanced in years, and some are widows with young children. There are different degrees of begging; some beggars come singly to a house and present petitions.

The "letter writers" are a distinct class, and will only ask once in about three months, and that when in great distress only. Others will apply personally in the street, but do not associate with the regular beggars; they also go round to the farmers.

There is no begging by able-bodied men, but women of that class do in certain cases, when their husbands are labourers and out of work. Those who are occupied at work during the week are not known to beg on Sundays, nor the wives and children of employed labourers and cottier tenants either.

Dr. Coll stated that there was one man from Charleville, whose wife and children are begging every day, though he is himself employed.

Many cottier tenants come from Kerry, who have planted their potatoes there, and then go wandering about. Broken-down tradesmen and mechanics often have recourse to mendicancy; and the cottier tenants who are past their work go into parts of the country where they are not known, to beg.

As to the point about the fathers transferring or sub-assigning their land to their different children, Mr. Furlong stated that it was impossible to prevent the subdivision of land among the sons; for whether there was a lease or not, they deal with their ground in the same manner. They often make wills, even when they have no lease, and they even give leases when they have none themselves.

The Rev. John Locke, the rector of Newcastle, observed that Kerry was the country from whence the greatest number of beggars came, particularly from the estates of Lord Lansdowne. As to the fact of those who adopt this line of life from the facilities which it affords, Mr. Furlong said, that many have a great liking for begging, and contract a fondness for that "life of liberty."

An able-bodied beggar would be apt to collect about a stone of potatoes, one day with another; and in the towns where the public coaches stop, they collect a good deal from the passengers in town.

As to the point about the farmers proportioning the quantity they give to the numbers applying, or to their wants, Mr. Coll could not exactly state to what extent they did so, but he thought they were in the habit of doing it; and with regard to the mode of seeking relief, the wife generally separates entirely from the husband, though sometimes they may keep together; consequently, two portions of the same family may receive from the same persons on the same day.

Mr. Furlong stated that it was a common custom for the beggars to sell the surplus of their collections, after they had satisfied their own wants; though the Rev. Mr. Coll said he had never heard of such a custom before. And Mr. Furlong added, that when they get any money for it, they either pay for their lodgings or drink it.

With regard to the different reasons or excuses for begging, which are generally given, it was observed, that sometimes what is called "a shabby-genteel man," representing himself to be a schoolmaster, appears there, asking for relief; and others, describing themselves to be weavers from the county of Dublin, King's County, Dungarvan in the county of Waterford, &c. came there in search of work, but otherwise an able-bodied beggar is seldom seen.

The class of beggars called "boccoughs" assemble at fairs, markets, &c. and have sores on their legs and arms; these sights are generally very offensive. As to whether the different expedients are resorted to, such as lying, forged recommendations or certificates, &c. to procure money, both Mr. Locke and Mr. Furlong said that they had not known a case of imposture of the kind by beggars within the last 10 years, though their stories of distress might be often exaggerated.

Mr. Percy observed, upon the point of maimed and diseased persons exhibiting themselves at fairs and public places, that many of that class of mendicants are terrible objects; they endeavour to display their infirmities as much as possible. Many of these beggars are provided for by their relations. It is not probable, however, that children are mutilated by beggars for this purpose; the country people would find it out, and soon expose them.

As to the supposed dissolute habits of beggars, the Rev. Mr. Coll said that he never saw a town beggar drunk, nor in possession of any superfluity to make him so; but he has heard that the beggars who frequent the fairs are in the habit of being so.

Mr. Percy also observed that they are in general a quiet sort of people; there is, however, one sturdy beggar in that town, with one side paralized, who sometimes joins in fights at fairs, and gets drunk; this man regularly goes about to the different fairs. There is not, however, much pilfering among them, and on the whole there are but few thefts committed in that town. Upon the general character of the different vagrants who frequent that neighbourhood, Mr. Furlong observed that there was scarcely an obstinate beggar in Newmarket or in the neighbourhood; the poor housekeepers belonging to the town go round collecting food, but their character is not bad. The characters of the Kerry beggars, however, are otherwise; they are more numerous, and there is less sympathy felt for them. The Kerry peasantry, in fact, live in such wretched hovels, that they have no attachment to home. A good many thefts are no doubt committed by a class of very low persons, but they are not the beggars; several are butchers' apprentices, and brogue makers. These young persons are of the lowest grade, and are regularly hired by the leaders of factions; the consideration given to them being generally an order for whiskey; these fellows would waylay people, and do anything, in fact. Their crimes are to be attributed either to want or to a love of mischief. There is not, however, much pilfering in the neighbourhood; apple-stealing sometimes occurs, but horse and cow-stealing is on the increase; this crime is committed generally by wanderers, who are in collusion with the cattle-jobbers.

As to the relative ages at which the different classes marry, Mr. Furlong said that the farmers marry younger than any others; half of them run away with and carry off the girl with her own consent, especially among the mountaineers; there have been attempts at abduction, also, with violence within the last two years. It is wonderful how little attachment there is in marriages. Among the farmers the elopements are generally with girls having fortunes rather above the measure of the man, who is usually a smart fellow; sometimes the husband persecutes the wife after marriage, in order to extort money from the father-in-law.

The lowest description of prostitutes is among the Kerry beggars, and many of the women are the mothers of bastard children. The mortality amongst vagrants and beggars is decidedly less than amongst labourers.

With regard to the fact, whether an able-bodied man could collect more by begging than he could by working in the course of the day? Mr. Coll stated that what a labourer can earn might be 8 d. a day, while a beggar would collect a stone of potatoes, which is worth about 3 d.

Upon inquiry into the fact, whether vagrants in general preferred that mode of life to that of a labourer with equal earnings, and whether they are known to take it in preference? Mr. Coll stated that some of the females no doubt have recourse to begging, from indolent and idle habits, who might otherwise be able to obtain employment; but that it was not a common custom with them.

The character of town beggars is generally known where alms are given; but it would be impossible to ascertain those of the strange country beggars who pass through there.

Upon inquiring into the system of giving a night's lodging to vagrants, Mr. Furlong stated that it was a very great evil in that town, that labourers often take small cabins and let off a room to mendicants, who pay for it out of the alms which they may collect; and finding this profitable, the owners will then share their own rooms with them, and in this way four or five families will sometimes be collected in one cabin.

The usual relief given is in the shape of food, consisting generally of potatoes and sour milk; they carry the latter home with them; turf is also sometimes given. Doctor Pearce observed that the farmers always gave relief in potatoes, but that the beggars got halfpence in the towns, which they always preferred.

The quantity of food given daily depends entirely upon the plenty of potatoes, and not so much upon the number of beggars who call. The quantity given away by farmers thus in charity, must diminish their profits very considerably; and as to the point whether it would enable them to employ an additional workman, Mr. Coll could not say, but the quantity of potatoes would enable them to fatten several pigs at all events.

The relief of the beggars falls chiefly on the middle classes. Mr. Furlong observed, upon the point of the small farmers and shopkeepers being more open to annoyance and importunity than the richer classes, that the rich farmer would refuse the mendicant more easily than a poor one; the burthen falls more heavily on those who are least able to bear it: even those who possess only cabins as day labourers, occasionally relieve the mendicant.

As to the value in food or money which a small shopkeeper would give away, it could not be exactly ascertained; but Mr. Percy said that they gave away a good deal in the shape of eatables. The poorer classes of persons give relief from a feeling of pity, who can badly afford it; it is this feeling which encourages strangers to come, and the more money there is in the hands of the poorer classes, the more beggars there are.

As to the motive influencing the donor, and to the probable effects likely to be produced upon it by the establishment of a mendicity institution, Mr. Furlong remarked, that people look out for beggars to give them alms, for the benefit of their own souls, on the principle, that "giving to the poor, is lending to the Lord." Almsgiving from a religious feeling, he thought, would not be checked by a poor law; but almsgiving from a desire to relieve want, he thought would.

Mr. Coll thought that the farmers gave from motives of humanity.

With regard to the point whether relief is extorted by the able-bodied through threats of violence, violence, Mr. Percy was of opinion that it was in general given more from good-will than from fear. Mr. Furlong stated that many itinerant beggars alter their tone, and become abusive or threatening, and will blacken the character of a farmer who refuses to give them anything. If you ask a farmer why he gives, he will say, "It is not so safe to refuse." They fear injury to their property; stealing or defamation.

Dr. Coll said that Kerry beggars are very violent when refused relief, and he had no doubt that violence thus exercised, was a means of extorting alms; he also observed, with regard to the supposed malignant influence of the beggar's curse upon the lower orders, that there was no general fear of such, where the party had not given any just cause of offence.

As to the fact, whether diseases were spread through the country by the system of giving an occasional night's lodging to beggars, and whether the morals and habits of the labouring and poorer classes were much injured by the association with mendicants naturally attendant upon such a custom, Mr. Furlong stated, that the domestic comforts of a farmer's family were considerably diminished, and that by their associating with such bad company, filth and disease were certainly engendered; the money paid by the beggars for their lodgings was spent in whiskey, and this keeps the small farmers down in their condition, and leaves them no desire for improvement. Mr. Furlong mentioned the following instance of the bad and pernicious influence of strange beggars: "A common prostitute and vagrant from Kerry, had a child by a poor man who owns a lodging-house; the woman wanted to live with him, and the lodgers prevented her from having any access to him; in consequence of which, she attempted to sow dissension between a husband and his wife, two of the lodgers, in order to get them out of the way. She was committed to gaol for two months as a vagrant."

There have been no punishments inflicted upon vagrants, except where the magistrates sometimes convict one for being disorderly and troublesome, and sentence them, perhaps to two months' imprisonment; this, however, is not for simple vagrancy; it does much good in the way of example, and gets rid of them.

There are no almshouses or mendicity institutions.

MOST of the beggars are strangers chiefly from the county of Kerry; they set off begging through the country when the potatoes are set, and return in autumn; the whole family come and stay a week perhaps, and then move off; they pay 1*d.* or 2*d.* a night in lodging-houses. Vagrancy has neither increased nor decreased; they have their quilt and blanket with them; and the husband comes, but often stands aloof when the wife begs. There are some single persons who are constant beggars, married, blind, cripples, &c.; these have no families and almost always are males; they beg in fairs. The Kerry men go round to the farmers' houses. None who earn money during the week beg on Sundays. The street beggars are mostly females; some are prostitutes, others are old women; some travelling beggars say they are mechanics from Dublin, who are probably impostors. The children of beggars are completely neglected and ignorant.

Mr. Mulcahy states that there are many common beggars in Rathkeale; about half are natives and half strangers; the strangers are principally from Kerry; of these, many build huts on the waste ground behind the town, others come in the summer season; the husbands reap, dig potatoes, &c., and the wives and families beg; some who have not large families remain behind, the others return. The number of these persons depends on the year. If potatoes are scarce in Kerry, many come; if they are plentiful, fewer come. This year there were not so many. Potatoes were more plentiful in Kerry than in this country, and some of the Rathkeale beggars went to Kerry. Persons calling themselves mechanics often call; they may be impostors; they never remain in the town.

Not many of the Kerry men go for the harvest. Some beggars call themselves poor scholars, and go about with books under their arm, on pretence of getting their education. Mr. Smith sees about 24 in the year, and thinks they are impostors. The natives are very averse to begging. Sometimes the labourers send out their children to a distance. This year the potato crop was good in Kerry and scarce here, hence Limerick got potatoes from Kerry.

Mr. Mulcahy:—"There are from 50 to 100 common beggars resident in Rathkeale; few of these are able-bodied men; several are able-bodied females, generally without children; they collect about cars and coaches, but on the whole they get little money from the passengers; they go round the country and the town asking alms. The shopkeepers support all the aged and infirm."

A family from Kerry would collect six or seven stone of potatoes in the day from the farmers; they sell the surplus when they obtain more than they can consume, and get a farthing a stone less than the market price, as the potatoes are mixed. Beggars come into the fields when the potatoes are digging out, and the farmers give much more then than when they are housed.

When a family of beggars apply, alms are given in proportion to the family.

Mr. Mulcahy:—"A strong beggar able to go a good distance, will get hree or four stone of potatoes in the day; those who do not go so far will get only a stone."

The Kerry people purchase comfort with the surplus of their alms, but those who are professed beggars, going from fair to fair, are drunken and disorderly.

Mr. Mulcahy:—"The beggars sometimes sell the surplus of their potatoes, and buy milk, or a little clothes, as they are all very ragged."

Sometimes children are borrowed to excite compassion. There are two classes of permanent beggars; 1st, cripples blind and maimed, &c., who go from fair to fair, and are in general not impostors, but men who have sores on their legs, and probably irritate them; 2d, those who stand about coaches, chiefly women, and not objects of charity. The Kerry people say they are poor strangers, often that the father is dead, but the father separates from them, meets them at a certain place, and carries the store of potatoes. Those who have sores do not apply to dispensaries, and they object to being cured. Few of the professed beggars are capable of working, except females. A strong young woman, accustomed to carry round her mother (a cripple) in search of alms, has continued the begging trade since her death, though she is able to work.

Mr. Mulcahy knows of no imposture by beggars; all the beggars of the place are known, and very few strolling beggars come through the town; there are scarcely any except the Kerry people and the residents.

The beggars in the town in general have not a bad character, as they do not drink or pilfer. Confirmed vagrants would not be willing to emigrate to America. An old beggar with a long beard came into Mr. Smith's kitchen, about four or five years ago, and was insolent and abusive, and suspicion being excited by his appearance he was searched, and 25*l.* in gold silver and brass (20*l.* in gold) was found on his person.

Beggars make more in a day than a labouring man could obtain by working.

Those who give alms have little or no knowledge of the character of those to whom they give relief.

Generally speaking, the farmers and shopkeepers know the beggars whom they relieve. In a scarcity year, however, many strangers come whom they do not know.

Vagrants do not prefer their unsteady wandering life to that of the labourer with equal earnings, nor do many take to such a mode of life in preference to remaining labourers, neither when work at the ordinary wages of the country has been offered have they been known to refuse it.

Those who relieve give without examination as to whatever the vagrant has already received during the day, and alms would be given to a vagrant of whose character the giver was totally ignorant.

A night's lodging is often given to vagrants, but the relief given chiefly consists of potatoes.

In the country, relief is given always in potatoes; in the town, the shopkeepers give the overplus of their meals or money, but not raw potatoes or milk.

Milk is extensively given by the farmers, who prefer giving food to money, because they have got one, and not the other.

Mr. Mulcahy:—"They give more to women with families, and in seasons of want they select the object. A shopkeeper at all liberal gives 15*l.* or 20*l.* in a year; others give 5*l.* or 10*l.* It is a heavy tax on shopkeepers, besides the annoyance. This includes the alms given to the poor housekeepers. I should feel it a great relief if the poor were provided for by law. I would willingly pay a tax for the purpose."

The relief of the beggars and poor chiefly falls on the industrious classes, both in town and country.

The wives of labourers only earning 6*d.* a day sometimes give to beggars.

Relief is given to vagrants from the fear that the individuals applying are suffering from privation. Relief is also often extorted by importunity. The farmers give from charity; they give from a fellow-feeling, because the applicants are starving for want of food.

It does not happen that relief is given to able-bodied people from the fear of violence to the donor or his property; neither is relief given under the dread of the supposed malignant influence of the beggar's curse on those refusing alms, but they would not think it lucky to refuse.

Vagrants are not the means of originating, spreading or continuing discontent, by fabricating stories or by talebearing.

Punishment for vagrancy is only inflicted where they are troublesome or disorderly. There is no house of industry or mendicity institution in the neighbourhood.

Rev. Dr. COLLINS, parish priest of the union of Shanagolden, Robertstown, and Ballyhargill.

THERE are few beggars in the country parts, being chiefly confined to the village of Shanagolden, and most of these are from Kerry and its borders. Some of them come in summer, and merely pass through the country; others sometimes make a lodgment, as there are two or three families who have stopped for the last three years, who go round to the farmers and collect potatoes.

When the wives of labourers of this place beg, they leave the neighbourhood, but these instances instances are rare, and only occur in the summer, when potatoes are scarce and there is no work.

In a scarce summer there are many strolling beggars to be seen, but in ordinary times very few. The labourers of this neighbourhood frequently go to the eastern part of the county Limerick or county Tipperary, especially in the potato-digging season, to seek employment, leaving their wives and children at home, who live on their own potatoes.

Sometimes beggars will collect from three to five stone of potatoes in a day; they travel from eight or nine o'clock in the morning until evening, but this only occurs in times of plenty.

The members of one family frequently separate, and often try to get relief in succession from the same farmer, but the beggars who reside in the place are known.

Some of the beggars, when they receive more food than they require for their own consumption, sell the surplus, and generally make a good use of the money which they thus get.

There is a great deal of idleness attached to vagrancy, as many prefer begging to work, especially young girls from 10 to 16 years of age, but I have not met with any instances of their pilfering.

For particular days a beggar might get more than a labourer, but on the whole he could not collect as much as a labourer would earn, and it rarely occurs that able-bodied labourers beg.

The beggars in Shanagolden are known to the persons to whom they apply for relief, and to the neighbours, but the strolling beggars are not known.

When a beggar has filled his bag, a child is sent in with an empty one, and the parents keep at a distance themselves.

Beggars frequently get a night's lodging from the labourers, but not from the farmers, and there has been no case of beggars robbing in these parts.

If a single person, or a person with one child, applies for alms, the farmers often refuse, but in case of a large family they give in proportion to their wants.

Farmers and labourers contribute as much as they can to the relief of the beggars, but the gentry are not accessible.

The farmers give relief from motives of humanity in general, except in scarce seasons, as alms are then given in many instances through fear; and some weak-minded or ignorant people might give alms through a dread of being cursed by the beggar applying; however, these instances are not common.

It is not considered that the morals or habits of the labouring classes are injured by the association caused by giving lodging-room to vagrants, or that they are the means of originating, spreading or continuing discontent by fabricating or by talebearing, as they merely tell amusing stories, or convey news as a sort of payment for the alms they receive, and in order to make themselves acceptable; in this there is nothing mischievous.

There has not been any punishment whatever inflicted for vagrancy in this district, neither are there any houses of industry or a mendicity institution in the neighbourhood.

THERE are about 100 street beggars in the parish, including the children. Donovan thinks that there are 1,000 persons in Carrick who go out into the country to beg; other witnesses say 500.

James Cullen, tradesman, remembers when he would walk the street and would not see a beggar, except a cripple. The destruction of the manufactures has been the cause of the increase of beggary. Vagrancy is most common in the potato-digging season, as the strangers come and send out their wives begging. They come from the counties of Kerry, Cork, Kilkenny, Tipperary, &c.
